

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,014,465

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEB

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION

WILLIAM IV.

44° & 45° VICTORIÆ, 18

VOL. CCLXIV.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH DAY OF JUL

TO

THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF AUGUST

EIGHTH VOLUME OF THE SESSION

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY

22, PATERNOSTER BOW. [E.C.]

1861.

1-17

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 28.]

| | |
|------------------|--|
| Page | LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Randolph Churchill |
| AND haw .. | TURKEY (FINANCE, &c.)—TURKISH BONDHOLDERS—Question, Mr. B. Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke |
| 15 | EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Bolton swer, Mr. Gladstone |
| 16 | TRADE AND COMMERCE—TREATY ENGAGEMENTS—Questions, Sir H. mond Wolff, Mr. Newdegate; Answers, Mr. Gladstone |
| 17 | PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Conn John Hay, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Gladstone |
| 17 | RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS PREVENTION BILL—Question Heneage, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answers, Mr. Gladstone |
| 18 | PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— CONNELY, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT — Question, Mr. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster |
| 18 | PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. MATTHEW HA PRISONER UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer W. E. Forster |
| 19 | |
| 20 | |
| 21 | |
| 21 | |
| 22 | |
| 22 | |
| 23 | |
| 24 | |
| 25 | |
| 26 | |
| 26 | |
| 27 | |
| 28 | |
| 28 | |
| 28 | |
| 29 | |
| 30 | |
| 30 | |
| 30 | |

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill [Bill 225]—

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed
After long debate, Moved, "That the Bill be read the third To-morrow, at Two of the clock,"—(Mr. Gladstone:)—Question put agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN—DEFEAT OF THE AMEER'S FORCES—Questions, Sir S.
Northcote, Mr. J. Cowen, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Mr. Gladstone

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question put
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

ROYAL PARKS, &c.—WINDSOR PARK—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the charge of Park be transferred from the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings, Arthur Arnold,"—instead thereof Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by leave drawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," proposed:—

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—SUITORS' FUNDS IN CHANCERY—RESOLUTION—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to words "the future lists of unclaimed money be issued with cross reference nially; stating the amount of fund of the suitors' fund in Chancery; with the and last known addresses of persons supposed to be entitled thereto; together the date of the last decree,"—(Mr. Stanley Leighton,)—instead thereof

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 28.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—SUITORS' FUNDS IN CHANCERY—continued.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) £18,792, to complete the sum for the Colonial Office.—After debate, Vote agreed to

(2.) £16,077, to complete the sum for the Privy Council Office.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,355, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Lord Privy Seal"

After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 144, Noes 44; Majority 100.—(Div. List, No. 342.)

(4.) £101,933, to complete the sum for the Board of Trade.—After debate, Vote agreed to Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot :)—Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Summary Procedure (Scotland) Amendment Bill [Lords]

Bill considered in Committee

After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, Amendment Bill [Lords]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Courtney)

Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Lunacy Law Amendment (re-committed) Bill [Bill 192]

Order for Committee read

Moved, "That the Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Dillwyn :)—Motion agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 29.

MINISTERS STIPENDS, &c. (SCOTLAND)—ADDRESS FOR A RETURN—

Moved an Address for, "Return for each county in Scotland of the name of every parish in which an augmentation was made of ministers stipend and of allowances for communion elements respectively during the period that has elapsed since the 20th March 1876; also the name of each parish in which there are unexhausted teinds, and the amount applicable to the augmentation of ministers stipend, &c. in each such parish (in continuation of former Return, No. 242, 1876,"—(The Earl of Minto)

After short debate, Motion agreed to.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS NEAR ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH—Question, Observations, Lord Lamington; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley.

WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS)—Question, Observations, The Bishop of London; Reply, The Earl of Dalhousie:—Short debate thereon

TURKEY—MIDHAT PASHA—FULFILMENT OF SENTENCE—Question, Observations, Lord Stratheden and Campbell, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, The Earl of Kimberley

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 29.]

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Monday next: (The Lord Privy Seal) (No. 187) .. 1

Leases for Schools (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord O'Hagan); read 1^a (No. 188) 1

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 29.

QUESTIONS.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. CROTTY AND MARSH, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—IRREGULARITY IN KILRUSH WORKHOUSE, CO. CLARE—Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

LAW AND POLICE—PRACTICE OF CARRYING FIREARMS—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, Sir William Harcourt 1

LAW AND JUSTICE—SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879—FINES AND COSTS—Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Sir William Harcourt; Observation, Sir R. Assheton Cross 1

ARMY—THE ORDNANCE COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Childers 1

PARLIAMENT—MR. BRADLAUGH—THREATENED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE—Question, Mr. Warton; Answer, Sir William Harcourt 1

ARMY ORGANIZATION—REGIMENTAL COLOURS—Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. Childers 1

NAVY—THE DISASTERS TO THE SHETLAND FISHERMEN—Questions, Mr. Gourley, Mr. Laing; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan 1

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAGISTRACY—THE HIGH SHERIFF OF COUNTY LOUTH—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. FLOOD, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELIEF FOR FAMILIES OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS)—Questions, Mr. Monk, Viscount Sandon; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke 1

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—MURDER OF CAPTAIN ELLIOTT AND MR. MALCOLM—Questions, Mr. Ashmead Bartlett, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Gladstone 1

AFGHANISTAN—DEFEAT OF THE AMEER'S FORCES—Questions, Sir Henry Tyler, Lord Randolph Churchill, Colonel Stanley, Mr. E. Stanhope, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Lord Elcho; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Gladstone 1

INDIA—PENSIONS FOR EMINENT SERVICES—SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS—Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington 1

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. R. Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 29.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill [Bill 225]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Gladstone)
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to words "re-committed, with respect to Clause 35,"—(Mr. William Henry) instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand of the Question:"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed.

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—After long debate, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Debate resumed ..

After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 220, Noes 196. Majority 206.

Division List, Ayes and Noes

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

IRISH FISHERIES—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to words "it is the opinion of this House that it is the duty of the Government to render the Irish Fisheries more available as a means of increased food and employment,"—(Mr. Blake,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand of the Question:"—After short debate, Amendment, by drawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATE
(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS

- (1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £13,798, to complete the sum necessary to discharge the Civil Service Commission, which will come in course of payment during the year ending March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales"

After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

- (2.) £13,798, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission, Vote agreed to

- (3.) £9,466, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure and Drains Commission.

- (4.) £4,425, to complete the sum for the Inclosure and Drains Commission. Expenses.—After short debate, Vote agreed to

- (5.) £27,233, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and Audit Department. After short debate, Vote agreed to

- (6.) £8,086, to complete the sum for Friendly Societies Register. Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £13,798, to complete the sum necessary to discharge the Civil Service Commission, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government, various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation"

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 29.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. R. N. Fowler :)—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 16, Noes 73; Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 344.)

Original Question again proposed:—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £8,195, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England"

226

Moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Colonel Alexander :)—Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Petroleum (Hawking) Bill [Lords] [Bill 222]—

Bill considered in Committee 226
After some time spent therein, .. . [House counted out]

LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 1.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill (No. 187)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Privy Seal) .. 236

After long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(The Duke of Argyll :)—Motion agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

Shop Hours Regulation Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl Stanhope); read 1^a (No. 191) 355

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 1.

QUESTIONS.

—o—o—o—

LAW AND POLICE—FLOWER SELLERS IN ISLINGTON—Question, Mr. Carington; Answer, Sir William Harcourt 356

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION—Question, Lord Randolph Churchill; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 357

INDIA—PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES IN CALCUTTA—Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 357

ARMY—HEAVY RIFLED ORDNANCE—CASE OF MR. LYNALL THOMAS—Question, Mr. Leake; Answer, Mr. Childers 358

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT, 1878—THE DECIMAL SYSTEM—Question, Mr. A. M. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain 360

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS—REPORTED MAGISTRATES—Questions, Mr. Anderson, Mr. T. Collins, Mr. Healy, Mr. J. Cowen; Answers, The Attorney General 360

INDIA (FINANCE, &C.)—ANNUITIES AND FURLOUGH PAY—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington 362

INDIA—OUTBREAK OF PRISONERS—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 362

EGYPT—THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 363

AFGHANISTAN—BRITISH ASSISTANCE TO THE AMEER OF CABUL—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 363

CHANNEL ISLANDS—THE ISLAND OF GUERNSEY AND THE BURIAL ACT—Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Sir William Harcourt 364

THE HISTORICAL MSS. COMMISSION—Question, Sir R. Assheton Cross; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish 364

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 1.]

| | |
|---|--|
| INDIA—CHARGES AGAINST HYAT KHAN—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | |
| POST OFFICE PILLAR BOXES—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Fawcett | |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE 79TH REGIMENT—Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Mr. Childers | |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—ARTICLES 106, 107—Question, Major-General Feilden; Answer, Mr. Childers | |
| PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONER UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | |
| BRITISH COMMERCIAL TREATY ENGAGEMENTS—Question, Mr. Jackson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | |
| HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE COURT OF SESSION—Question, Mr. Dalrymple; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | |
| AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | |
| VALUATION (IRELAND)—TOWN PARKS—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. W. E. Forster | |
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL (NEGOTIATIONS)—THE CONVENTION WITH THE BOERS—Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | |
| SOUTH AFRICA—CETYWAYO—Question, Mr. W. Fowler; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish | |
| PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | |
| AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | |
| AFFAIRS OF EGYPT—Questions, The Earl of Bective; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke | |
| WAYS AND MEANS—TERMINABLE ANNUITIES—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | |
| ARMY RECRUITING—THE 53RD REGIMENT—Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Childers | |

M O T I O N .

—:o:—

| | |
|--|--|
| PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS — Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | |
|--|--|

Moved, "That for the remainder of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence Notices of Motions on Tuesday, Government Orders having priority, and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesday,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

After debate,

Moved, "That Mr. Parnell be suspended from the service of the House during the remainder of this day's sitting,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 131, Noes 14; Majority 117—(Div. List, No. 346.)

Question again proposed:—After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 111, Noes 117; Majority 99.—(Div. List, No. 347.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 1.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

| | |
|---------------|--|
| Page | |
| An- .. 365 | |
| ver, .. 366 | SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed |
| en ; .. 366 | “ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair : ”— |
| 7— .. 366 | MERCHANT SEAMEN’S PENSIONS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, |
| ERS .. 367 | To leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add |
| r .. 367 | words “ in the opinion of this House, the grant to the Greenwich Hospital F |
| An- .. 367 | should include widows whose husbands contributed to the fund, and merch |
| tion, .. 368 | seamen now in receipt of the Mercantile Marine Fund Pensions,”—(Mr. Gour |
| wer, .. 368 | —instead thereof |
| ers, .. 369 | Question proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand p |
| WITH .. 370 | of the Question : ”—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to . |
| stone .. 370 | Main Question proposed, “ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair : ”. |
| Lord .. 370 | PUBLIC HEALTH—THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—Observations, I |
| AND) .. 370 | Cameron ; Reply, Mr. Dodson ; Observations, Mr. Warton |
| elot ; .. 371 | RUSSIA IN CENTRAL ASIA—Observations Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett ; Rep |
| arles .. 371 | The Marquess of Hartington :—Short debate thereon .. |
| Mr. .. 372 | Motion, “ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” by leave, wi |
| r B. .. 372 | drawn :—Committee deferred till To-morrow . |
| | Regulation of the Forces Bill [Bill 193]— |
| | Order for Committee read :— Moved , “ That Mr. Speaker do now lea |
| | the Chair,”—(Mr. Childers) |
| | After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Co |
| | mittee |
| | After some time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be co |
| | sidered upon Thursday . |
| | Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, Amendment Bill [Lords] |
| | Bill considered in Committee |
| | After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be co |
| | sidered To-morrow . |
| | SAVINGS BANKS AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS, AND SECURITIES |
| | CHANCERY DIVISION— |
| | Resolutions considered in Committee |
| | After short debate, Resolutions agreed to ; to be reported To-morrow . |
| | Coroners (Ireland) Bill [Bill 230]— |
| | Lords’ Amendment considered |
| | Moved , “ To disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment,”—(M |
| | Healy .) |
| | Motion agreed to . |
| | Committee appointed , “ to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagree |
| | to the Amendment made by The Lords to the Coroners Bill : ”—List of the Commit |
| | Reason for disagreement to The Lords Amendment reported , and agreed to :—To |
| | communicated to The Lords. |
| | EAST INDIAN LOANS, ANNUITIES, &c.— |
| | Resolutions considered in Committee |
| | Resolutions agreed to ; to be reported To-morrow . |
| | Irish Church Act Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. William Edward Forster, I |
| | Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland) ; presented, and read |
| | first time [Bill 235] |
| | VOL. COLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.] [c] |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 2.

Page

Land Law (Ireland) Bill (No. 187)—

Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the Second Reading, read :—Debate resumed accordingly .. 452
After long debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Royal University of Ireland Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Privy Seal) : read 1^a
(No. 194) 555

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 2.

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|--|------------|
| MERCANTILE MARINE—LIGHTSHIPS AND LIGHTHOUSES—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION—Question, Mr. Akers-Douglas ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 555 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—MAJORS—Question, Major-General Burnaby ; Answer, Mr. Childers | 556 |
| ARMY REGULATION ACT, 1871—PURCHASE OFFICERS—REGULATION AS TO RETIREMENT—Question, Major General Burnaby ; Answer, Mr. Childers | 556 |
| CHINA—THE OPTUM TRAFFIC—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 557 |
| IRELAND—THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED BREACH OF THE PEACE BY A SUB-INSPECTOR—Question, Mr. Finigan ; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 558 |
| LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—POISONED EGGS—Question, Mr. Finigan ; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 558 |
| ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA ADJUTANTS—Question, Mr. Round ; Answer, Mr. Childers | 559 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—PURCHASE CAPTAINS—Question, Mr. Molloy ; Answer, Mr. Childers | 559 |
| PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—SUSPENSION OF CORRUPT BOROUGHES—Question, Mr. T. Collins ; Answer, The Attorney General | 560 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair : ”—

ELECTION PETITIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS ACT—KNARESBOROUGH COMMISSION—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, having regard to statements of the Royal Commissioners, it is not in accordance with justice nor with the policy of the Act of 31 and 32 Vic. c. 125, that the cost of this inquiry should be borne by the ratepayers of the borough of Knaresborough,”—(Mr. Thomas Collins,)—instead thereof 560

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question : ”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—LIMERICK AND BELFAST WORKHOUSES—Observations, Mr. A. Moore ; Reply, Mr. W. E. Forster ; Observations, Mr. Biggar 564

Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 3.]

Page

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| (1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £330,173, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation" | 569 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £310,173, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Cochran-Patrick :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn. | |
| Original Question again proposed | 574 |
| After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £329,329, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Duckham :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn. | |
| Original Question again proposed | 585 |
| After debate, Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £8,195, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England" | 606 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £6,695, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £22,640, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Mint, including the Expenses of the Coinage" | 612 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £20,640, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Rylands :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question again proposed | 615 |
| After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (4.) £10,142, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 617 |
| (5.) £17,438, to complete the sum for the Patent Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 617 |
| (6.) £14,277, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 628 |
| (7.) £6,243, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 630 |
| (8.) £11,567, to complete the sum for the Record Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 632 |
| (9.) £22,943, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, England.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 636 |
| (10.) £295,000, to complete the sum for Stationery and Printing.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 637 |
| (11.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £13,196, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments" | 644 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £11,196, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Pugh :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (12.) £25,765, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 656 |
| (13.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services" | 657 |
| After debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Leamy :)—After further short debate, Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 83, Noes 17; Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 348.) | |

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 2.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| Petroleum (Hawking) Bill [Lords] [Bill 222]— | |
| Bill considered in Committee [Progress 29th July] | 681 |
| After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow . | |
| Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, Amendment Bill [Lords] | |
| Bill, as amended, considered | 689 |
| After short debate, Bill read the third time, and passed . | |
| National Debt Bill — | |
| Resolutions [August 1] reported | 692 |
| After short debate, Resolutions agreed to :—Bill ordered (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish); presented , and read the first time [Bill 286.] | |
| Indian Loan of 1879 Bill —Resolutions [August 1] reported , and agreed to :—Bill ordered (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish); presented , and read the first time [Bill 287] | 693 |
| Corrupt Practices (Suspension of Elections) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Solicitor General); presented , and read the first time [Bill 238] | 693 |

LORDS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3.

The House met;—And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—[House adjourned]

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3.

Q U E S T I O N.

| | |
|--|-----|
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE CONVENTION WITH THE BOERS— | |
| Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 694 |

M O T I O N.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—MR. BRADLAUGH—RESOLUTION—

| | |
|--|-----|
| Moved , “That, in the opinion of this House, the Resolution of the House passed 10th May last, ‘That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House, until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House,’ meant that Mr. Bradlaugh should not come within the outer door of this Chamber, and did not give any power to the Serjeant at Arms to hinder him from entering and remaining in all or any other portions of this edifice, and that therefore the Serjeant at Arms and the Officers of the House acting under him, in excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from such other portions of the edifice, acted without the authority of this House, and in so doing interfered with the privileges inherent in Membership of this House, and from which no Member can be deprived without a Resolution of this House to that effect,”—(Mr. Labouchere) | 695 |
| After debate, Amendment proposed, | |
| To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the Officers of this House acting under his orders,”—(Sir Henry Holland .) | |
| Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After further short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 7, Noes 191; Majority 184.—(Div. List, No. 351.) | |
| Question proposed, “That the words ‘this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the officers of this House acting under his orders’ be there added:”—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to . | |
| Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to . | |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 3.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair : ”—

NAVY (CADETS)—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ in the opinion of this House, Naval Cadets should be appointed at a more advanced age, and that if they are chosen by competitive examination such competition should be open and not limited for the purposes of patronage,”—(Mr. Gorst,)—instead thereof

720

Question proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question : ”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—Observations, Mr. Arthur O'Connor ; Reply, Mr. W. E. Forster :—Short debate thereon

732

Main Question, “ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.
(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £5,027, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue ”

736

After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £4,187, be granted, &c., ”—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £9,239, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays ”

742

After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £6,809, be granted, &c., ”—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £3,944, to complete the sum for the Board of Lunacy in Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to

749

(4.) £5,746, to complete the sum for Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

(5.) £5,582, to complete the sum for Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Public Health, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to

750

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £4,270, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses ”

751

Motion made, and Question proposed, “ That a sum, not exceeding £1,423, be granted, &c., ”—(Mr. Finigan :)—After debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| LORDS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 4. | | Page |
|--|--|------|
| Land Law (Ireland) Bill (No. 187)— | | |
| Moved , "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee,"—(The Lord Privy Seal) | | 765 |
| Amendment moved , to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("on this day six months,")—(The Lord Denman .) | | |
| On question, that ("now") stand part of the motion, resolved in the affirmative; House in Committee accordingly. | | |
| House resumed ; and to be again in Committee To-morrow . | | |
| Ecclesiastical Courts Regulation Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl Beauchamp); read 1 st (No. 201) | | 820 |
| COMMONS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 4. | | |
| POLICE SUPERANNUATION (GREAT BRITAIN)—Observations , Colonel Alexander | | 821 |
| QUESTIONS. | | |
| —o—o—o— | | |
| BULGARIA—ARREST OF M. ZANKOFF—Question , Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | | 821 |
| POST OFFICE—METROPOLITAN LETTER CARRIERS—Question , Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Fawcett | | 822 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—PURCHASE LIEUTENANTS AND CAPTAINS—RETIRING ALLOWANCES—Question , Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 822 |
| INDIA—LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF JADHAVRAI HARISHANKAR—Question , Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | | 823 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT, SEC. 66—Question , Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 824 |
| UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—REPORTS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—Observations , Mr. R. H. Paget; Reply, Sir Charles W. Dilke | | 824 |
| ARMY—BARRACK SERGEANTS—Question , Mr. R. H. Paget; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 825 |
| PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. M'DONOUGH AND FINN, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Question , Mr. D. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | | 825 |
| POOR LAW (IRELAND)—UNION RATING—Questions , Colonel Colthurst, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | | 826 |
| POOR LAW (IRELAND)—OUT-DOOR RELIEF—Question , Colonel Colthurst; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | | 826 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—DISTURBANCE AT NEW ROSS—Question , Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 827 |
| Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Redmond :)—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 11, Noes 191; Majority 180.—(Div. List, No. 352.) | | |
| ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL—Questions , Mr. Bryce, Mr. Caine; Answers, Mr. Mundella | | 836 |
| ARMY—PROMOTION BY SELECTION—Question , The Earl of Bective; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 837 |
| PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—GEORGE PATTERSON, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT—Question , Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Childers | | 837 |
| POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—TELEGRAPH TO SHETLAND—Question , Mr. Laing; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish | | 838 |
| FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA—EXPULSION OF MR. L. LEWISOHN, A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT—Questions , Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke | | 839 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 4.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| STATE OF IRELAND—LAND LEAGUE MEETING AT DROGHEDA—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 839 |
| MERCHANT SHIPPING (EXPERIMENTS ON STEEL)—Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 840 |
| GROUND GAME ACT—PROSECUTION FOR TRESPASS—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 841 |
| LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—RELEASE OF PRISONERS UNDER THE PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—Question, Mr. J. Cowen; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 842 |
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE CONVENTION—Observations, Mr. Gladstone | 843 |
| PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—A SATURDAY SITTING—Observation, Mr. Gladstone | 843 |
| NAVY—TORPEDO BOATS—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 843 |
| NAVY—H.M.S. "INFLEXIBLE"—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 844 |
| JAPAN—TREATY REVISION—Question, Sir Edward Reed; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 844 |
| TUNIS—THE ENFIDA CASE—Question, The Earl of Bective; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 845 |
| TRINIDAD—OUTBREAK OF MALARIAL FEVER—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 847 |
| COOLIES (INDIAN) AT LA REUNION—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 847 |
| IRELAND—CROPS IN MUNSTER—HARVEST LABOUR—Questions, Mr. Warton, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 848 |
| INDIA—COURTS MARTIAL—Question, Mr. Grantham; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 848 |
| WAYS AND MEANS—TERMINABLE ANNUITIES BILL—Questions, Mr. Hubbard, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Gladstone | 849 |
| NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—Question, Sir Henry Fletcher; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 849 |
| EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 850 |
| CATTLE DISEASE—THE SIBERIAN PLAGUE—Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 850 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—GRANTS FOR DRAWING—Question, Mr. G. Palmer; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 851 |
| PARLIAMENT—ORDER—MOVING ADJOURNMENTS AT QUESTION TIME—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 851 |
| PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE (MR. BRADLAUGH)—NEW WRIT FOR NORTHAMPTON—Questions, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, Mr. Speaker | 852 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

ARMY—MOUNTED INFANTRY—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to meet the requirements of modern warfare, and to secure rapidity of movement for troops armed with breech-loading rifles, some provision be made in this year's Army Estimates for the formation of corps of mounted infantry, and that a proportion of such corps form part of the Army establishment in future,"—
(Sir Robert Lloyd Lindsay,)—instead thereof

853

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 4.] | Page |
|--|------|
| SUPPLY—Order for Committee read— continued . | |
| ARMY—LONG SERVICE SOLDIERS—Observations, Colonel Colthurst; Reply, Mr. Childers:—Short debate thereon | 860 |
| ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—ANTRIM ARTILLERY MILITIA—Observations, Mr. Biggar; Reply, Mr. Childers | 861 |
| PARLIAMENT—ORDER—SUSPENSION OF MR. O'KELLY—Observations, Mr. Parnell; Reply, Mr. Gladstone:—Short debate thereon | 862 |
| Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to . | |
| SUPPLY— considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES— (In the Committee.) | |
| (1.) £52,400, Divine Service.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 877 |
| (2.) £39,800, Administration of Military Law.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 878 |
| (3.) £300,500, Medical Establishments and Services.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 880 |
| (4.) £476,900, Militia and Militia Reserve.—After debate, Vote agreed to | 881 |
| (5.) £73,900, Yeomanry Cavalry.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 886 |
| (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £540,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882" | 896 |
| After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 131, Noes 16; Majority 115.—(Div. List, No. 353.) | |
| (7.) £218,800, Army Reserve.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 902 |
| (8.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £444,800, (including a Supplementary Sum of £40,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Commissariat, Transport, and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c. which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882" | 903 |
| After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £439,698 (including a Supplementary Sum of £40,000), be granted, &c."—(Mr. Labouchere:—After further short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 13, Noes 80; Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 354.) | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to . | |
| (9.) £780,000, Clothing Establishments, Services, and Supplies.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 910 |
| (10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,290,000 (including a Supplementary Sum of £120,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Supply, Manufacture, and Repair of Warlike and other Stores (including Establishments of Manufacturing Departments), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882" | 910 |
| Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(General Feilden:—Question put, and negatived .) | |
| After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to . | |
| Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot:—Motion agreed to .) | |
| Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow . | |
| Irish Church Act Amendment Bill [Bill 235]— | |
| Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland) | 912 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next. | |
| Corrupt Practices (Suspension of Elections) Bill [Bill 238]— | |
| Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Attorney General) | 915 |
| Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow . | |
| British Honduras (Court of Appeal) Bill [Lords] [Bill 233]— | |
| Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Courtney) | 916 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow . | |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 4.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| Pedlars (Certificates) Bill [Lords] [Bill 234]— | |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Courtney) .. | 917 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow . | |
| Universities (Scotland) Registration of Parliamentary Voters, &c. Bill [Lords] [Bill 232]— | |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time" .. | 918 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow . | |
| Exemption from Distress Bill [Bill 116]— | |
| Moved , "That the Order for the Consideration of the Bill be discharged,"—(Sir Henry Holland) .. | 922 |
| Question put, and agreed to :—Order discharged ; Bill withdrawn . | |

LORDS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 5.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Royal University of Ireland Bill (No. 194)— | |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Privy Seal) .. | 922 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next. | |
| Land Law (Ireland) Bill (No. 187)— | |
| House again in Committee (according to Order) .. | 923 |
| Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with; and Bill to be printed , as amended. (No. 204.) | |

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 5.

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|---|-----|
| INDIA—MORTALITY IN INDIAN GAOLS—Question, Sir George Campbell; | |
| Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. | 989 |
| INDIA—MADRAS CIVIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, The | |
| Marquess of Hartington .. | 990 |
| VACCINATION ACT, 1867—AWARDS TO PUBLIC VACCINATORS—Question, Mr. | |
| Burt; Answer, Mr. Dodson .. | 990 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—JULY CELEBRATIONS, Co. DOWN—Question, Lord | |
| Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. | 991 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—MURDER OF POLICE CONSTABLE LINTON—Question, | |
| Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. | 992 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—INTERMEDIATE AND HIGHER EDUCATION (WALES) | |
| —REPORT OF THE COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Rathbone; Answer, Mr. | |
| Mandella .. | 992 |
| SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—THE PLANE TREE—Question, Mr. Mitchell | |
| Henry; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre .. | 992 |
| ANCIENT MONUMENTS (RESOLUTION MARCH 11TH)—Question, Sir John | |
| Lubbock; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. | 993 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—RETIREMENT—Ques- | |
| tion, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Childers .. | 993 |
| PARLIAMENT—THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—CONDUCT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS— | |
| NEW RULES—Question, Mr. Rathbone; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. | 994 |
| PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—MR. BRADLAUGH—Observations, Mr. Labou- | |
| chere, Mr. R. N. Fowler .. | 995 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 5.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—THE NATIVE TRIBES—Questions, Sir Henry Holland, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone .. | 996 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE—Question, Mr. Briggs; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 997 |
| SEIZURE OF EXPLOSIVE MACHINES AT LIVERPOOL—Question, Lord John Manners; Answer, Sir William Harcourt .. | 997 |
| PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — Observations, Mr. Gladstone:—Short debate thereon | 998 |
| AFGHANISTAN — REPORTED MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. | 999 |
| FRANCE AND TUNIS—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE BOMBARDMENT OF SFAX —Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke .. | 1000 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—

LAW AND JUSTICE—OUTRAGE UPON THE PERSON—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the administration of the Law in cases of outrage upon the person has long been a reproach to our Criminal Courts; that outrages and assaults of the most brutal character, especially upon married women, even when they cause a cruel death, are commonly punished less severely than small offences against property; that the admission of the crime of drunkenness as an extenuation of other crimes is immoral, and acts as an incentive to persons about to commit outrages to wilfully deprive themselves of the guidance of reason,”—(Mr. Macfarlane,)—instead thereof 1000

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY—Observations, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Reply, Sir William Harcourt:—Short debate thereon .. 1005

ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—JURISDICTION OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER OF POLYNESIA—Observations, Sir John Hay, Sir Henry Holland; Reply, Mr. Trevelyan 1018

ARMY (RECRUITING)—IRISH SOLDIERS—Observations, Mr. Biggar; Reply, Mr. Childers 1027

Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £758,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882 ” 1028

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £738,900, be granted, &c.,”—(Mr. Biggar :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived.
Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £164,100, Military Education.. .. . 1029

After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £163,883 1s. 4d., be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for Military Education,”—(Mr. Byrne :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]

Page

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

| | |
|---|------|
| (3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £40,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Miscellaneous Effective Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882" | 1036 |
| After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £33,740, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 11, Noes 53; Majority 42.—(Div. List, No. 355.) | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (4.) £222,200, Administration of the Army. | |
| (5.) £34,000, Rewards, &c.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1037 |
| (6.) £129,700, Half Pay. | |
| (7.) £1,054,700, Retired Pay.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1037 |
| (8.) £124,200, Widows' Pensions.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1040 |
| (9.) £17,000, Pensions for Wounds. | |
| (10.) £33,900, Chelsea, &c. Hospitals.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1041 |
| (11.) £1,386,500, Out-Pensions. | |
| (12.) £202,200, Army Superannuation Allowances. | |
| (13.) £37,400, Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps.—After short debate, Vote agreed to. | 1043 |
| (14.) £1,100,000, Army (Indian Home Charges). | |
| (15.) £30,000, Supplementary Estimate, Pay, Allowances, &c. | |
| (16.) £290,000, Supplementary Estimate, Provisions, &c.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1045 |

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

| | |
|---|------|
| (17.) £36,281, to complete the sum for Law Charges.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1046 |
| (18.) £2,021, to complete the sum for the Public Prosecutor's Office.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1047 |
| (19.) £116,022, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1052 |
| (20.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £97,115, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office), as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund" | 1054 |
| After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £95,115, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Henry Fowler :)—After further short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 32, Noes 76; Majority 44.—(Div. List, No. 356.) | |
| Original Question again proposed | 1063 |
| Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £96,890, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Healy :)—The Committee divided; Ayes 23, Noes 90; Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 357.) | |
| After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (21.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £68,427, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature; the Salaries and Expenses of the Judges' Clerks and other Officers of the District Registrars of the High Court; the remuneration of the Judges' Marshals; and certain Circuit Expenses" | 1065 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,927, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—After short debate, Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (22.) £57,124, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries of the High Court of Justice. | |
| (23.) £6,797, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice. | |
| (24.) £8,118, to complete the sum for the Wreck Commission.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1068 |
| (25.) £19,424, to complete the sum for the London Bankruptcy Court.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1068 |
| (26.) £382,936, to complete the sum for the County Courts. | |
| (27.) £2,442, to complete the sum for the Land Registry.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1069 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES—Committee—continued.

| | |
|--|------|
| (28.) £18,690, to complete the sum for Revising Barristers, England. | |
| (29.) £8,021, Police Courts, London and Sheerness.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1071 |
| (30.) £250,402, to complete the sum for Metropolitan Police. | |
| (31.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £911,298, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for certain Expenses connected with the Police in Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales, and with the Police in Scotland" .. | 1072 |
| After short debate, Question put, and agreed to. | |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £245,844, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Superintendence of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies" .. | 1080 |
| After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn. | |
| (32.) £293,759, to complete the sum for Prisons, England.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1081 |
| (33.) £132,626, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1085 |
| (34.) £18,019, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1087 |
| (35.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £40,700, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Lord Advocate's Department and others connected with Criminal Proceedings in Scotland, including certain Allowances under the Act 15 and 16 Vic. c. 83" .. | 1090 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,700, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Biggar :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn. | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (36.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £39,008, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland, and other Legal Charges" .. | 1096 |
| Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £38,358, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Findlater :)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 20, Noes 52; Majority 32.—(Div. List, No. 358.) | |
| Original Question put, and agreed to. | |
| (37.) £25,422, to complete the sum for Register House Departments, Edinburgh.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1099 |
| (38.) £87,340, to complete the sum for Prisons (Scotland).—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1100 |
| Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow . | |

Regulation of the Forces Bill [Bill 193]—

| | |
|--|------|
| Order for Consideration, as amended, read .. | 1100 |
| After short debate, Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next. | |

Corrupt Practices (Suspension of Elections) Bill [Bill 238]—

| | |
|---|------|
| Bill considered in Committee .. | 1101 |
| After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment. | |
| Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Attorney General):—Motion agreed to:—Bill read the third time, and passed, without Amendment. | |

Whiteboy Acts Repeal Bill [Bill 134]—

| | |
|--|------|
| Moved, "That the Second Reading of the Bill be deferred till Saturday,"—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor) .. | 1104 |
| After short debate, Amendment proposed, to leave out "Saturday" and insert "Monday,"—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.) | |
| Question proposed, "That the word 'Saturday' stand part of the Question:"—Question put, and negatived. | |
| Original Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Second Reading deferred till Monday . | |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]

Page

| | |
|--|------|
| Conveyancing and Law of Property (re-committed) Bill [Lords] | |
| Bill considered in Committee | 1106 |
| After short time spent therein, Bill reported , without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next. | |
| EAST INDIAN RAILWAY [REDEMPTION OF ANNUITIES]— | |
| Considered in Committee | 1107 |
| Resolution agreed to ; to be reported upon Monday next. | |

COMMONS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6.

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|--|------|
| PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS—PETITIONS—THE BRADLAUGH PETITIONS—Questions, Observations, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answers, Sir Charles Forster | 1107 |
|--|------|

ORDER OF THE DAY.

| | |
|--|------|
| SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”— | |
| NAVY—PROMOTION—LIEUTENANTS—Observations, Sir John Hay .. | 1110 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD, R.M.—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, | |
| To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House condemns the refusal of the Government to grant an investigation into the conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M., and their refusal to notice the threats alleged to have been used by him in dispersing without proclamation a peaceful meeting at Drogheda on the 1st day of January,”—(Mr. Healy,)—instead thereof | 1111 |
| Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 75, Noes 18; Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 359.) | |
| NAVY—NAVY AND DOCKYARD OFFICERS—Observations, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Reply, Mr. Trevelyan:—Short debate thereon .. | 1133 |
| Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to. | | SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

| | |
|--|------|
| (1.) £877,890, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1138 |
| (2.) £847,035, Military Pensions and Allowances.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1139 |
| (3.) £337,991, Civil Pensions and Allowances. | |

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.

| | |
|--|------|
| (4.) £93,570, to complete the sum for the Diplomatic Services.—After short debate, Vote agreed to | 1143 |
| (5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £142,387, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Expense of the Consular Establishments Abroad, and for other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote” | 1147 |

granted, &c.,—(Mr. Leveson.)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
(6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £4,097, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Expenses of the Mixed Commissions established under the Treaties with Foreign Powers for suppressing the Traffic in Slaves, and of other Establishments in connection with that object, including the Muscat Subsidy" .. 1163

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,297, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) £7,047, to complete the sum for Tonnage Bounties, &c. and Liberated African Department.

(8.) £870, to complete the sum for the Suez Canal (British Directors).—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1163

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £20,761, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, in aid of Colonial Local Revenue, and for the Salaries and Allowances of Governors, &c., and for other Charges connected with the Colonies, including Expenses incurred under 'The Pacific Islanders Protection Act, 1875'" .. 1164

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £19,751, be granted, &c.,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed:—After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £1,105, to complete the sum for the Orange River Territory and St. Helena (Non-Effective Charges).

(11.) £17,300, to complete the sum for Subsidies to Telegraph Companies.

CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES.

(12.) £209,980, to complete the sum for Superannuations and Retired Allowances.

(13.) £19,550, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c.

(14.) £17,900, to complete the sum for the Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1166

(15.) £423,000, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, England.

(16.) £39,588, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

(17.) £49,552, Friendly Societies Deficiency.

(18.) £2,021, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1167

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

(19.) £19,863, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(20.) £3,927, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1168

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

(21.) £757,737, to complete the sum for the Customs.

(22.) £1,553,471, to complete the sum for the Inland Revenue.

(23.) £407,767, to complete the sum for the Post Office Packet Service.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 6.

Law (Ireland) Bill (Nos. 187, 204)—

Amendments reported (according to Order) .. 1170 debate, Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 207.)

of the Day for suspending Standing Order No. XXXV. read:—

"That the said Standing Order be suspended,"—(The Lord Seal.)

Question? resolved in the affirmative; Standing Order suspended ingly.

That the Bill be now read 3^d,"—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

ate, on question, resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 3^d accord-with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 8.

Page

QUESTIONS.

—:0:—

| | |
|---|------|
| PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—Messrs. MURPHY AND CAMPION, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1193 |
| SPAIN—THE ZAMORA WATERWORKS—Question, Mr. J. R. Yorke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1195 |
| ARMY—PENSIONERS OF THE ROYAL MARINES—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1195 |
| PARKS (METROPOLIS)—PADDINGTON PARK—Question, Sir Thomas Chambers; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley | 1196 |
| UNITED STATES—CONSULAR CONVENTION—Questions, Mr. Gourley; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley | 1197 |
| ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA UNIFORMS—Question, Mr. Round; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1197 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TECHNICAL EDUCATION—THE REPORT—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 1197 |
| LAW AND JUSTICE—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. R. P. LAURIE—Question, Mr. Pemberton; Answer, The Attorney General | 1197 |
| FIRES (METROPOLIS)—Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1198 |
| METROPOLITAN VESTRY ACCOUNTS—THE PADDINGTON VESTRY—Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, Mr. Dodson | 1199 |
| POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH CLERKS—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett | 1200 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. A. E. HERBERT, J.P.—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1200 |
| WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS)—THE GRAND JUNCTION WATER COMPANY—Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Dodson | 1201 |
| SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS)—HOSPITAL SHIPS ON THE RIVER THAMES—Questions, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Mr. Dodson | 1202 |
| MALTA—PETITION FOR REFORMS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Courtney | 1203 |
| LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—THE REPORT AND EVIDENCE—Question, Sir William Palliser; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1203 |
| ARMY—VOTE OF THANKS—SIR EVELYN WOOD—Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1204 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—RELEASE OF MR. JOHN DILLON, M.P.—Questions, Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Puleston, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1205 |
| LAW AND POLICE—DEATHS FROM DROWNING—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Dodson | 1206 |
| AFGHANISTAN—CANDAHAR—Questions, Lord George Hamilton, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington | 1207 |
| PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—Questions, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Puleston; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Labouchere | 1207 |
| PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Healy; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. Gladstone | 1209 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 8.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REVISED CODE—DEPARTMENTAL STATE-MENT OF THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION 1210

ART AND INDUSTRIAL MUSEUMS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin,”—(Mr. Jesse Collings,) —instead thereof 1226

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 48, Noes 85 ; Majority 37.—(Div. List, No. 360.)

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT, SOUTH KENSINGTON—UNITED WEST-MINSTER SCHOOLS OF ART—CASE OF MR. GOFFIN, THE HEAD MASTER —Observations, Lord George Hamilton :—Long debate thereon .. 1266

Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICES—
(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(1.) £1,283,958, to complete the sum for Education, England and Wales.—After debate, Vote agreed to 1300
Moved, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr.
Biggar :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £227,181, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Science and Art Department, and of the Establishments connected therewith” 1329
After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £226,681, be granted, &c.”—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.
(3.) £69,939, to complete the sum for British Museum.—After short debate, Vote agreed to 1337

(4.) £228,435, to complete the sum for Public Education, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to 1340

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To- morrow.

Regulation of the Forces Bill [Bill 195]—

Order for Consideration, as amended, read 1342
After short debate, Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow.

Patriotic Fund Bill [Lords] [Bill 240]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Childers) .. 1343
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and com- mitted for To-morrow.

National Debt Bill [Bill 236]—

Order for Committee read 1345
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported ; to be printed, as amended [Bill 243] ; re-committed for Thursday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 9.

Page

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|--|------|
| TRIPOLI—CONSULAR JURISDICTION—Question, Mr. Hinde Palmer; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1378 |
| CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCES—Questions, Mr. E. Stanhope, Viscount Sandon; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1378 |
| POST OFFICE—WEATHER FORECASTS—Question, Mr. Earp; Answer, Mr. Fawcett | 1379 |
| ARMY—THE CASE OF MR. LYNALL THOMAS—Question, Mr. Leake; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1379 |
| MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—EMIGRANT SHIPS—Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 1381 |
| INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS ACT—CASE OF REBECCA ATKINS—Question, Mr. Passmore Edwards; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1382 |
| ARMY (INDIA)—COLONEL BURROWS—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 1383 |
| PUBLIC HEALTH—SMALL-POX (METROPOLIS)—Question, Mr. Henry Allen; Answer, Mr. Dodson | 1384 |
| WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE—OFFICERS OF THE EXCISE BRANCH—Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish | 1384 |
| VACCINATION—FRENCH SOLDIERS IN AFRICA—Question, Mr. Blennerhassett; Answer, Mr. Dodson | 1385 |
| LAW AND POLICE—SPEECH OF MRS. BESANT AT THE HALL OF SCIENCE—Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1385 |
| PORTUGAL (INDIA)—THE GOA TREATY—Question, Mr. Cartwright; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 1386 |
| INDIA—THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE MALAY CHIEFS—Question, Mr. Lyulph Stanley; Answer, Mr. Courtney | 1387 |
| RAILWAYS—THE BLACKBURN RAILWAY ACCIDENT—Question, Mr. Briggs; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 1387 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—

Order for Consideration of Lords' Amendments read :—Motion made, and Question, " That the Amendments made by The Lords to the Land Law (Ireland) Bill be now considered," — (Mr. Gladstone,) — put, and agreed to :—Lords' Amendments considered 1388

After long debate, further Consideration of Lords' Amendments deferred till To-morrow.

Bills of Exchange Bill [Bill 218]—

Moved, " That the Bill be now read a second time," — (Sir John Lubbock) 1461

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

Removal Terms (Burghs) (Scotland) Bill—

Moved, " That the Lords' Amendments be forthwith considered," — (Mr. J. Stewart) 1464

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Amendments considered, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Consolidated Fund (No. 4) Bill—

Resolution [August 8] reported, and agreed to :—Bill ordered (Mr. Playfair, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Frederick Cavendish); presented, and read the first time 1465

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 10.

Page

Q U E S T I O N.

| | |
|---|------|
| ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND—UNIVERSITY WORK—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1466 |
|---|------|

O R D E R O F T H E D A Y.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—

| | |
|--|------|
| Lords' Amendments further considered | 1466 |
| After long debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, Further Consideration of Lords' Amendments stood adjourned till To-morrow . | |
| Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. | 1499 |

LORDS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 11.

PRIVATE BILLS—

Standing Orders Nos. 22, 33, 91, 114, 115, 116, 117, and 140a considered and amended, and to be printed as amended. (No. 167.)

| | |
|---|------|
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL STATE—THE BOUNDARIES—Observations, Question, Lord Brabourne; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley .. | 1500 |
|---|------|

Ecclesiastical Courts Regulation Bill (No. 201)—

| | |
|--|------|
| Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read .. | 1501 |
| After short debate, House in Committee. | |
| Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received To-morrow ; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with ; Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 198.) | |

Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Bill (No. 186)—

| | |
|--|------|
| Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read .. | 1508 |
| After short debate, House in Committee:—Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3 ^a To-morrow . | |

| | |
|---|------|
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REVISED CODE—DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT OF THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—Observations, Lord Norton | 1511 |
|---|------|

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—

Returned from the Commons with several of the amendments agreed to, several agreed to with amendments, and with consequential amendments to the Bill, and several disagreed to, with reasons for such disagreement. The said amendments and reasons to be printed, and to be considered To-morrow. (No. 211.)

COMMONS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 11.

O R D E R S O F T H E D A Y.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS (HALF-PAST TWELVE RULE)—

| | |
|---|------|
| Order for resuming Adjourned Debate thereupon [3rd May] read .. | 1519 |
| Moved , "That the Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Monk :)—Motion agreed to :—Order discharged . | |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 11.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment (re-committed) Bill [Bill 104] | |
| Order for Committee read . . . | 1520 |
| Moved , "That the Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Monk :)— Motion agreed to :—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn. | |
| Churchwardens (Admission) Bill [Bill 47]— | |
| Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [8th April] read . . . | 1520 |
| Moved , "That the Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Monk :)— Motion agreed to :—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn | |

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|--|-------------|
| POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE NEWRY POST OFFICE—CLERKS' CHRISTMAS GRATUITIES—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Fawcett . . . | 1520 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—ARMY—THE 28TH REGIMENT AT BIRRE—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Childers . . . | 1521 |
| "PRINCESS ALICE" CATASTROPHE—BURIAL EXPENSES OF SUFFERERS—Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Sir William Harcourt . . | 1522 |
| RIVER THAMES—LIFE-PRESERVING APPARATUS ON PASSENGER STEAMERS—Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain . . | 1522 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—DETENTION OF THE SCHOONER "WAVE" IN CORK HARBOUR—Questions, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster . . | 1523 |
| MERCANTILE MARINE—THE "CITY OF MECCA"—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke . . | 1524 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—"INTOLERANCE IN BALLYMENA"—Question, Mr. Bellingham; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster . . | 1524 |
| WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE—THE COLCLOUGH FRAUDS—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish . . | 1524 |
| POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CLOGHEEN UNION—CHARGEABILITY OF AN ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster . . | 1525 |
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL CONVENTION—THE PASS LAWS—Question, Mr. Cropper; Answer, Mr. Courtney . . | 1526 |
| INDIA—BERAR—SIR RICHARD MEADE AND SIR SALAR JUNG—Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington . . | 1526 |
| WEST INDIAN ISLANDS—THE BAHAMAS—FINANCE—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Courtney . . | 1528 |
| PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—GUN LICENCES—Questions, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Major Nolan, Mr. Macfarlane; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster . . | 1529 |
| POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—THE WEATHER FORECASTS—Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. Fawcett . . | 1530 |
| POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—GREENWICH TIME—Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, Mr. Fawcett . . | 1530 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE 28TH REGIMENT—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. Childers . . | 1531 |
| THE PATENT MUSEUM—GIFTS OF MODELS OF INVENTIONS—Question, Mr. Hinde Palmer; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain . . | 1531 |
| HARTERS OF THE CITY OF WATERFORD—THE RIVER SUIR—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain . . | 1532 |
| STOCKS—COFFEE AND CHICOBY—Question, Mr. Barran; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish . . | 1532 |
| WAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain . . | 1533 |
| NAVIGATION DEPARTMENT—TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION—Question, Mr. Lewis Fry; Answer, Mr. Mundella . . | 1533 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 11.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| ARMY—WIDOWS OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS—Questions, Mr. Biggar, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Childers | 1534 |
| LAW AND JUSTICE—MIDDLESEX REGISTRY—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Attorney General | 1534 |
| POOR LAW (IRELAND)—WORKHOUSE NATIONAL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1535 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—QUARTERMASTERS—Questions, Colonel Alexander; Answers, Mr. Childers | 1536 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—HIGHWORTH SCHOOL BOARD—Question, Mr. Long; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 1536 |
| THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF—Question, Viscount Sandon; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 1537 |
| ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND—UNIVERSITY WORK—Questions, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Beresford Hope; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1538 |
| THE PARLIAMENTARY OATH—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Thomasson; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1539 |
| COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS)—Questions, Viscount Sandon; Answers, Mr. Gladstone | 1539 |
| PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE NAVY ESTIMATES—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1541 |
| WEST INDIES—DEMERARA—DEFALCATIONS IN THE ADMINISTRATOR GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. Courtney .. | 1541 |
| WEST INDIES—JAMAICA—Question, Mr. Errington; Answer, Mr. Courtney .. | 1542 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—

| | |
|--|------|
| Lords Amendments further considered | 1542 |
| Moved , "That a Committee be appointed 'to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Bill. | |
| Motion agreed to ; Committee appointed :—List of the Committee .. | 1634 |
| To withdraw immediately. | |

| | |
|--|------|
| REASONS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE LORDS TO THE LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL | 1635 |
| Reasons for disagreement to The Lords Amendments reported , and agreed to :—To be communicated to The Lords. | |

SOLENT NAVIGATION [EXPENSES]—

| | |
|---|------|
| Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to ; to be reported To-morrow | 1639 |
|---|------|

LORDS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 12.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—

Ordered, That for the remainder of the Session the Bills which are entered for consideration on the Minutes of the day shall have the same precedence which Bills have on Tuesdays and Thursdays,—(The Earl of Redesdale.)

Discharge of Contumacious Prisoners Bill—Formerly Ecclesiastical Courts Regulation Bill (No. 198)—

| | |
|---|------|
| Amendments reported (according to order); further amendments made. Then Standing Order No. XXXV. considered (according to order), and dispensed with | 1640 |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read 3 ^d ,"—(The Earl Beauchamp) | |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 3 ^d accordingly, and passed , and sent to the Commons. | |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 12.] | Page |
|---|-------------|
| Conveyancing and Law of Property Bill— | |
| Commons Amendments considered (according to order) .. | 1641 |
| After short debate, Commons Amendments agreed to . | |
| Land Law (Ireland) Bill— | |
| Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments, and Commons consequential Amendments, and Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Lords Amendments considered (according to order) .. | 1642 |
| Moved , "That a Committee be appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to certain of their Amendments, and insisting on certain of the Lords Amendments,"—(The Marquess of Salisbury) .. | 1704 |
| After short debate, on question? resolved in the affirmative :—The Committee to meet forthwith. | |
| CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—OFFICERS AT OUTPORTS—Question, The Earl of Mount Edgumbe; Answer, Lord Thurlow .. | 1706 |
| Land Law (Ireland) Bill— | |
| Report from the Committee of the reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to certain of their amendments, and insisting upon certain of the Lords amendments to which the Commons have disagreed; read, and agreed to ; and a message sent to the Commons to return the said Bill with amendments and reasons. | |
| REASONS OF THE LORDS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE COMMONS' AMENDMENTS AND FOR INSISTING UPON CERTAIN OF THE AMENDMENTS TO WHICH THE COMMONS HAVE DISAGREED .. | 1707 |

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 12.

QUESTIONS.

| | |
|--|------|
| HIGHWAY RATES—ASSESSMENT AND POWER OF COMPOUNDING—Question, Mr. Hicks; Answer, Mr. Dodson .. | 1709 |
| POOR LAW (IRELAND)—REMUNERATION OF POOR RATE COLLECTORS— | |
| Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. | 1710 |
| ARMY (INDIA)—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS—Question, Mr. A. Moore; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. | 1710 |
| CHINA—THE OPIUM TRADE—Question, Mr. A. Pease; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke .. | 1711 |
| POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE POSTS AND WIRES—Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, The Attorney General .. | 1712 |
| LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—RETURN OF AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. | 1713 |
| CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN ADVANCES—Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke .. | 1713 |
| FOREIGN LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES (OATHS AND PROCEDURE)—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke .. | 1714 |
| THE MAGISTRACY—THE EVIDENCE FURTHER AMENDMENT ACT, 1869—REFUSAL OF MAGISTRATES AT BIRMINGHAM TO ALLOW A WITNESS TO AFFIRM—Questions, Mr. Labouchere; Answers, Sir William Harcourt .. | 1714 |
| EXPLOSIVES ACT—REGULATION AS TO MINERS MAKING CARTRIDGES IN THEIR HOMES—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Sir William Harcourt .. | 1715 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—"BOYCOTTING"—Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. | 1716 |
| ARMY ORGANIZATION—RETIRING OFFICERS—Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Childers .. | 1716 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 12.] | Page |
|---|-------------|
| ARMY PROMOTION—COMBATANT OFFICERS—Question, Colonel Alexander; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1717 |
| THE ADMIRALTY—THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1718 |
| LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DEATH OF MR. HONE—Questions, Mr. Gibson; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1718 |
| NAVY—OFFICERS ON LEAVE—Question, Colonel Kennard; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 1719 |
| ARMY (INDIA)—PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF FIELD OFFICERS—Question, Lieutenant Colonel Milne Home; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 1720 |
| LAW AND JUSTICE—SENTENCES IN CRIMINAL CASES—Question, Mr. M'Coan; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1720 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—"EXAMINERS"—Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 1721 |
| RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY COMPANY—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish | 1722 |
| IRELAND—GRESHAM GARDENS, KINGSTOWN—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish | 1723 |
| STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. A. E. HERBERT, J.P.—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1723 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE REVISED CODE, 1881—Questions, Mr. J. G. Talbot, Lord Randolph Churchill; Answers, Mr. Mundella | 1724 |
| NATIONAL DEBT BILL—Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, Mr. Gladstone | 1725 |
| PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Statement, Mr. Gladstone:—Short debate thereon | 1725 |
| ARMY—THE ROYAL MARINES—AFFRAY AT BANTRY—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1727 |
| PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT BILL—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1728 |

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS)—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from any Commercial Treaty with France which proposes to substitute specific duties for ad valorem duties, to the disadvantage of any article of British manufacture, or in any way to raise the present rate of duties payable on such articles, and which does not leave Her Majesty's Government full liberty to deal with the question of Bounties, or which would bind Her Majesty absolutely to its provisions for a longer period than twelve months,"—(Mr. Ritchie,)—instead thereof 1728

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 153, Noes 80; Majority 73.—(Div. List, No. 384.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Committee deferred till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—Observations, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Sir Stafford Northcote 1816

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 12.] | Page |
|--|-------------|
| Regulation of the Forces Bill [Bill 193]— | |
| Order for Consideration, as amended, read | 1817 |
| Consideration, as amended, deferred till To-morrow . | |
| National Debt Bill [Bill 243]— | |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read the third time" | 1817 |
| After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read the third time, and passed . | |
| Supreme Court of Judicature Bill [Lords] [Bill 227]— | |
| Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Attorney General) | 1818 |
| After short debate, Second Reading deferred till Monday next. | |
| Pedlars (Certificates) Bill [Lords] [Bill 234]— | |
| Order for Committee read:— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Courtney) | 1818 |
| After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 80, Noes 8; Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 385.) | |
| Bill considered in Committee | 1820 |
| After short time spent therein, Bill reported , without Amendment. | |
| Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time," put, and agreed to :—Bill passed . | |
| Petroleum (Hawking) Bill [Lords] [Bill 222]— | |
| Moved , "That the Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be deferred until Saturday,"—(Mr. Solicitor General) | 1820 |
| After short debate, Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next. | |
| Pollen Fishing (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. William Edward Forster); presented , and read the first time [Bill 248] | 1821 |

COMMONS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

| | |
|---|------|
| SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair: "— | |
| NAVY (SOBRIETY)—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it will promote good conduct and sobriety among the men and boys of the Royal Navy if the spirit ration were henceforth discontinued, and some equivalent given, equal to the value of the spirit ration, in the form of improved dietary or increased wages,"—(Mr. Caine),—instead thereof | 1821 |
| Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question: "—After debate, Question put, and agreed to . | |
| Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair: "— | |
| NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA"—Observations, Mr. Jenkins:—Debate thereon | 1835 |
| PASSENGER ACTS—EMIGRANT SHIPS—Observations, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. A. Moore; Reply, Mr. Chamberlain [House counted out] | 1845 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 15.

Page

DRAINAGE (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That the Order of the 1st day of April last, which limits the time for the Second Reading of any Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order be dispensed with with respect to the said Bill,"—(Lord Thurlow) 1878

After short debate, on question? Their Lordships divided; Contents 29, Not-Contents 31; Majority 2:—Resolved in the negative.

Division List, Contents and Not-Contents 1880

Patriotic Fund Bill—

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order), and agreed to .. 1881 Question, Viscount Sidmouth; Answer, The Earl of Northbrook.

CYLON—ECOLESTASTICAL SUBSIDIES—Question, Observations, Lord Stanley of Alderley, The Archbishop of Canterbury; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley 1881

TUNIS—RESOLUTION—Moved to resolve—

"That, in the opinion of this House, any interference with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire in North Africa is likely to prove dangerous to the peace of Europe,"—(The Earl of Dunraven) 1890

After debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—

Returned from the Commons with an amendment made by the Lords to which the Commons had disagreed and on which the Lords have insisted, agreed to; and with several of the further amendments made by the Lords, agreed to; several agreed to, with amendments, and with consequential amendments to the Bill; and several disagreed to, with reasons for such disagreement: The said amendments and reasons to be printed, and to be considered To-morrow. (No. 214.)

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 15.

QUESTIONS.

—:0:—

IRELAND—PHOENIX PARK—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish 1908

STATE OF IRELAND—CONDUCT OF SOLDIERS AT LIMERICK—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Redmond; Answers, Mr. Childers 1908

POST OFFICE—WAGES OF LETTER CARRIERS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Mr. Fawcett 1910

STATE OF IRELAND—PROCESS SERVING, CO. GALWAY—Questions, Mr. Biggar; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster 1910

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, 1877—SUPERANNUATION OF ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAIN AT CARRICK ON SHANNON GAOL—Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1911

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—Question, Major O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. Fawcett 1911

STATE OF IRELAND—MALMING OF CATTLE IN CO. KILKENNY—Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1912

IRELAND—BOROUGH OF GALWAY—THE FREEMAN'S ROLL—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland .. 1912

CHELSEA HOSPITAL—BURIALS—Question, Mr. Dick-Peddie; Answer, Mr. Childers 1913

CHARITABLE TRUSTS—BURKSTONE-LE-WILLOWS CHARITIES—Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Mr. Mundella 1913

CRIME (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RETURN OF ASSAULTS WITH VIOLENCE—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Sir William Harcourt .. 1914

IRELAND—REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, &c., BELFAST—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1914

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| [August 15.] | Page |
|---|------|
| INDIA—THE NIZAM—Questions, General Sir George Balfour, Mr. Onalow; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington | 1916 |
| PERU—REPORTED ROBBERY OF JEWELLERY AND MONEY FROM THE BRITISH VICE CONSULATE AT LIMA—Question, Mr. Alexander M'Arthur; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1917 |
| THE CAPE GOVERNMENT—PETITION OF RIGHT—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Courtney | 1917 |
| ARMY—THE VETERINARY DEPARTMENT—PROMOTION—Question, Mr. Gray; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1918 |
| THE IRISH LIGHTS COMMISSIONERS—TORY ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain | 1918 |
| EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EXTENSION OF THE NEW CODE TO SCOTLAND—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Mundella | 1919 |
| EGYPT—THE MILITARY FORCE—Question, Mr. M'Coan; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1919 |
| ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT—RETIRED PAY—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Childers | 1920 |
| LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DEATH OF MR. HONE—Question, Viscount Crichton; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland | 1920 |
| NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster | 1921 |
| ARCTIC EXPLORATION—THE NORTH POLE—COMMANDER CHEYNE'S EXPEDITION—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 1921 |
| INDIA—THE PAUMBAN PASS—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington | 1922 |
| POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SALARIES OF IRISH SUB-POSTMASTERS—Question, Mr. Barry; Answer, Mr. Fawcett | 1923 |
| WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE—THE COLOLOUGH STAMP FRAUDS—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish | 1923 |
| LICENSING ACTS—TRANSFER OF A LICENCE—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1924 |
| CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY—COMPENSATION—Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1924 |
| LAW AND POLICE—CRUELTY TO ANIMALS PREVENTION ACT—CRUELTY TO A DONKEY—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Sir William Harcourt | 1925 |
| SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—MURDER OF DR. BARBER—Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Courtney | 1925 |
| FRANCE AND TUNIS (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1926 |
| LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—CLAUSE 25 — PURCHASES — Question, Sir William Palliser; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland | 1927 |
| FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA — EXPULSION OF MR. L. LEWISOHN, A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT—Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke | 1927 |
| CONFISCATED ESTATES (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland | 1928 |
| LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—THE REPORT AND EVIDENCE—Questions, Sir William Palliser; Answers, Mr. Gladstone | 1929 |
| LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS—Question, Mr. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Speaker | 1931 |
| NAVY—THE POSITION OF NAVIGATING AND WARRANT OFFICERS—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan | 19 |
| THE PATRIOTIC FUND—MR. HAMILTON—Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Childers | 19 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 15.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—

Order for Consideration of Lords Reasons and Amendments read:—

Moved, "That the Lords Reasons and Amendments be now considered,"
—(Mr. Gladstone) .. 1982

After debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Lords Reasons and Amendments considered.

Moved, "That a Committee be appointed 'to draw up reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Bill, to which this House hath disagreed.'"

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—List of the Committee Committee to withdraw immediately. 1998

Royal University of Ireland Bill [Lords] [Bill 247]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. William Edward Forster) .. 1999

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. T. P. O' Connor):—
After short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

Land Law (Ireland) Bill—

COMMONS AMENDMENTS TO THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE LORDS TO THE AMENDMENTS MADE BY THE COMMONS TO THE LORDS AMENDMENTS, AND COMMONS REASONS FOR DISAGREEING TO CERTAIN OF THE SAID LORDS AMENDMENTS .. 2009

Reasons for disagreement to the Amendments made by The Lords to the Commons Amendments to The Lords Amendments reported, and agreed to:—To be communicated to the Lords.

Universities of Oxford and Cambridge (Statutes) Bill [Lords]—

Order for Second Reading read .. 2011

After short debate, Second Reading deferred until To-morrow.

NAVY AND ARMY EXPENDITURE, 1879-80—

Considered in Committee .. 2012

After short debate, Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Solent Navigation Bill [Bill 207]—

Moved, "That the Order for going into Committee upon the said Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley) .. 2015

Question put, and agreed to.

Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection,"—(Mr. Evelyn Ashley):—Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill be referred to the Committee.

Ordered, That Petitioners praying to be heard by Counsel or Agents be heard against the Bill, and that Counsel be heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—Three to be the quorum.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| | Page |
|--|-------------|
| [August 15.] | |
| Statute Law Revision and Civil Procedure Bill [Lords] Moved , "That the Order for going into Committee upon the said Bill be discharged,"—(Mr. Attorney General) .. After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Committee deferred till To-morrow . | 2015 |
| Pollen Fishing (Ireland) Bill [Bill 248] Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Seeliter General for Ireland) .. Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow . | 2016 |

SAT FIRST.

MONDAY, AUGUST 1.

The Lord Fingall, after the death of his father.

MONDAY, AUGUST 15.

The Earl of Harrington, after the death of his father.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

IN THE
SECOND SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 29 APRIL, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

EIGHTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1881.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 28th July, 1881.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) * (186).

Second Reading—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act (1877) Amendment (164); Universities of Oxford and Cambridge (Statutes) (178); Turnpike Acts Continuance * (170); Patriotic Fund (183); Removal Terms (Scotland) (184); Customs (Officers) * (168).

Committee—Report—British Honduras (Court of Appeal) * (167); Pedlars (Certificates) * (163); Metallic Mines (Gunpowder) * (169); Seed Supply and other Acts (Ireland) Amendment * (177).

Report—Universities (Scotland) Registration of Parliamentary Voters, &c. * (173).

Third Reading—Coroners (Ireland) * (134); Reformatory Institutions (Ireland) * (172), and passed.

Withdrawn—Cottiers and Cottars (Dwellings) (174).

COTTIERS AND COTTARS (DWELLINGS)
BILL.—(No. 174.)

(The Lord Waveney.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD WAVENEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, that after the statement he had made on the introduction of the Bill he need say but little; but there were misunderstandings which he desired to clear up as to the object of the measure. His main object was, if possible, to bring the agricultural classes into accord with the habits and civilization of the period, for it appeared to him that in certain important particulars those classes had not as yet attained that level. Something had been done in that direction by the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, and subsequently by the Public Health (Ireland) Act; but the principle of action in past legislation was wanting in prompt-titude and efficiency. He had no desire to interfere in any way with the forward march of the Bill which now engaged the attention of the other House, and which, in a few days, might be expected to reach their Lordships' hands. There was some disappointment that that proposal, as originally brought forward, made no mention of the labourers of Ireland; but the claims of that class had, he was happy to say, since been recognized, though only to the extent of such provision as might benefit the agricultural labourers through the operation of fiscal laws and regulations. He could not help seeing that much might be done for the advantage of dwellers in cottages by reasonable supervision of a more direct and prompt character than that which at present existed. It had been suggested that his proposal would, if carried, involve an expense which no landlord could be expected to bear; but that was not part of his intention, and he did not admit that it would be the consequence of the measure. In parts of Ireland the agricultural classes had enjoyed comfortable accommodation; but even in those cases there was a deplorable ignorance of sanitary conditions. The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, which extended universally to the rural districts of England and to certain urban and rural districts in Ireland, provided, in some degree, a remedy for that state of things; but no equivalent provision had been made for Scotland, and where the Act did apply the remedies were always slow, and, in some cases, impossible of application. He had made it his business to inform himself on the spot as to the views of the local Boards of Health or Sanitary Boards, which would have the administration of the provisions of the Bill; and he found that their opinion was, that a power should be called into action which would represent the decisions of the Sanitary Board. He, therefore, provided in his Bill that the dwellings of persons paying rent for occupation in Ireland, and the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, should be submitted to periodical inspection by an officer to be appointed by the Poor Law Commissioners in Ireland, and the Board of Supervision in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Under Section 150 of the Public Health Act the duties of the Board of Guardians, in regard to the spread of epidemic only, became active and pressing after the rules and regulations of the Local Government Board had been received. He proposed that the power for the cleansing of unhealthy dwellings and the carrying out of proper sanitary arrangements should be exercised through a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, but subject to an appeal to the Courts of Session. As a desire was manifesting itself in an extraordinary way for assimilating Irish and English law, a hint, perhaps, might be taken from the working of the Local Sanitary Board of England. In the district in which he lived cottages were condemned without reservation, and remained uninhabited, as there was no power to compel rebuilding; but, as a matter of public policy, it was not desirable that in Ireland the house accommodation should be diminished. The multiplicity of families and the overcrowding of the accommodation in the Irish cottages were constant sources of complaint, and additional accommodation was not provided, because the occupiers were unable to pay such a rent as would remunerate the landlord for the outlay. He would suggest that a better rent would be obtainable if garden allotments were attached to the dwellings. In some cases he gave to Boards of Guardians power to spend money in the rebuilding of cottages; and though he admitted it was not consistent with public policy to give to those bodies the initiatory power of expenditure, still he thought there were cases in which the strict rule might be overstepped. The Poor Law system, which was originally adopted for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of poverty in the land, the requisite sum necessary to relieve it, and the most efficient modes by which that relief might be applied, had become a machine of a larger character, performing a great variety of functions, and therefore it was that he did not hesitate to impose upon it additional duties provided for by this Bill. With regard to Scotland he could not fail to remember what he had seen and read of the sad poverty, notwithstanding the exertions of the proprietors, which prevailed in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, resulting from the small croft system. He hoped their Lordships would reject the idea that this was class legislation, and allow the Bill to be read a second time; because he believed, considering the great attention now being paid to the agricultural community, that it would confer a great boon upon them.

Lord Waveney

Moved "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Waveney.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that but for the gravity and solemnity of the noble Lord he should have thought that this proposal was intended as a practical joke. He listened very attentively to the noble Lord's speech the other day in introducing the Bill; but he could not for the life of him make head or tail of anything the noble Lord said as indicating what the measure was to be. The noble Lord said something about the cottiers of the Highlands of Scotland, whose condition, the noble Lord said, was analogous to the cottagers of the very poorest parts of Ireland; but he really had not the slightest conception of what the noble Lord intended to do. In the first place, he must say that the attempt to combine the provisions for Ireland and Scotland was in itself ridiculous. In point of fact, the circumstances of the two countries were quite different. He gathered from the observations which the noble Lord had made that he had obtained his information on this subject entirely from some observations of Sir John McNeil, which were 25 years old, and from the report of a newspaper commissioner sent out to make inquiries on the subject. The object of this measure professed to be to prevent epidemic diseases by compelling proper sanitary arrangements to be provided in cottages; but he did not believe that, except in times of famine, epidemics were prevalent amongst the cottier population. It was well known that the cottiers of Ireland were a most healthy class of people. In the Bill there was provision for large powers being given to the sanitary authorities of Unions and parishes. That, however, must refer to Ireland alone, as it was absolutely absurd to have such a provision for Scotland, as there were no unions or parishes, except for the purpose of building poorhouses, and it was absolutely absurd to put that in the Bill. He asked their Lordships to look at the powers which the Bill proposed to give to sanitary authorities. They were to have the power to compel the carrying out of proper sanitary arrangements in any cottage or number of cottages which they might consider to be unfit for human habitation; and what were the sanitary authorities to be authorized to do? They were not authorized to compel the person who lived in the cottage to keep it clean, but were authorized to go to the proprietor and compel him to remedy the barbarous mode of living of the people.

LORD WAVENEY: The immediate lessor.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it was the same thing. There was no power to go to the tenant and force him to clean his own house. The noble Lord said he wanted to bring the cottiers of the Highlands of Scotland and of Ireland into accord with the civilization of the day; but if the noble Lord confined the operation of the Bill to Kerry and Connaught, he thought the noble Lord would find that he had a very severe task to achieve. Anyone who had seen estates in the West of Ireland knew very well that disease there arose from the almost bestial habits of the people. There was frequently a dung-heap just outside the door, and the pigs often lived inside the house, and yet the Bill did not propose to compel the occupier to keep his house clean. All the Bill said was that the sanitary authorities should go to the landlord and tell him to do it. He did not think that that was a proper way of curing the habits of a large population. Then it was proposed by the Bill to give the sanitary authorities the power of ordering the rebuilding of cottages of an equivalent character in cases where there were not proper sanitary arrangements—that was to say, that a landlord should be bound to rebuild every cottage upon his estate. He had gone into a calculation of what the expense of this would be, and he had a case before him of an individual proprietor, the particulars of whose estate would be brought before Her Majesty's Commissioners. On that estate there were not less than something like 4,000 of these poor cottier tenantry, all of them under £8 valuation, and most of them under £4. Now, under this Bill, the sanitary authorities would have the power to call upon the landlord to rebuild every one of those cottages. What would that cost? Professor Baldwin had said that cottages with every decency of life could be built for £13 or £14 each. He could only say that he wished Professor Baldwin would come to Scotland and teach the landlords there how titude and efficiency. He had no desire to interfere in any way with the forward march of the Bill which now engaged the attention of the other House, and which, in a few days, might be expected to reach their Lordships' hands. There was some disappointment that that proposal, as originally brought forward, made no mention of the labourers of Ireland; but the claims of that class had, he was happy to say, since been recognized, though only to the extent of such provision as might benefit the agricultural labourers through the operation of fiscal laws and regulations. He could not help seeing that much might be done for the advantage of dwellers in cottages by reasonable supervision of a more direct and prompt character than that which at present existed. It had been suggested that his proposal would, if carried, involve an expense which no landlord could be expected to bear; but that was not part of his intention, and he did not admit that it would be the consequence of the measure. In parts of Ireland the agricultural classes had enjoyed comfortable accommodation; but even in those cases there was a deplorable ignorance of sanitary conditions. The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, which extended universally to the rural districts of England and to certain urban and rural districts in Ireland, provided, in some degree, a remedy for that state of things; but no equivalent provision had been made for Scotland, and where the Act did apply the remedies were always slow, and, in some cases, impossible of application. He had made it his business to inform himself on the spot as to the views of the local Boards of Health or Sanitary Boards, which would have the administration of the provisions of the Bill; and he found that their opinion was, that a power should be called into action which would represent the decisions of the Sanitary Board. He, therefore, provided in his Bill that the dwellings of persons paying rent for occupation in Ireland, and the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, should be submitted to periodical inspection by an officer to be appointed by the Poor Law Commissioners in Ireland, and the Board of Supervision in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Under Section 160 of the Public Health Act the duties of the Board of Health in regard to the

Lord Warr

became active and pressing after the rules and regulations of the Local Government Board had been received. He proposed that the power for the cleansing of unhealthy dwellings and the carrying out of proper sanitary arrangements should be exercised through a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, but subject to an appeal to the Courts of Session. As a desire was manifesting itself in an extraordinary way for assimilating Irish and English law, a hint, perhaps, might be taken from the working of the Local Sanitary Board of England. In the district in which he lived cottages were condemned without reservation, and remained uninhabited, as there was no power to compel rebuilding; but, as a matter of public policy, it was not desirable that in Ireland the house accommodation should be diminished. The multiplicity of families and the overcrowding of the accommodation in the Irish cottages were constant sources of complaint, and additional accommodation was not provided, because the occupiers were unable to pay such a rent as would remunerate the landlord for the outlay. He would suggest that a better rent would be obtainable if garden allotments were attached to the dwellings. In some cases he gave to Boards of Guardians power to spend money in the rebuilding of cottages; and though he admitted it was not consistent with public policy to give to those bodies the initiatory power of expenditure, still he thought there were cases in which the strict rule might be overstepped. The Poor Law system, which was originally adopted for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of poverty in the land, the requisite sum necessary to relieve it, and the most efficient modes by which that relief might be applied, had become a machine of a larger character, performing a great variety of functions, and therefore it was that he did not hesitate to impose upon it additional duties provided for in the Bill. With regard to the Bill, he did not fail to being paid to the agricultural community, that it would confer a great boon upon them.

“That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
Lord Waverley.)

DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that but for the gravity and solemnity of the Lord he should have thought that the proposal was intended as a practical

He listened very attentively to the noble Lord's speech the other day in discussing the Bill; but he could not for the life of him make head or tail of anything the noble Lord said as indicating the measure was to be. The noble Lord said something about the cottiers of the Highlands of Scotland, whose position, the noble Lord said, was analogous to the cottagers of the very best parts of Ireland; but he really got the slightest conception of what the noble Lord intended to do. In the place, he must say that the attempt to combine the provisions for Ireland and Scotland was in itself ridiculous. In fact, the circumstances of the countries were quite different. He read from the observations which the noble Lord had made that he had received his information on this subject chiefly from some observations of Sir McNeil, which were 25 years old, from the report of a newspaper publisher sent out to make inquiries on the subject. The object of this measure was to prevent epidemics by compelling proper sanitary arrangements to be provided in cottages; he did not believe that, except in the case of famine, epidemics were prevalent amongst the cottier population. It was known that the cottiers of Ireland were a most healthy class of people. All there was provision for large sums being given to the sanitary authorities of Unions and parishes. That, he must refer to Ireland also.

He did not believe that, except in the case of famine, epidemics were prevalent amongst the cottier population. It was known that the cottiers of Ireland were a most healthy class of people. All there was provision for large sums being given to the sanitary authorities of Unions and parishes. That, he must refer to Ireland also.

habitation; and what were the sanitary authorities to be authorized to do? They were not authorized to compel the person who lived in the cottage to keep it clean, but were authorized to go to the proprietor and compel him to remedy the barbarous mode of living of the people.

LORD WAVENEY: The immediate lessor.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it was the same thing. There was no power to go to the tenant and force him to clean his own house. The noble Lord said he wanted to bring the cottiers of the Highlands of Scotland and of Ireland into accord with the civilization of the day; but if the noble Lord confined the operation of the Bill to Kerry and Connaught, he thought the noble Lord would find that he had a very severe task to achieve. Anyone who had seen estates in the West of Ireland knew very well that disease there arose from the almost bestial habits of the people. There was frequently a dung-heap just outside the door, and the pigs often lived inside the house, and yet the Bill did not propose to compel the occupier to keep his house clean. All the Bill said was that the sanitary authorities should go to the landlord and tell him to do it. He did not think that that was a proper way of curing the habits of a large population. Then it was proposed by the Bill to give the sanitary authorities the power of ordering the rebuilding of cottages of an equivalent character in cases where there were not proper sanitary arrangements—that was to say, that a landlord should be bound to rebuild every cottage upon his estate. He had gone into a calculation of what the expense of this would be, and he had a case before him of an individual proprietor, the particulars of whose estate would be brought before Her Majesty's Commissioners. On that estate there were not less than something like 4,000 of these poor cottier tenantry, all of them under £8 valuation, and most of them under £4. Now, under this Bill, the sanitary authorities would have the power to call upon the landlord to rebuild every one of those cottages. What would be the result? Professor Baldwin had said that cottages with every decency of arrangement could be built for £13 or £14. He did only say that he wished Professor Baldwin would come to Scotland and see the landlords there how to build cottages at that price. But, assuming that cottages in Ireland containing everything that, according to the Irish idea, was requisite for the decencies of life, could be built for £14 each, the owner of the estate he had mentioned might be called upon to expend £56,000 upon his estate, and that, too, at a moment when the landlords were about to be deprived of the power of managing their property, and the tenants were to have the right of selling the cottages that had been built for them. This was the proposition of a noble Peer, and made to their Lordships with a grave face. He did not himself believe that cottages could be built for £14 each. He had asked some Irish authorities their opinion on the subject, and he was informed that the lowest would be between £50 and £60 each. If the landlord refused to build, the local authority might do so out of the poor rate, and any profit arising might go to the relief of the poor. He thought he had said enough to their Lordships to show this was the most impracticable scheme ever presented to any Parliament, and presented at the moment when they were about to consider, and very likely to nearly abolish, all powers of the landlord. The noble Lord could not expect to pass the measure this Session; but, as a matter of form, he would move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the motion ("this day three months.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he rather took exception to the Bill of the noble Lord on the ground that it did not go far enough. The noble Lord was a timid reformer. By one portion of the measure it was proposed that large powers should be vested in the local authorities to charge the poor rate for the improvement of dwellings wherever defects were found to exist in their sanitary arrangements. He ventured to point out that not far from where they were sitting, in great streets and squares, there could be found many houses defective in sanitary arrangements; and he dared say in Belgrave and Eaton Squares, and many other fashionable parts of London, there would be found houses so defective. He hoped the noble Lord would not confine the Bill to the poor, but would give the rich the benefit of it, and force the Duke of Westminster to rebuild any of his houses found defective in sanitary arrangements.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he should oppose the Bill. With regard to Scotland, it proposed to set in motion sanitary inspectors, who in England were often the greatest nuisances. Those officials would be sure to object to the box beds with sliding doors in use in some parts of the Highlands, on the ground that they were stuffy. The size and strength of the Highland population showed that they did not require the interference of nuisance inspectors. As to Ireland, he knew a case of an Irish landlord who wished to improve the cottages on his estate, and built them of two stories. They had, however, not been working long when the clerk of the works ran away because his life was threatened, and the architect was not sorry when he also was able to get away from the place.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, this question of the condition of labourers' cottages in Ireland was, in the opinion of the Government, a very serious matter indeed. While heartily sympathizing with the objects of the noble Lord, he agreed with others who had spoken that the Bill was a most startling one, inasmuch as its results apparently would be to make it the duty of Boards of Guardians in Ireland to rebuild all the cabins of that country. If any legislation on this subject was to be undertaken it would require a great deal of consideration and careful handling of details, such as it would be impossible for the Government or the House to give to it in the present Session. He trusted, therefore, that the Motion for the second reading of the Bill would not be pressed.

LORD W A V E N E Y said, that although the criticisms the Bill had received had been very severe, he did not admit that they were difficult to answer; but, on the contrary, believed facts would show many of the objections would be wholly without foundation. He might say that he had no intention of bringing forward again the proposals contained in this Bill as an index to the Land Bill now before the House of Commons. The subject had been discussed; and as he did not wish to be the means of giving rise to an impression that there was a difference of opinion among their Lordships in regard to the desirability of legislation for the improvement of dwellings of agricultural labourers in Ireland and Scotland, he begged to withdraw the Motion for the second reading.

The Duke of Argyll

Amendment and original motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

METROPOLITAN OPEN SPACES ACT
(1877) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Mount Temple.)

(NO. 164) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MOUNT TEMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its object was to enable certain trustees and others, owners of inclosed grounds in the Metropolis, to enter into arrangements with public bodies to throw them open for the recreation of the people.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Mount Temple.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE (STATUTES) BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 178.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL SPENCER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that in 1877 the Universities Act established the Universities Committee of the Privy Council, whose duty it was to consider any opposed statute framed by the University Commissioners of Oxford and Cambridge, and, if such a statute should require amendment, to return it to the Commission for alteration. The powers of the Commission, unless they were renewed, would cease this year; and, consequently, there would be no means of amending opposed statutes framed by the Commissioners. The Bill now before their Lordships was intended to remedy this inconvenience. It would give the Universities Committee of the Privy Council the same power of revision as was now possessed by the Commission itself. The revising powers of the Committee would be confined to statutes that were appealed against, either through the Queen in Council or by an Address from either House of Parliament. It would also have the power to revise any statute which might be consequentially affected by the amendment of another statute. He thought sufficient ground for the Bill would be furnished in the fact that out of 100 statutes framed by the Oxford Commission, and 25 by the Cambridge, only two had been finally approved down to the present time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord President.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

PATRIOTIC FUND BILL.—(No. 183.)

(The Earl of Northbrook.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the necessity for the measure was explained in the last Report of the Commissioners of the fund, which showed that although a surplus was shown on the face of the statements of assets and liabilities at the end of 1879, certain liabilities had not been taken into account, for which it was necessary to make provision. When the Report came into the hands of the Secretary of State for War communications were entered into with the Commissioners, and the result was the Bill now before their Lordships. Being, no doubt, desirous to extend the benefits of the fund as widely as possible, the Commissioners had undertaken more than they were justified in undertaking from a pecuniary point of view. They had, therefore, been obliged to consider which of their benevolent projects must be sacrificed. After communication with the Admiralty and the War Office, it appeared to the Commissioners impossible to continue the boys' school at Wandsworth; and, accordingly, the school would be sold, and the proceeds would be used in aid of the general assets of the fund. The Commissioners had also decided to make considerable reductions in their office expenses, hoping, by that course, to relieve themselves of liabilities to the extent of some £20,000. Such changes, in fact, would be made as would result in the solvency of the fund. Probably there would be a surplus, and, if so, it would be treated as a fund for the relief of the widows and children of officers and men of the Army, Navy, and Royal Marines, who might have lost their lives in war, or by accident or disease contracted in the Service. The Bill empowered the Commissioners to sell the school at Wandsworth, and authorized the use of any surplus funds for the purposes which he had explained.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Northbrook.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET enumerated the names of the eminent men who served on the Commission when first appointed, and reminded their Lordships that the Commissioners appointed a Financial and Executive Committee. The embarrassments of the fund had arisen, in a great measure, from the original Commission itself, which left a great deal to its Secretary, who was once or twice reprimanded by the Commissioners. In the year 1865, when he (the Duke of Somerset) was at the Admiralty, the matter came before him; and, considering that the affairs of the Commission had been again mismanaged, he moved that the Secretary be dismissed. The Commissioners did eventually dismiss the Secretary, but gave him a pension of £300 a-year. He (the Duke of Somerset) then said he would not remain on the Commission, and he left it. One error was in starting the boys' school, 200 boys instead of 100, for which there were not sufficient funds. He thought the present Bill would be efficient for its purpose and useful. There was a common misapprehension that only the income of the fund ought to be spent; but that was not the original intention. It was provided, in the first instance, for the widows and children of those who had fallen in the Crimean War, and it was expected that principal and income would have been distributed in the course of a few years.

EARL NELSON said, that, as he had been a Member of the Executive Committee since last August, he wished to combat certain misrepresentations which had been spread abroad. That Committee was composed of honourable men, although their work did not come much before the public. They were men who had served the State in the Army and the Navy, or as Inspectors of schools, or who were members of the Legal Profession. A great deal of the work had been prepared and decided by the previous Commission. He agreed that the Commission had made a mistake in enlarging the boys' school. The sum originally set apart to accumulate for the boys' school only contemplated an endowment for 100 boys. But, though it was a sanguine estimate to think that there were funds enough to endow such a school for 200, the decision had not been come to without careful consideration and an able Report. A great deal had been said about the expenses of the office; but the estimate of the expenditure under this head did not exceed £5 per cent of the fund they had to administer. The old Commissioners had found it necessary to keep up the school by filling up the vacancies from children of soldiers who were not at the Crimean War; but that was necessary till more fitting cases occurred, and as the regular vacancies were from 30 to 40 every year it was easy to meet fresh cases. He pointed out that several children of those killed in the late wars in Afghanistan and South Africa and from the Captain and Eurydice accidents had been admitted to the school or had been offered vacancies. The general statement which had gone abroad was that the Royal Commissioners, about this time last year, left the fund in a great deficit—something like £150,000—and really knew nothing about it. This deficit was classed under four different headings. The first sum was £60,000. That was reckoned as a debt, when it really was a capital sum which would be required efficiently to endow a boys' school; but they were in no sense bound to let the interest of the original endowment accumulate, and they were at liberty to devote this interest to the support of the school whenever they chose to do so. The next item was a sum of £32,000 for an extra allowance of 2s. a-week to unmarried widows after attaining the age of 60; but the arrangement with regard to it was merely tentative. Instead of being a debt of £32,000, it represented an expenditure of £1,000 a-year, which they had taken care could not be increased, and would be decreased as the widows died out. Another item was £25,000 for a convalescent home at Margate; but this again was only a temporary arrangement, and they were able to close the school, and so they wiped out the charge altogether within six months. There was another charge of £35,000, which they had set apart for the education of Roman Catholic children. They acknowledged that to be a debt, and the only way to meet it was from the endowment and the closing of the boys' school altogether. He maintained that the charge in connection with the expenses of the office, and the other charges made against the Commissioners, were founded upon imperfect knowledge. He would only add that he heartily accepted the Bill; indeed, the Royal Commissioners had been continually asking for their numbers to be filled up, and in their last Report had specially pointed out the desirability of having the girls' school managed by a Governing Body of its own. And since last August the House Committee had had enlarged powers with that object, an arrangement which had operated well.

The Earl of Northbrook

LORD WAVENEY said, he had no fault to find with the Bill, particularly with the Preamble, which stated that the Patriotic Fund had been administered in accordance with the Commission from Her Majesty. Whatever there might have been of excess, there had been no shortcomings, and the confidence placed in the Commissioners was justified. There were many circumstances which required careful consideration and handling when they had to deal with the claims of rival religious denominations. He was sorry Lord Howard of Glossop was not present. That noble Lord was always foremost in urging the claims of his co-religionists, and he could tell their Lordships that every suspicion of unfairness was guarded against. He himself now stood alone of all who were the Members of the first Committee. They who commenced the work had passed away, and he might say they were men well known in the works of peace and war, and highly competent to carry on the management of such a fund. It was well that the public should remember that during the course of administration 3,789 widows of Crimean soldiers were supported out of the funds, and that 6,940 children of soldiers had been trained in the ways of improvement and education. Care had been taken that the fund should not be wasted on unworthy objects, and that worthy objects should not be refused the benefit of them. With regard to the boys' school, so far from the original intention being to make an extravagant establishment, it was of the roughest description.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Camperdown.)

(NO. 184.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the object of that Bill was to provide a more convenient term of entering upon, and removal from, land and heritages in any Parliamentary or police burgh. The Bill had received material alterations in its course through the other House; and if their Lordships would agree to the second reading, he would take care to bring up an Amendment on the third reading which would bring the Preamble into greater harmony with the provisions of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD WATSON said, he admitted that at present there was some inconvenience felt in Scotland owing to the customary terms of entry and removal not being coincident with the legal terms; and that Bill was endeavouring, therefore, to deal with a difficult question. At present the legal terms were the 15th of May and 11th of November; but in different parts of the country neither of those dates coincided with the customary terms, and the result was that a tenant leaving a house or farm in one district could not enter into possession of a new house or farm in another district without some loss of time. The scope of the Bill was limited to police, Royal, or Parliamentary burghs; but, in point of fact, the limits intended to be covered by the Royal, Parliamentary, or police boundary would not cover all houses, and the consequence would be that a large portion of the difficulty would still remain to be dealt with. He also objected to the time of notice given in the case of a four months' letting, the result of which might be that a man who went into a house in February could not be turned out in May. He thought it was very dangerous to deal with this matter piecemeal, and he would ask the noble Earl whether it was worth while going further with a Bill of this nature; whether it would not be advisable to withdraw the present Bill, and bring forward a more extended one next Session?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in reply, said, he had not failed to regard the objections. He thought it was a question it was desirable to bring before Parliament; but at that late period of the Session he must say if the noble and learned Lord would not persist in his objection to the second reading, he would consult with those who were responsible for the measure, and see if it was advisable to proceed further with it now.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 28th July, 1881.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Contagious Diseases Acts [No. 351].
SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.
PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, Amendment [226].
Committee—Report—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Amendment [216].
Considered as amended—Land Law (Ireland) [225]; Public Works Loans * [211].
Withdrawn—Lunacy Law Amendment (re-comm.) [192]; Poor Removal (Ireland) * [89].

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS—THE PARKS—COST OF WATERING HYDE, ST. JAMES'S, AND THE GREEN PARKS.

Mr. LOWTHER asked the First Commissioner of Works, What is the amount paid annually to Messrs. Mead and Company for watering Rotten Row; and, whether there can be furnished to the House a detailed copy of the contract with that firm for the performance of this duty, including when such contract was made, and the duration of the contract?

Lord Watson

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that the contract for watering Hyde, St. James's, and the Green Parks for the present year was £790. The contract was only taken for a year, and was open to competition.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF ARMY OFFICERS.

MAJOR GENERAL BURNABY, who read his Question in full, amid considerable interruption, asked the Secretary of State for War, If the following statement is substantially correct, viz. :—

"Many Colonels have asked the Secretary of State for War to define their exact position and income on compulsory retirement, inasmuch as they wish to understand at once, whether it is better for them to hold office and appointment up to the latest date offered, or to retire on their 50th birthday. The only reply, so far, has been that on their compulsory retirement they will be informed of the amount of pension, &c. which will be granted;"

and, if he can state to the House what will be the exact financial position of such of those officers who held saleable commissions on the 1st of November 1871, when their time comes for compulsory retirement from their Regiment or from the Army?

Mr. CHILDERS: Sir, I am sorry the hon. and gallant Gentleman should have taken the trouble to read his Question. It is one of a very ordinary character, and appears in full on the Paper. In reply to the first part of the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I have to say that the paragraph in the newspaper which he has quoted does not state the whole case. Any colonel, who may either retire at once or wait until he is compulsorily retired, can ascertain exactly the retired pay he can now get, and the formula for calculating the rate of compulsorily retired pay; but it may be impossible in many cases to calculate now the exact amount of the latter, which will depend on the circumstances at the time of his retirement with reference to non-employment, and also to the prospects of reaching the major-general's list. I have given instructions that all the information possible may be given to colonels who apply, to assist them in making their election. As to the second part of the hon. and gallant Member's Question, I can only say that the exact position of colonels on retirement is clearly defined in Articles 972 and 978 of the new Warrant. No rights under the Act of 1871 are affected in any way.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE SPANISH CUSTOM HOUSE.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, since the accession of the Sagasta Cabinet to power in Spain, any fresh representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government as to the system under which enormous fines are imposed by the local custom-houses in cases of errors, however trivial, in ships' papers; and, if so, with what result?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, on the 24th of February last, Mr. West inclosed a copy of a Note from the new Minister of State, stating that the representations which Her Majesty's Minister had made to the late Spanish Government on the subject had been referred to the proper Department; and the tone of that Note was such as to lead to the hope that some satisfactory arrangement might ultimately be come to. In several recent cases fines imposed by the local authorities have been remitted by the Spanish Government. This subject will be dealt with in the course of any commercial negotiations between Great Britain and Spain.

IRELAND—LOANS, &c.—THE RETURN.

MR. LOWTHER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When a Return, ordered on the 12th February 1880,

"Of all moneys charged on the Consolidated Fund, or voted by Parliament, or advanced out of the Consolidated Fund or Public Revenues since the Union, to or for the benefit of Ireland, distinguishing what sums have been given and what sums have been lent, and how much of the money lent has been repaid and how much forgiven, and what remains due,"

will be given to the House?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, as I have already stated in a reply to a Question from the hon. Member, the Return is one which involves a great amount of labour in its preparation, and the terms of the Order are so wide as to leave much discretion to those who have to prepare the figures. I regret that, owing to the pressure of work during the Session, the Return has not yet been completed. I hope, however, to be able to present it before the House rises, so that it may be distributed during the Recess.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the county and sub-inspectors of the Londonderry Royal Irish Constabulary force do not receive the same pay and allowances as the officers in the same position at Belfast, though the Act 37 and 38 Vic. c. 80, s. 8, places both towns on the same footing as regards requiring extra expense on the force; whether the ordinary constables of both forces do not receive the same amount of extra pay; and, whether a recommendation in favour of the increase of pay of Londonderry officers was not made by the late and present Inspector General?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Royal Irish Constabulary of Belfast and Londonderry were appointed under similar Acts of Parliament as regarded pay and allowances, and the duties of both forces were precisely similar. The men of Belfast and Londonderry received the same rates of extra pay and allowances; but the officers of Londonderry did not receive the special allowances which had been granted to the officers in Belfast. The late and the present Inspector General had made recommendations in favour of the increase of pay of the officers quartered in Londonderry, and those recommendations had been forwarded to the Treasury. He must refer the hon. Member to the Treasury for any further answer.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRESCRIBING THE CITY OF WATERFORD.

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the charge of Lord Justice Deasy.

whether Mr. Kelly, when the late Arms Act came into force, delivered up his gun to the police, and in every way complied with the requirements of the Law; whether Mr. Paul said he could not grant him (Kelly) a licence unless he was recommended by two local magistrates, and on its being pointed out to him that there was only one local magistrate in Mr. Kelly's district, and as he was not acquainted with him, he would not therefore recommend him, Mr. Paul then said that he should get a recommendation from the Chief Constable; whether the Chief Constable, on being asked if he knew of any reason why Mr. Kelly should not have a gun, replied that he did not know of anything against his character, but that he would not recommend him; whether he is aware that, in consequence of Mr. Kelly not having his gun, he will lose a considerable part of his crop, as there is a rookery within a quarter of a mile of his farm; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the necessity of the application, and give instructions to the local authorities to grant him a licence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was true that that John Kelly, of Currowinna, Ballinasloe, had been refused a gun licence by Mr. Paul, the resident magistrate of his district. His application was opposed by the parish priest of the district and the Constabulary. Two local magistrates who were on the bench declined to recommend him; and the licensing officer consequently declined, on his own responsibility, to grant him a licence, and he (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not intend to interfere with his discretion.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MICHAEL DONOVAN, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT.

MR. DALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that on July 14th Mr. Michael Donovan, of Grenagh, near the city of Cork, was arrested at Blarney, Cork, under a warrant charging him "With having been guilty as accessory of a crime punishable by law, that is to say, unlawfully assembling with others by night, and maliciously assaulting dwelling-houses;"

Mr. Parnell

whether he is aware that the aforesaid Mr. Donovan is a man of nearly sixty years of age, with a large family dependent upon him, and is one of the most extensive farmers in the vicinity; whether he has inquired whether the alleged charge against Mr. Donovan is accurate, and that it does not arise from vindictiveness; whether his attention has been called to Mr. Justice Lawson's words, at the Summer Assizes held at Cork on July 21st, in addressing the Grand Jury of the City of Cork:—

"The best address that a Judge can make to a Grand Jury on an occasion like the present, is when he has very little to say, which I am glad to say is my condition on the present occasion. Your business is almost nil. Two cases stand over from last assizes, and one very small one is to be sent before you which constitute the entire criminal business for these assizes of the City of Cork;"

and, whether, in face of the state of things deposed to by Mr. Justice Lawson, he still maintains the necessity of continuing to deprive the citizens of Cork of their constitutional liberties?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the ground of the arrest of Michael Donovan at Blarney, County Cork, was correctly stated in the Question to be "assembling with others by night and maliciously assaulting dwelling-houses." Donovan was 55 years of age, and had a large family depending upon him; but he was a well-to-do farmer. The Government were satisfied of the reasonableness of the suspicion against him before deciding on his arrest. With reference to the Charge of Judge Lawson to the Grand Jury of Cork City, he should observe that his Lordship's remarks on the absence of criminal business were considerably modified by the statement that the Recorder had a short time before tried nearly all the prisoners in custody.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CUMULATIVE SENTENCES.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Hodnett, junior, has been found guilty, at the Petty Sessions, by Mr. Plunkett, the stipendiary magistrate, of six different offences committed in connection with the attempted rescue of Mr. Mahony, and sentenced for each offence to a month's imprisonment, making six months altogether; whether one of the results of this cumulative sentence will be that Mr. Hodnett will have to sleep on a plank bed during the whole period of these six months; and, whether he approves of the infliction of cumulative sentences of imprisonment by Courts of Petty Sessions in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. Hodnett, junior, on the 4th June, was the leader of a riotous mob at Clonakilty which rescued Mr. O'Mahony from the police, he having been arrested under the Coercion Act. Hodnett was convicted at the petty sessions on the 1st July for assaulting two constables on that occasion, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for each assault. The police were again attacked on the 7th June by a mob, led by Hodnett, and he was convicted of assaulting four constables on that occasion, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for each assault. The effect of the sentence was that he would have to sleep on a plank bed for one month out of the six months only. It was not his (Mr. Forster's) business to approve or disapprove of these sentences, as the magistrates acted legally, and he could not review their decisions.

MR. PARNELL asked who had the authority to review them?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, and the Queen in England; but they only interfered in very rare cases.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF MARGARET COLEMAN.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the period for which Mr. Clifford Lloyd originally committed the woman Margaret Coleman to prison in default of finding bail?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Margaret Coleman was ordered to find two sureties in £10, and herself in £20, to be of good behaviour for six months. The order was made out at petty sessions and was legal. In default, she was actually imprisoned from the 28th June to the 8th of July, when she was released on bail.

MR. PARNELL asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the order was a legal one, being made out of petty sessions, and as having been passed by one magistrate only?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, it was quite legal.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TEACHERS' PENSIONS.

MR. BORLASE (for Mr. LYULPH STANLEY) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in consideration of the inadequacy of the sum now voted by Parliament for Teachers' Pensions, under Art. 118 of the Education Code, and the consequent distress among the older teachers, who entered upon their duties between 1846 and 1862 in the hope of retiring pensions, under the then existing Minutes of Council, the Government are prepared to recommend a larger vote than the present sum of £6,500 per annum; and, if so, to what extent?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I should personally be very glad to be relieved of an anxious and painful duty in awarding pensions to a limited number of teachers out of the large number who annually apply for assistance from a fund which is totally inadequate. But, after the Report made to this House by Mr. Whitwell's Committee in 1872, I feel that I should not be warranted in holding out hopes that the Government will be able to increase the present Vote. I will promise, however, that during the Recess the whole question shall receive very careful consideration.

NAVY—THE COASTGUARD SERVICE.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he would state whether Coastguard Boatmen of good character whose pay was less than £120 a year, and who were compelled to retire because of the reorganisation of their department and abolition of office, are or are not equally entitled to compensation for loss of office under the Superannuation Act of 1859 with the higher paid servants of the same department?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the Treasury had always laid down a distinction between public servants paid by salary and those paid by daily wages. They granted compensation on the abolition of office to the salaried class, and not to those who were paid by daily wages. He did not think there was the slightest chance that the Treasury would reconsider their policy, for which, he thought, there were good and obvious reasons.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—HOSPITAL QUARTERMASTERS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the Director General of the Army Medical Department represented to the authorities that the title of Hospital Quartermaster is most distasteful to the officers of the Army Hospital Corps, and recommended its abolition or withdrawal; whether he is aware that very many officers of the Army Hospital Corps, not only prefer their present titles as Captains and Lieutenants of Orderlies of the Army Hospital Corps, even though remaining such entails remaining on their old rate of pay and pension, but that they have petitioned the authorities to this effect; whether, if he is unaware of these facts, he will inquire why these representations have not been submitted to him; and, whether, meanwhile, he will order that no officer of the Army Hospital Corps shall be gazetted Hospital Quartermaster pending further inquiry?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that the Director General of the Army Medical Department is himself "one of the authorities" at the War Office with whom I am in constant confidential communication, and that I must decline to state what advice he may from time to time give to me. I must, at the same time, beg the hon. Member not to assume from this answer that his Question is well founded. As to the second part of the Question, I find that two of these officers who belonged to the old class of apothecaries, and one lieutenant of orderlies, have applied to retain their former titles and conditions of service. These three applications have been received since my former answer to the hon. Member, and have been submitted to me in due course. I have not yet decided what action to take upon them. Other applications to retain the old title, but not the old emoluments, have been received; but I have no intention to entertain them. I do not propose to delay the gazetting of the hospital quartermasters.

Mr. Trevelyan

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT—THE HULME TRUST.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Vice President of the Council, What is the position of the scheme for the Hulme Trust?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I am glad to say that this important scheme has now passed through all its stages, and only awaits the next meeting of Council, when it will be submitted for Her Majesty's sanction. On receiving this it will become law.

POST OFFICE — POSTMASTERS— DISTRIBUTION OF WAR OFFICE CIRCULAR.

MR. BURT asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that all Postmasters are obliged to distribute papers and pamphlets showing the advantages of the Army, and inviting young men to apply to them for forms of application to enlist; and, if so, whether Postmasters are informed before their appointment that, in addition to the regular duties of their own office, they are to distribute papers of this description?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I have been asked by my right hon. Friend—who is compelled by indisposition to be absent—to answer this Question. Placards and circulars connected with the Army and other Government Departments have, on many occasions, been exhibited and distributed at post offices. The Post Office was asked last year by the War Office to have the notices referred to in the Question exhibited; but the arrangement only came into force on the 1st of this month. It is not thought that the exhibiting of a placard, and the handing of a small pamphlet across the counter, can appreciably increase the work of the postmasters. At any rate, I learn from my right hon. Friend that no complaints have reached the Post Office on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— TRIAL BY JURY.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the Report in the "Times" of 20th July of a case tried on the Munster Circuit by Judge Barry, which contains the following words:—

"The jury finally announced that there was no chance of their agreeing. Mr. Justice Barry—Well, I hear that with the deepest sorrow; indeed, I might safely say I hear it more in sorrow than in anger. I am sorry for the sake of the country that I have been so long associated with in various ways; I am sorry for the sake of trial by jury, an institution which I prize a great deal more than any of you on the jury can prize it. Let it be understood that the question which is submitted to you being absolutely conceded, and you being sworn on your oaths on the gospel of God to find a verdict according to the evidence, and that evidence not being impeached, the jury of the county of Cork have under the circumstances refused to agree to a verdict. Gentlemen, I have no option but to discharge you;"

and, whether he intends to take steps to remedy this state of affairs?

MR. HEALY wished to ask, before the question was answered, whether the Grand Jury at Sligo Assizes had thrown out the bills against Sub-Constables Donnelly and McKnight and a process server for murder, against Sub-Constable Hayes for manslaughter, and had found true bills against three peasants for riot; and, whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to take any steps to remedy this state of affairs?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), said, it was quite correct that "no bills" were found in the one case, and "true bills" in the other. In reply to the noble Viscount (Viscount Folkestone), there was no reason to doubt that Mr. Justice Barry had used the words attributed to him. But he need not tell the noble Viscount that the Irish Government had no power to control a jury one way or the other.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR — THE REPORTS.

MR. MACLIVER asked the Secretary of State for War, if he will lay upon the Table the Reports presented to him by the commanding officers at the recent review at Windsor of the Volunteers?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I may state that I have received the Report of the general commanding one of the two Army corps, but not the other. When the latter reaches me I will consider whether I can lay them both on the Table; but I do not anticipate any objection.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—CATTLE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Vice President of the Council, whether his attention has been called to the very serious and widespread outbreak of cattle plague in the Baltic provinces of Russia; and, whether every precaution has been taken against the possibility of its importation into this Country?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, no reports have been received of an unusual prevalence of cattle plague (rinderpest) in the Baltic Provinces of Russia. The disease has a constant existence in Russia, and, consequently, the importation of animals from that country is entirely prohibited. The importation of cattle from Germany and Belgium is also prohibited. Siberian plague, which is a form of anthrax, and quite distinct from Cattle Plague, is now prevalent in the Provinces of Novgorod, St. Petersburg, Dorpat, and Riga; but, considering that no animals can be introduced into this country from Russia, and no cattle from Germany and Belgium, there appears little or no probability of the introduction of any contagious cattle disease from Russia into this country.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS —THE BOSTON ELECTION.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it is the case that all the Crown prosecutions for bribery and corrupt practices at Boston have failed in consequence of the juries refusing to convict; and, if he proposes to take any further steps to vindicate the Law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he should take no further steps to vindicate the law, which, in this case, would take its course.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL — THE 42ND SECTION AND SECTION 24 OF THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, whether the repeal of section 24 of the Land Act of 1870 by the 42nd section of the Land Law Bill, in putting an end to the powers of the Court for Land Cases Reserved created by the former section and since merged by the Judicature Act in the Court of Appeal, ipso facto annuls the code of rules devised by that Court under section 31 of the said Act, and which form the machinery for the working of the whole of that Act; whether the repeal of section 24 involves the repeal of section 31; whether, if said rules will not continue in force, it is not desirable to make some provision for their revival; and, in case they should continue in force, what tribunal will in future have the power of rescinding, annulling, or adding to them, pursuant to the provisions of section 31 already referred to; and, whether it is not desirable to vest the powers created by section 31 in the Land Commission in future?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, the repeal of the section in question did not in any respect annul the Code of Rules made by the Court for Land Cases Reserved under Section 31 of the Land Act. The Rules would still remain in force. The authority for altering them would be the Court of Appeal. It was, however, under consideration whether it might not be convenient to transfer that power to the Land Commission.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), Whether it is his intention to proceed with his Motion with reference to the third reading of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, in reply, said, most certainly, if the opportunity arose; but he did not wish to interpose his Motion between that for the third reading and the Motion of which Notice had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to recommit the Bill. If that Motion was not made, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) would make his.

TURKEY (FINANCE, &c.) — TURKISH BONDHOLDERS.

MR. BUXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is within the cognizance and has the approval of Her Majesty's Government that a Member of this House is to proceed shortly to Constantinople in the interests and as the representative of Turkish Bondholders; and, whether the policy of Her Majesty's Government, with regard to the many questions still pending with the Porte as to reforms in Asia Minor and other matters of Imperial interest, will be in any way affected by this attempt to advance the interests of a special and limited class of speculators?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, no notification has been made to Her Majesty's Government, who have not offered any opinion on the matter. The policy of Her Majesty's Government will not be affected in any way.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. BOLTON asked the Prime Minister, If he can say whether the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill is likely to come on this Session; and, if so, at what time?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have, Sir, to apologize for asking more time yet in regard to this question; but if my hon. Friend will be kind enough to give me one or two days, I hope to be able to make a positive statement on the subject. It may be my duty on Monday to make a proposal to the House in regard to the course of Public Business, and I shall then state our intentions with reference to the Bill.

TRADE AND COMMERCE — TREATY ENGAGEMENTS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is in the power of the Government, without the sanction of Parliament, to enter into Treaty engagements with a Foreign State binding this Country for a certain term of years not to increase the duties on goods imported from such State into the United Kingdom; and, inasmuch as the engagements taken by this Country towards France in 1860 were sanctioned by Parliament in consideration of the Treaty engagements contracted by France towards this Country, and as the Treaty has been denounced by France, whether Her Majesty's Government will undertake not to enter into a renewal of our engagements towards France, or to accept any variation of the engagements of France towards this Country, without the sanction of Parliament?

Mr. Healy

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not believe, with regard to the first portion of the Question, that there are any absolute limits to the power of the Crown to bind the country; but, practically, it is the well-understood usage—and no Government, I apprehend, would depart from it—that where a question of our own fiscal arrangements, or a question of money is involved, invariably the jurisdiction of Parliament is reserved, and covenants of the Treaties are made conditional. That was the case in regard to the Treaty of 1860. Very important changes on our part in the Customs and Excise duties of the country were part of the stipulations of that Treaty, and, therefore, as a matter of course, it came before Parliament. The case is now different. It is quite evident that, under the present negotiations, if they should land us in a Treaty, as I hope may be the case, provided the terms are satisfactory, at the very least, the principal matter would really be the duties to be levied in France; and it is very doubtful whether any question relating to duties in this country would be involved. If it were to be so, the matter would, of course, have to be laid before Parliament. If it were not so, I am not sure that we could undertake in the terms here specified—

“Not to enter into a renewal of our engagements towards France, or to accept any variation of the engagements of France towards this country without the sanction of Parliament.”

I think that would be an engagement which is not supported by precedent, and which would be of inconvenient consequences. We are under great responsibility in this matter to be sure as to the ground under our feet—as to the state of public opinion, and the views of those interested and competent to judge. I do not believe we are likely to do wrong in that respect, or to go in advance of public opinion; but I do not think we can enter into any engagement in the matter at the present moment.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the object of his Question was this. In 1860 it was necessary that the Treaty should be laid before Parliament, inasmuch as the duties in England had to be lowered; but if an arrangement were now made with France that the existing duties should be retained for a certain number of years against new variations to be introduced into the French Tariff, it was perfectly plain that the conditions on which the Treaty of 1860 was based would be changed; and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if, in consequence of that change, he would lay the new Treaty before Parliament previous to its ratification?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is rather a nice question, Sir; but I am afraid I cannot enter into any engagement beyond what I have said. I think we have been very cautious not to proceed without ascertaining our ground, and we shall continue to be so.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to put a Question to the Prime Minister arising out of the proceedings of the House in 1860. In that year, the Treaty with France involved an alteration of existing duties. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the answer he had just given, with respect to reserving the functions of the House, was to be understood to extend to reserving the power of imposing duties, as well as of altering existing duties, in accordance with any agreement contemplated by the Government with France?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, as a matter of course, in a negotiation of this kind, if the power of Parliament was reserved, that reservation would preserve the power of Parliament intact and entire, either to lower, raise, or do anything else.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Prime Minister, what would be the course of Public Business to-morrow; whether he had in contemplation to make any exceptional proposal with regard to the Business of Supply, and what would be the order of the different Departments?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that with regard to the order of Supply, they would proceed with the Civil Service Votes to-morrow; presuming they were able to achieve the third reading of the Land Bill to-night, as they all seemed to hope, the Business would be Supply. He thought, perhaps, that that statement almost dispensed with the necessity at the present time for any further explanation.

SIR JOHN HAY asked, whether it was the intention of the Government to take the 27 Votes of the Army Estimates, or the four Votes of the Navy Estimates first?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he believed the Army Votes were of greater urgency than those of the Navy. Notice of the intentions of the Government in this respect would, however, be given in the course of the evening.

MR. CALLAN asked the Prime Minister, whether it was the intention of the Government to re-commit the Land Bill after Report for the purpose of enabling the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to move the insertion of the clause of which he had given Notice? He put the Question, because, if this were the intention of the Government, his hon. Friends wished to move the insertion of clauses respecting the labourers.

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, there was no Question at all before the House for the re-committal of the Bill, except the limited Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The proposal of the re-committal would be over the clause relating to the retirement of the Commissioners, enabling a discussion to be taken upon it, and for no other purpose whatever. It would in no way reopen the whole subject of the Bill.

MR. CALLAN asked, whether it would not be open to any hon. Member to move an Amendment upon the clause intended to be moved by the right hon. Member for Westminster? He would suggest that the Instruction could be amended, in order to include the Question he had indicated.

MR. GLADSTONE: The prospect which the hon. Member holds out is really so grave, and I might almost say so appalling, that I do not know what answer to make; but I really hope that when the time comes, he will be in a more reasonable frame of mind. No doubt, he has the abstract right to move to extend the purpose for which the Bill is being re-committed, but I trust that he will not exercise it.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS PREVENTION BILL.

MR. HENEAGE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is in a position to state definitely for the convenience of Members, at this late period of the Session, whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention Bill this Session?

Sir John Hay

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he also wished to put a Question on this subject to the Prime Minister, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would forgive him (Mr. Arnold) for doing so without Notice, because he had never put one Question to him before. Was it not the case that the right hon. Gentleman had received a Memorial in relation to the Bill, signed by a large number of Members of all Parties of the House, begging him to proceed with the measure; whether the signatures of those in favour were not of a greater value than those of hon. Members opposed to the Bill on the ground of the inconvenience which would result from the postponement of the holidays; and, whether it would not be a circumstance almost without precedent for the Government to abandon a measure of this importance, which had passed the House of Lords, had been read a second time in that House, and been approved of by two Select Committees?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it will, undoubtedly, be admitted by all persons whatsoever that this Bill has a considerable advantage in having passed the House of Lords, in having been approved by two Select Committees, and in having reached a certain stage in this House. At the same time, I am under a pledge to the House not to proceed with any measures which are not absolutely necessary. The shock of arms between opposing parties in relation to this Bill is very interesting; but, at this period of the Session, I may remind hon. Members that it is absolutely necessary that we should make rapid progress with Public Business. I must ask the indulgence of both the hon. Members in this matter, seeing that it is under the careful consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. I will give a more definite answer to the Questions of the hon. Members on Monday next.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THOMAS CONNELLY, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Thomas Connely, of Rosmuck, county Galway, was on the 16th instant arrested under the Coercion Act on a charge of intimidation; whether he is aware that Mr. Connely is an old and feeble man of advanced years, and of good character and peaceable disposition; whether in consequence of his arrest there is no one at home to look after his holding but his son and daughter, who are both deaf and dumb, and their mother, a very old woman; and, whether, as there is no case of intimidation known to have occurred in the neighbourhood of Rosmuck, he will state the real cause for the arrest of a man so far advanced in years as Mr. Connely is?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the person named in the Question was arrested under the Coercion Act at Rosmuck, in the County Galway, on the 15th instant. He was reasonably suspected of having intimidated a certain person for the purpose of compelling him to give up possession of a farm. He was informed that Connolly was only 60 years of age, and was strong and active. He was of a quarrelsome disposition, having been convicted in April last of having used threatening and abusive language. His holding was now managed by his wife, who was a strong, healthy woman, of the same age, and his son and daughter, who were, as stated, both deaf and dumb. They were accustomed to managing the farm. The locality of Rosmuck, he was informed, was one of the most lawless in the Oughterard district.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was informed the man was over 80 years of age, and he should feel obliged if the right hon. Gentleman would make further inquiries on the subject.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. MATTHEW HARRIS, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutent of Ireland, Whether the charge against Mr. Matthew Harris, now in Galway Gaol, committed on the 16th April under the Peace Preservation Act, be that he is "suspected of inciting others to assault and injure a certain person;" and, if so, whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant had all the facts put before him upon which this charge is founded; if said information was supplied to His Excellency previous to his deciding that the term of Mr. Harris' imprisonment should extend beyond three months, as communicated to Mr. Harris on the 18th instant; if a verbatim Report, taken by a competent person at the time the supposed offence was thought to have been committed, was given to His Excellency; and, would the Government give information as to whether the "certain person" that Mr. Harris is suspected of inciting others to "assault and injure" has up to the present time been assaulted or injured; and, if not, whether that circumstance was made known to His Excellency?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the warrant upon which Mr. Harris was imprisoned in Galway Gaol set forth that he was reasonably suspected of inciting others to commit an assault. He (Mr. Forster), as the hon. Member was aware, could not enter upon the general grounds of the arrest, and he could not give any more complete answer to the Question without doing so.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 225.]
(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

CONSIDERATION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]
[THIRD NIGHT.]

Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed.

Clause 44 (Service of civil bill processes and limitation of costs).

Amendment proposed,

In page 28, line 8, after the word "action," to insert the words "for the recovery of rent, or."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON, resuming the debate, said, the Amendment was opposed to fairness and justice, and he asked the House, without hesitation, to decline it. The Government had over and over again refused to allow the landlords to be placed in a worse position as regarded the recovery of their rent than other creditors occupied; and unless it was to be laid down that the landlord creditor was to be treated exceptionally, and have no consideration—that he was to be penalized and treated as an outlaw—he could not see the object of the Amendment. It would affect the existing law in an unsatisfactory manner, inasmuch as at present there was a discretion vested in the Court as to granting costs, which the Amendment would, in some cases, fetter and confuse; but he should not base his opposition to it on technicalities. He took his stand on the broad basis of justice. The landlord was entitled as a creditor to deal with his debtor like any other member of the community, and therefore he asked the Government to adhere to the rules which they had laid down over and over again, and to decline to accept the proposal.

MR. LEAMY thought that the advantages conferred by the Amendment were so apparent that the case did not require argument. It simply provided that if the Judge declared that an action by a landlord in a Superior Court for the recovery of rent should have been brought in an inferior Court, the landlord should not be entitled to costs.

MR. MARUM said, he would remind the House that yesterday the Government assented to this Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) asked the indulgence of the House while he made an explanation on the matter. As he stated yesterday, he accepted the Amendment, because he was under the impression that it made no material alteration in the existing law. He now found that it did make such a change; but he thought they might adjust the matter so as to meet the views of all reasonable persons. The Amendment under consideration would operate unfairly in actions for sums over £20. He should, therefore, propose a new Amendment which would limit the clause to actions for sums not exceeding £20.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word “rent,” to insert the words “not exceeding twenty pounds.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. PARSELL said, he was sorry the Government had not adhered to their original determination. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland yesterday whether under the Bill, when it became law, the Court would have power to stay actions for the recovery of rent instituted in a Superior Court or otherwise, under a writ of fieri facias? The right hon. and learned Gentleman stated the Court had no such power, and consequently, after the passing of the Bill, it would be possible for a landlord, where no application had been made by the tenant to the Court in regard to the fixing of a rent, to issue such a writ for arrears. Under such circumstances, was it not reasonable to suppose that many landlords would evade the provisions of the Bill, and would proceed in that way against the tenants where no application had been made? That was such a plain injustice, that he thought the Government ought to re-consider the matter and accept the Amendment as it was originally proposed.

Mr. Gibson

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he failed to see, even from the landlord's point of view, any reasonable objection there could be to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), which was to discourage the bringing of actions to the Superior Courts, which could be as well tried in the Inferior Courts, and at much less cost. He hoped the Amendment would be agreed to.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he deeply regretted that the Government proposed to modify their concession on this point. He thought they had paid too much attention to the vehement speeches made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and saw no reason why the clause should be limited to actions under £20. He trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would not insist upon the limitation. In fact, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford proposed in part to embody in the clauses the spirit and intention of the Limitation of Costs Bill which had passed the Houses last Session. It was not right the landlord should, except unless special circumstances, cast on the tenant the burden of costs incidental to proceedings in the Superior Courts, when the law had given him the power of suit in the County Court.

MR. LEWIS thought the proposal of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland was a very fair one. It covered the whole ground, and would secure the tenant against being unduly harassed by the landlord in respect of costs.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought the question was not being argued on the most important grounds. It was not whether the amount should be £20 or £50; and if they were debating whether to raise the sum, he should be inclined to take the view of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). The question he had to consider was, first of all, whether it was just; and, in the second place, whether, in the present state of feeling, it was politic, for the sake of this rather limited but not unimportant matter, to introduce a distinction between the power of the landlord in regard to the recovery of what was due to him and the power of other creditors. The Bill had to undergo another ordeal after it left the House of Commons, for it would be subjected to a scrutiny in "another place," and would be examined from the landlords' point of view; and what he felt in point of policy was this. It was very doubtful policy for the Government, for the sake of such an object as the hon. Member for Wexford had in view, to send the Bill to the House of Lords with an enactment, introducing into the Bill, for the first time, a distinction which placed the landlord at a disadvantage in comparison with other creditors. What they had to look at was the interest of the whole Bill, and not whether they had a preference for this or that particular form of law on a matter of secondary importance. If the hon. Member's alteration was accepted, an exaggerated importance would be attached to the proposal, and the whole credit of the Bill might be seriously impaired from the discovery of what might be a slight provision, but what would apparently indicate a spirit of inequality and even injustice. Under those circumstances, they felt bound, in the interests of the Bill—and he did not deny in the interest of justice also—to support the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, with respect to the reference of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister regarding "another place," he would ask him "to be just and fear not." The substance of the Prime Minister's contention was, that because the House of Lords had to deal with the Bill, justice was not to be done to the tenants of Ireland. It was not a fact that landlords would be in a worse position than other creditors. In the foregoing part of the clause they were put in a position whereby they would be able to get out their writs in a manner that ordinary persons could not. The Government were swallowing their previous doctrine because they were attacked by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). They changed their front, and their conduct was not likely to gain for them the respect of the Irish Members. He would far rather strike out his Amendment than have it altered in the way the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland proposed. As the clause stood there was, at least, a presumption in the tenant's favour. He should be prepared to move that £100 stand for £20 in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. LEAMY said, the law had already granted facilities to the landlord, and he should be compelled to exercise his privileges, subject to special limitations.

MR. SPEAKER said, the most convenient course would be to put the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to the House; and after that question was decided, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) could move the further Amendment he announced his intention of moving.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) explained that the landlord had two remedies for rent in arrear, one being ejectment, and the other the recovery of a debt, as to which he was placed in the same position as any other creditor. When the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was accepted in Committee, it was believed to be merely a declaration of the law with reference to ordinary debts, but it turned out not to be so; accordingly, it was proposed to bring the case of rent as nearly as possible to that of any other debt by introducing the limitation of £20. Perhaps the better alternative might be, as suggested by the hon. Member for Wexford, to omit the Amendment which had been accepted from the hon. Member.

[Third Night.]

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 247 ; Noes 39 : Majority 208.—(Div. List, No. 339.)

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment made, in page 28, line 11, after the word "such," by inserting the words "rent or."

MR. PARNELL moved to add to the Clause—

"And whenever an action for the recovery of rent shall have been taken before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such an application is disposed of, the Court before which such action is pending shall have power, on such terms and conditions as the Court may direct, to postpone or suspend such action until the termination of the proceeding to fix such judicial rent."

The hon. Member said that the Amendment was intended to supply a deficiency as regarded the power of the Court to suspend proceedings where an application was made to fix a judicial rent. If the Bill passed as it now stood, a landlord, in the case of a tenancy where a judicial rent had not been fixed, even though the application might have been made to the Court appointed under the Act, might sue his tenant for even six months' rent, if it were due, and might obtain judgment in any Court—a Civil Bill Court or a Superior Court—and if the judgment were not satisfied within a very limited time—he thought it was two days—the landlord might proceed to sell the whole of the interest of the tenant in his holding. Unless some provision of the nature he proposed were inserted, they would find landlords suing tenants for rent, with the sole object of getting rid of them.

Amendment proposed,

In page 28, line 15, at end of Clause 44, to insert the words "and whenever an action for the recovery of rent shall have been taken before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such application is disposed of, the Court before which such action is pending shall have power, on such terms and conditions as the Court may direct, to postpone or suspend such action until the termination of the proceedings to fix such judicial rent." — (Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) thought the principle of the Amendment was not unfair. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seemed to fear that the tenant might be sued for his arrears of rent, a judgment be obtained against him in respect thereof, and the tenancy sold before the judicial rent could be fixed. Well, that was a matter that might, he thought, be dealt with in the Bill, for no one could desire that the general operation of the Act should be defeated in the indirect way pointed out by the hon. Member; but, on the other hand, a permanent enactment of this kind would hardly be necessary or desirable. What the hon. Member desired to meet was a present emergency, and to prevent the hardship of the tenant being deprived of his holding before he could have the benefit of the Act. If the hon. Member would qualify his Amendment by limiting the actions brought for rent within a reasonable period—say within six months after the passing of the Act, which would give everyone an opportunity of applying to have the judicial rent fixed—he (the Attorney General for Ireland) would be disposed to consider it favourably.

MR. PARNELL asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to limit the period to 12 months, because many of the tenants would probably wait to see what the Court could do for them before applying to it in large numbers.

MR. GIBSON said, he was astonished at the Government's acceptance of the Amendment. It was out of place, had been moved without Notice, and was one which would penalize the position of the landlord alone of all creditors. It did not seek to interfere with the landlord's right of ejectment; but it picked out the landlord alone of all creditors, and said if he allowed a tenant to remain in occupation, declining to sue, and came before the ordinary Courts of the country and obtained judgment for the rent due as a creditor, the Court within a time not fixed by the Government, would be able to say—"We will arrest your process and will compel you to wait for some indefinite period before receiving your rent of your debtor." At the same time, any other creditors of the tenant could take means to enforce payment of what was due to them, and might sell the tenant's interest in his farm. Where was the justice of that? Were they going to leave the banker, the village money-lender, and any other creditor free to sell out the tenant, and only stop short at the landlord? This was an Amendment to which he could give no assent, either in principle or detail, and he should offer it his most strenuous and persistent opposition.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had evidently exaggerated the effect of the Amendment. He (Mr. Forster) understood that what was proposed was in accordance with other provisions of the Bill by which they had determined that the landlord should not be able to eject a tenant from the occupation of the land without the tenant having had the opportunity of appealing to have a judicial rent fixed, and to get the rent lowered if the Court so determined. There could be nothing unfair in passing this clause, which would merely hold the proceedings of the landlord in abeyance until the judicial rent was fixed. He had supposed that the Government had covered all the cases by which the landlord could eject a tenant; but it now appeared that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) thought there was a mode by which a landlord could get hold of the land, which was not covered by the Bill at present, a mode by which a landlord would be able to get rid of a tenant without the latter being able to get the advantages of the judicial rent. He (Mr. Forster) thought it would be fair to meet the case contemplated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork by adopting the suggestion of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. It was a principle he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson) had assented to, and he could not see, therefore, why he should so strongly object to it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought that under the circumstances contemplated they ought to protect the tenant from every creditor. He had no objection to the landlords being tied up, if the other creditors were also tied up; but if a tenant was sold out by any other than the landlord, then the landlord's claim should be considered prior to that of any other creditor in the distribution. He would suggest, therefore, that words should be added to protect the interest in the holding of a tenant who had given notice to have a judicial rent fixed, from execution at the hands of other creditors.

MR. GLADSTONE said, there had been no such disposition on the part of the Government to adopt a violent course as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) seemed to suppose. Therefore, he could not see the necessity for the right hon. and learned Gentleman getting on the high horse, and asserting himself with such vehemence as he had done on the subject of that Amendment. He (Mr. Gladstone) knew that he was struck, and that all the Members of the Government were struck, with the argument that the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, as it stood, did not adequately protect the tenant in all cases, and that there was evidently something equitable in the hon. Member for the City of Cork's (Mr. Parnell's) Amendment, and that it ought to be extended to the case of all other creditors. His right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland was considering whether there ought not to be some other changes made; and, viewing the matter in that light, they did not consider the Amendment adversely. The effect would be that the sale of a tenancy would be prevented, and the main assets which the tenant would have to enable him to discharge a debt would be probated, and put in a proper condition for protection. There would be a power to put the assets in the best condition for the tenant. Taking the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork as their raw material, the Government would propose, in the first place, to make it a temporary provision; in the second place, to limit the power of the Court to the stopping of the action only in so far as to prevent the sale of the tenancy until after the judicial rent was fixed; and, thirdly, to provide that the enactment should apply to every case where this form of action was brought, and not merely in the case when it was brought by the landlord.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that the proposal had better stand over so that it might be added to Clause 53, thus affording time for adjustment to the phraseology.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make this Amendment applicable to all tenancies, irrespective of their annual value?

MR. GLADSTONE assented.

[Third Night.]

MR. PARNELL said, he would withdraw his Amendment on the understanding suggested.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 45 (Existence of Land Commission not to create vested interests).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, as an Amendment, to insert words entitling the Judicial Commissioner to a pension.

Amendment proposed,

In page 28, line 16, after "of," insert "the Land Commission other than the Judicial Commissioner, or an Assistant Commissioner."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY said, he could not understand why the principal Commissioners other than the Judicial Commissioner should not have pensions.

MR. GIBSON said, he would like to know what was meant by providing that one Assistant Commissioner was to get a superannuation. At first there was nothing about superannuation in the Bill; then the Judicial Commissioner crept in, and, of course, he must, like all other Judges, be entitled to superannuation.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Amendment wanted the word "being" before "an Assistant Commissioner."

Amendment amended, by adding the word "being," and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 46 (Annual report by Land Commission).

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 28, lines 20 and 21, to leave out the words "after the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one," said, he did so for the purpose of asking the Government whether they would instruct the Commission to make a preliminary Report during next Session?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was best to leave the matter to the discretion of the Commissioners. The Government would take care to bring the subject under their consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 47 (Arrears of rent how dealt with).

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the following Amendments made:—In page 28, line 28, after "that," insert "the;" line 41, print from "whenever," as a new paragraph; line 3, leave out from "such," to "and," in line 4; line 4, after "tenant," insert "had not been so erected for his;" line 4, leave out "still in occupation;" after line 31, insert as a separate paragraph,—

"The omission or refusal by either landlord or tenant of any holding to join with the other of them in obtaining a loan from the Land Commission under this section shall not prejudice any other application or proceeding which either of them may make or institute under this Act or 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' in relation to the holding."

MR. HEALY moved, at end of clause, the insertion of a long sub-section, with the object of providing that in case of arrears they should be reckoned on the basis of the judicial rent.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, line 7, at end of Clause 47, to insert the words,— "Provided always, That if the landlord of any tenant of a holding valued at or under fifty pounds, who, at the passing of this Act, shall be in arrears, shall refuse to join such tenant in an application to the Court respecting arrears, then, if the tenant applies to the Court to fix a judicial rent, and the judicial rent so fixed is less than the rent payable by the tenant at the date of such application, the Court may, if it think fit, certify that such former rent was an excessive rent, and thereupon such arrears shall be deemed to be reduced to such an amount as would have been due had only such judicial rent been payable from the date when such arrears commenced to accrue, and the payment or tender of such reduced amount shall be a sufficient answer to any proceeding for or founded upon such arrears in any court of law or equity."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked Mr. Speaker, whether the Amendment was in Order, the House having already agreed to a section which provided that the refusal of either party to join in an application under the Arrears Clause should not prejudice any future proceedings by the other party?

MR. SPEAKER, in reply, intimated that it was competent for the hon. Member to move his Amendment, and that the objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman was rather a matter of argument than a point of Order.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government could not agree to the Amendment for the reasons stated by him in Committee—namely, that they could not consent to any compulsory proposal for dealing with arrears. It would not be just or expedient compulsorily to diminish the debt owing to a man; and he was sure that it would be useless for any such proposal to be accepted by the House after what had happened “elsewhere.” It would, moreover, put the man who had paid his rent in a most unfair position as compared with the man who owed it.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, there would be some ground for the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland if the only penalty falling on the tenant was the payment of his debt; but the penalty would be considerably heavier, for he would lose the benefit of the Act. If the tenant had been paying a reasonable rent previously, he would not have allowed arrears to accrue at all, and therefore it was only just to give him some substantial relief in respect of what had become due through no fault of his own. He thought at that stage of the Bill, and after a certain amount of concession had been made by the Government, there was no use in taking up a long time in that discussion.

Mr. DAWSON believed the whole raison d'être of the Bill was that the tenants of Ireland had been unfairly rented, and therefore he did not see why the Government should object to deal more liberally than they had done with the subject of arrears.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the Government had gone to the length of their tether with regard to arrears, and could not go back upon the reduction of debts due before the passing of the Act. If any of the unjust or unfortunate transactions that had occurred previously were to be corrected, they should be corrected universally.

Mr. HEALY, in withdrawing the Amendment, took occasion to observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland's manner of meeting it by appealing on a point of Order to the Speaker was very characteristic indeed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 49 (Definitions).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved an Amendment extending the definition of present tenancies to every tenancy “Created before the 1st of January, 1883, in a holding in which a tenancy was subsisting at the time of this passing of the Act.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 31, line 17, after the word “Act,” to insert the words “or created before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, in a holding in which a tenancy was subsisting at the time of the passing of this Act.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Mr. HEALY moved to amend the Amendment by inserting, after “subsisting,” the words “or the tenant is in possession.” He explained that the object of the Amendment was to provide against the application of the clause to holdings acquired by the landlord through the instrumentality of sheriffs' sales, for instance.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

In line 3, after the word “subsisting,” to insert the words “or the tenant is in possession.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, if the landlord bought the holding there would be an end to the matter, and if anybody else bought it he would be protected by the Amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, the mistaken tactics of the Land League were now being exhibited by hon. Members opposite. Farmers had been induced to allow their farms to be sold over their heads, and when the Bill passed would find themselves in great difficulty.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. GIBSON complained that the insertion of these words would give a great extension to the meaning of a present tenancy and that they were larger than had been asked for by Irish Members below the Gangway. It would put into the position of a present tenant, the holder of every tenancy created before the 1st of January, 1883, and that was six months longer than some of the Irish Members had proposed. The effect of that would be that it would operate most unfairly towards the landlord in the case of a tenancy ceasing before the proposed date. The landlord, in such a case, would either have to hold the land in his own hands, or let it to a tenant, who, the day after, would be in the position of a present tenant, and be able to bring the landlord into Court in order to have a judicial rent fixed. He urged that, at all events, the time should be limited to 12 months after the passing of the Act.

[Third Night.]

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MARUM moved to add to the Amendment the words "or had been subsisting within 12 months previously."

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words "or had been subsisting within twelve months previously."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY thought the promise of the Prime Minister had not been fulfilled by the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman distinctly stated that in no holding, in respect of which a breach of condition had been committed before the Bill became law, should a future tenancy be created without an interval having elapsed. That promise was not carried out in the Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would at once acknowledge the hon. Member's (Mr. Healy's) capacity for ingenious argument; but could assure him that not only could no breach of covenant committed before the passing of the Act be made the foundation of a future tenancy, but that some breaches of covenant committed after the passing of the Act should not lead to the growth of a future tenancy.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think the Amendment provided for the large number of evicted for whom he and his hon. Friend (Mr. Healy) had been pleading. The tenants he more particularly referred to were those who would be assisted by the Arrears Clause, and enabled to make an arrangement with the landlord to pay portion of the arrears themselves and borrow another portion. He had hoped they would be able to come in as present tenants, and have the advantage of Clause 7; but it appeared to him that the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland provided nothing of the kind, because those tenants would not be tenants existing at the passing of the Act.

Mr. Gibson

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, a man must be a tenant to apply under the Arrears Clause, and if he was a tenant, he was a present tenant. If he had been evicted, but retained his right of redemption, then also he was still a tenant.

Question put, and negatived.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved the following addition to the same sub-section:—

"Every tenancy to which this Act applies shall be deemed to be a present tenancy until the contrary is proved."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said it was reasonable when they started with present tenancies to presume that every tenant was a present tenant until the contrary was established.

Amendment proposed,

In page 31, line 17, at end, add "and every tenancy to which this Act applies shall be deemed to be a present tenancy until the contrary is proved."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. PLUNKET thought it was unfair to establish such a presumption against the landlord. It would be far easier for the tenant to obtain evidence in his favour than for the landlord, and the Amendment was therefore unnecessary.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL moved the following extension of "the present tenancy" definition:—

"Or a tenancy beginning after the passing of this Act, in respect of which it shall be mutually agreed between the landlord and tenant that it shall be a present tenancy."

Amendment proposed,

In page 31, line 17, after the word "Act," to insert the words "or a tenancy beginning after the passing of this Act in respect of which it shall be mutually agreed between the landlord and tenant that it shall be a present tenancy.”

—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) declined to accept the Amendment, observing that the Government had already gone quite far enough in the direction pointed out by the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

MR. LEAMY said, the Amendment was intended to enable any landlord who thought fit to reinstate as a present tenant any person who had been a tenant of his, but who would not be a tenant at the passing of the Act. Surely, there could be no objection to it, for it was not in any sense obligatory; and he thought if a landlord wished to restore a tenant and confer a present tenancy upon him he should be at liberty to do so.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that all the cases which the Bill intended to meet were met, and it would be unreasonable to accept a proposal the terms of which were perfectly unlimited, and might apply to cases occurring at any time. If a tenant was evicted six months before the passing of the Act he had the right of redemption, and therefore was a present tenant.

MR. DAWSON said, the Bill was said to be pervaded by the great spirit of freedom of contract; and, if so, why not allow a landlord to make a contract which would be favourable to the tenant and agreeable to himself? By not doing so, they would be limiting the freedom of contract they were so anxious to uphold.

MR. HEALY said, the Amendment was much more important than the Government seemed to suppose. It was one which would be followed by results entering into the national life of Ireland, and he ventured to think that even the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), who was always ready to mount the war horse and charge the Government Benches, would scarcely object to the liberty which it proposed to confer upon the landlord, seeing that it would enable him to do in a cheap way what he could now only do by an expensive deed. Freedom of contract was their battle cry at the present moment.

MR. GLADSTONE pointed out that the unlimited character of the Amendment would enable tenancies to pass backward and forward into and out of the condition of a present tenancy any number of times. That seemed to him more like confusion than order, and it was a state of things they did not like to create.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Amendment made, in page 31, line 18, after “means,” insert “except as aforesaid.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, in page 31, line 30, to insert as a separate paragraph—“Landed Property Improvement (Ireland) Acts’ means the Act of the session of the tenth and eleventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter thirty-two, intituled ‘An Act to facilitate the Improvement of Landed Property in Ireland, and any Acts amending or extending the same.’”

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. GIBSON moved, in page 31, line 35, after “Act,” to insert—

“‘And ‘The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,’ except in so far as the same is expressly altered or varied by this Act or is inconsistent therewith, and this Act shall be construed together as one Act.’”

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 50 (Rules as to determination of tenancy)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved the following Amendment to the clause:—In page 32, line 3, insert as separate subsection (2)—

(2) “Where the landlord has resumed possession of a tenancy from a present tenant, he may, if he thinks fit so to do, reinstate such tenant in his holding as a present tenant; and therefrom such tenancy shall again become subject to all the provisions of this Act which are applicable to present tenancies.”

MR. HEALY proposed, as an Amendment to Mr. Attorney General for Ireland’s Amendment, in lines 1 and 2, to leave out “a present tenant.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the word provided before the commencement of the next Session showing the extent of these town parks, and under what conditions they existed, so that an opinion might be formed as to what would be the probable operation of the clause.

[Third Night.]

MR. HEALY said, that it would be no great boon to obtain such a Return, and it was very easy for anyone to get the details.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 52 (Saving of existing tenancies).

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, the following Amendments made:—In page 33, line 17, after “or,” insert “other;” line 17, after “tenancy,” insert “held by occupying tenants and;” line 19, after “which,” insert “said;” line 19, leave out the second “tenancy,” and insert “contracts of tenancy;” line 22, before “existing,” insert “such;” line 25, before “existing,” insert “such;” and in line 30, before “existing,” insert “such.”

MR. HEALY (for Mr. BIGGAR) moved to omit the words “from year to year,” after “tenant,” at the commencement of the clause, which gave the Court power to quash a lease accepted by a tenant from year to year since the passing of the Act of 1870, when the Court was satisfied that such lease was procured by the landlord by threat of eviction or undue influence. A leaseholder whose lease was expired was in a far more defenceless position than a yearly tenant, and the Amendment, if accepted, would save hundreds of cases.

Amendment proposed, in page 33, line 42, to leave out the words “from year to year.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘from year to year’ stand part of the Bill.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the object of the clause was to provide redress for leaseholders who, by threat of eviction or undue influence, were deprived of the rights which they ought to have had under the Act of 1870, by having leases thus forced upon them. The class of leaseholders which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) sought to include had comparatively slight benefits conferred upon them by that Act, and, therefore, did not come within the principle of the clause. He could not accept the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN supported the Amendment, and referred to cases of hardship which it would remedy.

MR. BIGGAR supported the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 162; Noes 26: Majority 136. — (Div. List, No. 340.)

MR. HEALY moved to insert “twelve” instead of “six months” after the passing of the Act, as the period within which a tenant might apply to the Court to have an unfair lease made void, on the ground that it had been accepted under the threat of eviction or undue influence. It was, he thought, too much to ask the tenant to go before the Court within six months.

Amendment proposed, in page 34, line 5, to leave out the word “six,” in order to insert the word “twelve.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘six’ stand part of the Bill.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. LAW) resisted the Amendment, considering it only reasonable that in six months a tenant ought to be able to make up his mind what he intended to do.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 53 (Saving in case of inability to make immediate application to Court).

MR. PARNELL, in conformity with an arrangement, moved to add to the clause in its altered form the Amendment proposed and withdrawn at an early hour of the evening.

Amendment proposed,

In page 34, line 21, at end of Clause 53, to insert the words “Whenever within six months after the passing of this Act any action shall be pending or be brought against a tenant to recover a debt or damages before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such application is disposed of, the Court before which such action is pending shall have power, upon such terms and conditions as the Court may think fit, to stay the sale under any writ of execution in such action of the tenancy in respect of which such application is pending until the termination of the proceedings to fix such judicial rent."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRODRICK hoped the Government would not listen to the proposal in its present form, more especially as it was understood that they would bring up an Amendment of their own upon the subject. He did not believe that any words the Government would bring up could have any approach to these, which would be fatal to the decisions of the House in Committee on every question of importance relating to time and the retrospective action of the Bill. These words were sprung upon the House at a time when it was almost impossible to take due cognizance of them. Many hon. Members had left the House under the impression that no further question of importance would be introduced, on which assumption the Prime Minister had asked the Leader of the Opposition to raise no obstacle to the third reading being taken that evening. The words as they stood would offer a premium to every tenant in Ireland who was in arrear in his rent to go into Court to get his rent fixed judicially, and were thus inconsistent with the desire of the Prime Minister not to encourage litigation by tempting tenants to rush into the Court. The prospect held out to the landlord was that the satisfaction given by the Bill would be such that tenants would not have reason to refuse to pay their rents; but now they were to be allowed to hold them back six months longer, and thus, in some cases, to bring the landlords to the verge of bankruptcy. This was to be done because the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had come down to give effect to an edict sent forth by the Land League a few days ago. ["Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"] If the Government accepted the proposition, they would be playing into the hands of the Land League, whose action they had denounced. ["Oh, oh!"] He hoped he should not be further interrupted by the hon. Member for Stockton, who seemed to think that because the Members who were present to protest against the iniquity of the clause was small their arguments could be obscured from the country. He appealed to the Government to give a most distinct negative to a proposition to carry out an arrangement into which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland entered far too easily, and by so doing they would show that they did not desire to re-open all the questions which were supposed to have been closed. The Amendment would tempt the farmer to squander money which was due to the landlord, because he could not be sued for it for six months, or possibly for a longer time. What security was there in the press of business which would thus be created that it would not be six years before rents could be fixed, if this incentive were offered to tenants to rush into the Court? The proposition was the outcome of the intention of the Land League to defeat the action of the Bill, and it was unwise of the Government to attempt to import it into the Bill at that stage. If the Amendment were agreed to, he believed it would seriously imperil the passing of the Bill; and, no matter how small the minority might be, he would certainly divide the Committee against it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) thought that some of the statements of the hon. Member (Mr. Brodrick) were without foundation. There was, for instance, no foundation for the apprehension that matters might be suspended for an indefinite time. If the facts did not warrant the application, the Court would reject it, for what was proposed was only a permissive and enabling power. The Court would not grant it if it were not reasonable, and much would depend on the prospect of a speedy settlement. Then, again, there was no interference with the landlord who sued in the Civil Bill Court, a decree in which did not enable the creditor to sell the tenancy. Therefore, for all classes of tenants whose rent did not come up to £20 the Amendment would not have the effect suggested. The Commissioners might also impose conditions on the tenants. For instance, they might require that security might be given, or that a substantial part of the rent should be brought into Court to abide the decision. It might, therefore, the Government conceived, be accepted without the fear of doing injustice to the landlord or other creditor.

MR. LEWIS strongly opposed the Amendment, remarking that of all the changes introduced into the Bill since its first introduction that was, in his opinion, the most serious. ["Oh, oh!"] He was aware that those Benches were deserted, and that they were at the mercy of hon. Members below the Gangway. If the Amendment were sanctioned, it would not, in the circumstances, carry with it the weight of the House, for it was introduced only two or three hours ago, and it was now being discussed in the absence of many hon. Gentlemen who took a deep interest in the subject, but who did not know that such a proposal had been brought forward. One effect of the Amendment would be to clog the Court with a number of cases which otherwise would not be there. In many cases, a landlord might have five or six years of rent owing to him without an opportunity of his obtaining a farthing. It was urged that an execution could be levied against the other ordinary assets of the debtor; but the tenant might say that the Legislature had practically tied the landlord up until a judicial rent had been settled, and the landlord would be without an answer to such an argument. Again, when the intervention of the Court was invoked, the ordinary creditors were to be told that they must wait until the landlord and the tenant had settled their dispute. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had remarked that the Court might impose a condition that the tenant should pay the rent into Court. But what advantage would that confer on the starving landlord? This was an ex post facto clause of a most obnoxious description, for it gave one party an advantage entirely at the expense of the other. In some cases it might be the ruin of the landlord. There were some landlords who, by the operation of such a clause as this, would be rendered for months and for years totally destitute. He spoke on behalf of landlords who were unable to take care of themselves, and he was strongly opposed to a proposition which would place them at the mercy of a litigious tenant and a dilatory Court. If ever there was an immoral clause, the one now under discussion was stamped with that character. Hon. Members on that side of the House were bound to protest against such a clause being added to the Bill. Various references had been made to "another body" and "another place," but that other "body" and that other "place" would be grossly neglecting their duty if they did not at once scout a provision like this, which had been introduced without Notice and accepted without consideration, and which was, on the face of it, a disregard of the ordinary laws of morality.

[Third Night.]

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lewis) had ended his speech by saying what the duty of another House ought to be; but he (Mr. Forster) thought the hon. Member should wait until he got in that "other place" before he said what its duty ought to be. They had to consider what their duty was; and, for his part, he hoped that the House would accept the Amendment. The hon. Member who had last spoken had used very hard words respecting it; but he had enormously exaggerated his case. He had spoken on the supposition that, in any extreme case, the Court was bound to grant a postponement of any application; but the wording of the clause only gave the Court power to do so, and the House, if it had any confidence in the Court, might be sure it would guard against extreme cases of hardship. Such cases occasionally there might be, no doubt; but there were also cases of extreme rents, which had, in fact, been the real cause of the Bill that had so long occupied the House. He thought they had all by this time come to the conclusion that unfair rents ought to be reduced, and that a man ought not to be deprived of the benefits of the Act because his payments were in arrear. The Bill left an enormous majority of cases to the law as it at present stood; but quite recently the landlords had found out a new process, by means of writs of fieri facias, of exacting their rents, and getting rid of their tenants. He had thought that the provisions of the Bill guarded against such cases, and the discovery that they did not do so was a perfect surprise to him. He was, therefore, obliged to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) for filling up the gap in the interests of the good government of Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] He repeated that the interests of the good government of Ireland required that, after conferring on the tenants the benefits of the Bill, they should fill up any gap that might be discovered, by which the Bill might be evaded and the tenants would lose the advantages intended for them. The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) had alluded to certain statements of the Land League; now, he (Mr. Forster) did not know whether or not the Land League had made them; but it was quite possible that even the Land League might sometimes make a correct statement; and, in any case, it would be a misfortune if provisions intended to benefit the tenants were defeated by a comparatively new process of which the Government were not previously aware. Indeed, the House itself would be to blame if it allowed its main object to be frustrated. And what was now proposed was not that the payment of all debts should be suspended, but that a period of grace or waiting should be given—for six months or a year—rather than the tenants should be driven out. He was somewhat surprised at the opposition that had been offered to the Amendment, which he regarded merely as a proposal to supply an unsuspected omission. As he had said, the Government did not know of the gap which it proposed to fill up; and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson) knew of it, it appeared as if he accepted the other clauses of the Bill with the knowledge that it would be in the power of the landlords to defeat the intentions of the Government.

Mr. Lewis

MR. PLUNKET said, he wished to say a word or two of a clause to which the House would certainly attach much importance. On that side of the House the proposal had taken everyone by surprise, and had been wholly unexpected; and that would also be the feeling in Ireland, not only of the landlords, many of whom would be ruined by the clause, but also of other creditors when they heard what had been done. Whatever might be the provisions of the Bill in favour of the tenant, no one had ever imagined, and no suspicion had ever been breathed, that a clause would be introduced absolutely suspending for a definite time those remedies that by law belonged to every landlord. The chief argument in favour of the proposal—he might say the only argument of his right hon. and learned Friend opposite the Attorney General for Ireland—was that it would be in the discretion of the Court to give effect to the application, or to refuse it. But the Court would know scarcely anything of the equity of each case as between landlord and tenant; while, as regards the other creditors, it would know absolutely nothing at all. All he (Mr. Plunket) could say was, that the adoption of the proposal would be taken in Ireland as the most sublime triumph of the land agitation and the Land League, whose last mandate was that nothing should be paid till the new rents were ascertained by the Court. [“No, no!”] Well, that was he read in the paper over and over again. He could only add that he was confident that of all the unprecedented proposals made by the Bill, public opinion would to-morrow characterize the Amendment before the House as the most novel and the most strange.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 76: Majority 133.—(Div. List, No. 341.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Bill be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock,”—(Mr. Gladstone,)—put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN—DEFEAT OF THE AMEER'S FORCES.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of asking Her Majesty's Government, Whether they have received any information with respect to a report stating that there has been a battle in Afghanistan, and that the forces of Abdurrahman have been defeated by Ayoub Khan?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; that is a fact. We have received a telegram this afternoon, dated Simla, July 28, and it is to the following effect:—

“Telegram just received from Chaman says that, in action fought yesterday morning at Karez-i-Atta, Ameer's forces were totally defeated, 18 guns taken, and all baggage. The Khelat Regiment and Kandahar horse went over to Ayub. Gholam Haider has fled towards Kabul. Sirdar Shamsuddin still in Kandahar with 400 men of Kabuli regiments and some police.”

That is an important engagement, so far as the Candahar country is concerned. I will only add that the Anglo-Indian force in the neighbourhood of that country is very considerable.

of the country. It was a property of considerable value, and to make the transfer which his hon. Friend suggested would have a very important bearing upon the proprietary value of that property. It would place it under a different system of management, and subject to different rules, and it would involve important modifications of the arrangement made at the commencement of the reign. He was bound to recommend to the House that they should not initiate or entertain a subject of this kind, which obviously required some very strong evidence of public interest in order to make out even a prima facie justification. There was no such case here. There was no public grievance. There was no constant inconvenience. The small and momentary question as to the inconvenience threatened to Members of the Legislature, which arose on a recent occasion, was as much a matter of amusement as of convenience, and it afforded no occasion at all for the reopening of this serious question. He could not help hoping that his hon. Friend would not feel disposed to press this matter on the attention of the House. In any case, he (Mr. Gladstone) must press it strongly on the House from an opposite direction—that no step could be safely, or even becomingly or decorously, taken without the most careful preliminary investigation, which must always precede a serious modification of an arrangement having reference to the property of the Royal Family.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD begged to withdraw his Amendment, after the statement of the Prime Minister. It was entirely on the ground of good administration that he had brought it forward.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE — SUITORS' FUNDS IN CHANCERY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. S. LEIGHTON, in rising to call attention to the want of information with reference to the "suitors' funds" in Chancery; and to move—

"That the future lists of unclaimed money be issued with cross references triennially; stating the amount of fund in Court; with the names and last known addresses of persons supposed to be entitled; together with the date of the last decree," said, there was a large amount of money belonging to many persons who did not claim it, because there was no sufficient publication of lists of names of those entitled, who were, therefore, kept in ignorance of their rights. In that way the spirit of the Act of Parliament on the subject was violated, and so much secrecy was maintained that persons were not able to claim the money that was due to them. Lists ought to be published every three years. They were due in 1873, 1876, and 1879, and the fourth was due in 1882. But only two lists had been published, and it had required much pressure to obtain these. It was said to be the fault of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who would not provide the Accountant General with the staff that was required to get out the lists. Those that had been published were not as useful as they might be, for, although they professed to be alphabetical, names were not to be found under their initial letters. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Gladstone

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the future lists of unclaimed money be issued with cross references triennially; stating the amount of fund of the suitors' fund in Chancery; with the names and last known addresses of persons supposed to be entitled thereto; together with the date of the last decree,"—(Mr. Stanley Leighton,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would admit that there had been some delay in the publication of the lists; but as the staff of the Accountant General's Office had been increased, he hoped there would be no ground for complaint in that respect in the future. With regard to the form of the accounts, that was settled by Lord Cranworth, when Lord Chancellor, and the matter was in the hands of the Lord Chancellor for the time being. Those who were responsible for looking after these funds, in the interests of suitors and of the public, were of opinion that it was not desirable to make some of the changes suggested, and for these reasons it was his duty to resist the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) £18,792, to complete the sum for the Colonial Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to ask one or two questions of the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury before the Vote was put. Upon page 91 of the Estimates, there was an item of £308 for the salary of the Superintendent of the Library. A good many years ago Mr. Woods, who had been employed in Ireland during the Famine years of 1845, 1846 and 1847, and, having done good service in connection with the relief works there, was offered by the Colonial Office, at the instance of the Treasury, the post of Assistant Librarian to the Colonial Office. Mr. Woods, who was in charge of the relief branch of the Boards of Works in Ireland during the period of famine, received a handsome testimonial when he left. He had conducted the drainage and other operations, not only with satisfaction to his official superiors, but to the numerous country gentlemen and others with whom he was brought into communication. By his exertions he greatly contributed to the success of the relief measures; and, in consideration of the services which he rendered, the Treasury desirous of doing what they could for Mr. Woods, offered him the post of Assistant Librarian in the Colonial Office. Upon offering it to him, the Treasury wrote a letter to Mr. Woods, which concluded in these words—

"Your probable, though not the only possible, advancement will be to the post of Librarian, with a salary of £600, rising to £800 a-year. Such is the position we have to offer you."

Some years afterwards, Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Secretary to the Treasury, declared that this gentleman had been selected out of regard to his merits and qualifications with the intention that he should obtain better and earlier promotion in consequence of the transfer. Later on, in the year 1870, the Earl of Kimberley, in regard to this particular appointment, used these words—

"Mr. Woods was always told that the superior office of Librarian, rising from £600 to £800 a-year, would still remain open to him."

The Librarian, in course of time, retired, and, instead of Mr. Woods being appointed to succeed, the office was abolished, together with that of Assistant Librarian, held by Mr. Woods, and Mr. Woods received a much less pension than he ought to have been entitled to. Mr. Woods, when he accepted the offer of the Treasury, and went to the Colonial Office as Assistant Librarian, did not obtain any immediate advantage; but it was the prospect of promotion, pointedly and repeatedly held out to him, that induced him to relinquish his post at the Treasury and go to the Colonial Office. At that time there was a Librarian at the Colonial Office as well as an Assistant, and the salary of the Librarian went up to £800 a-year. When the Librarian retired, Mr. Woods found that the Treasury would not keep faith with him; and he found that instead of being appointed to succeed, as he had been distinctly promised, the office was nominally abolished. Mr. Woods had been told over and over again that he might look for the promotion which was admittedly his due. To show that Mr. Woods was not alone in his view of the matter, the words of Lord Carnarvon might be quoted. In 1874 Lord Carnarvon was Secretary of State for the Colonies, and in a letter to the Treasury the noble Lord said that the decision of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, in the case of Mr. Woods, placed that gentleman in a different position from that which he had been led to expect, both in regard to employment and salary. Lord Carnarvon further requested the particular attention of their Lordships to the distinct expectation of promotion held out to Mr. Woods when he relinquished a good position at the Treasury in order to enter the Colonial Office as sub-Librarian. Mr. Woods was over and over again led to expect that whenever the post of Librarian became vacant he would succeed to it. The end of the matter was that the case of Mr. Woods, at the suggestion of that gentleman, was submitted to arbitration. But the arbitration was of a purely illusory character, because when he was prepared to go to arbitration, and submit his case to Earl Cairns, the arbitrator chosen, the Treasury did not allow him to make the statement he desired to make, and it was they only who submitted a case for the adjudication of the arbitrator. Mr. Woods naturally objected to such a one-sided submission, and desired to withdraw from the arbitration; but the Treasury obtained a decision from Earl Cairns. The reference to arbitration did not, he (Mr. O'Connor) was informed, admit of the examination of witnesses in support of Mr. Woods' case. The consequence was that this gentleman, after having faithfully served the public for a great many years, and having, even according to the testimony of the Treasury itself, served it well, found himself debarred from obtaining the post of Librarian at the Colonial Office, which he had naturally thought, from the statements made to him, was his right. Instead of obtaining the advantage he had been taught to expect, he found himself pensioned on a much smaller scale of salary than he had a fair claim to be allowed to go up to; and, at the present moment, the position of Mr. Woods was this—he had lost, in the shape of salary, more than £1,000, and about £120 a-year in pension. He (Mr. O'Connor) wished to add that he had no personal knowledge of Mr. Woods. He had never seen him; but having given to the case all the examination and attention he could, from the materials supplied to him, he was bound to confess that, in his opinion, a very great hardship had been arbitrarily inflicted upon Mr. Woods, and that the Treasury ought to reconsider their position in the matter, if not with regard to the status of Mr. Woods, at any rate with regard to the amount of pension. He (Mr. O'Connor) did not propose to move the reduction of the Vote; but he would ask the Treasury whether they would consent to the printing of the Papers relating to Mr. Woods' case. If the Government side of the matter was such as would bear investigation, he did not see why they should object to the printing of the Papers. He wished further to point out that the abolition of the post of Librarian was, after all, not a genuine abolition; because, in the present Estimates, he found the post revived under the title of "Superintendent of the Library." He did not remember that the item appeared in last year's Estimates; but it was given now, and a sum of £308 attached to it. He trusted that he had stated the case sufficiently to allow the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury to answer it.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he happened to be in the Colonial Office at the time Mr. Woods was appointed. Some Papers had been missed from the Colonial Office, and they had appeared in one of the morning papers. They were documents of great importance, and in consequence of what had occurred, it was considered desirable to remove the Assistant Librarian from his post, but not to dismiss him. Mr. Woods succeeded as Assistant Librarian, having been transferred to the Colonial Office from the Treasury. Certainly, one of the inducements held out to Mr. Woods to make the change was that he would be entitled to promotion to the office of Librarian whenever it became vacant. He, therefore, trusted that the noble Lord opposite (Lord Frederick Cavendish) would look into the case, and endeavour, if possible, to do Mr. Woods justice.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I was not aware that the case was coming on to-night, or otherwise I would have refreshed my memory. But I think I can say enough to satisfy the Committee that the claims of Mr. Woods is not one that the Government can entertain. I would venture to say that Mr. Woods has been treated with every consideration, and that he has been granted as large a pension as his services, under the circumstances, entitle him to. His claim to succeed to the post of Librarian could not be entertained, because, if acceded to, it would establish the doctrine that the office was one which Her Majesty's Government were bound to retain permanently. Mr. Woods, no doubt, considered that he had a grievance, and he commenced legal proceedings; but, at the last moment, he came to the conclusion that it was desirable to abandon the legal proceedings. At the request of Mr. Woods the whole case was referred to Lord Cairns—not only as to his legal rights, but as to any equitable right he might have to compensation. The case was put fully before Lord Cairns, who decided that Mr. Woods' claim could not be recognized; and, under these circumstances, I do not think that the case ought to be re-opened.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that he was in the Colonial Office when Mr. Woods was serving in the Office. He was transferred from the Treasury to the post of Assistant Librarian, and, no doubt, he expected to have been made in time Librarian; but he never could have had any absolute claim to such advancement. Indeed, it would be impossible for the Treasury to answer for the organization of any office for all time to come. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), who brought the subject forward, said the abolition of the office of Librarian at the Colonial Office had not been altogether bond fide. Now, the fact of the matter was this—the whole Office was re-organized, and, with a view to prevent any increase of expenditure, several posts were abolished, among which was that of Librarian. Anything more bond fide it was impossible to conceive. It was found quite unnecessary to have a Librarian and an Assistant Librarian, and the present Superintendent of the Library was appointed at £300 a-year, rising to £500. He was sorry that Mr. Woods had not been allowed to go before the arbitrator. He did not think that that gentleman would have been able to prove his case; but it would have been more consistent with the principles of justice that he should have been allowed to appear before Lord Cairns, and state the nature of his grievance personally. If Mr. Woods had had that opportunity afforded to him of fully explaining his case to an impartial arbitrator, they would probably have heard no more of the matter.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that from all he could gather in reference to the case, Mr. Woods seemed to have been very badly treated. His hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had already read a few words from a speech of Lord Carnarvon, when Colonial Secretary, when the case was brought before the House of Lords by Lord O'Hagan. Lord Carnarvon dealt with the case upon its merits, and justice and the noble Lord said that in 1859

Mr. Woods, who had been at the Treasury for some years, was transferred to the post of Assistant Librarian at the Colonial Office with the distinct expectation that he would succeed in due course to the office of Librarian. Lord Carnarvon added that he had acquiesced, although reluctantly, in the decision at which the Treasury had arrived in reference to the claims of Mr. Woods; but he thought that that gentleman had taken an inadvisable course in taking legal proceedings against the Government. The fact was that Mr. Woods submitted his claim to the Treasury, and finding that he could get no redress, he published the correspondence. It was always considered that a public officer, however harsh the decision against him might be, should submit without placing his grievances before the general public by publishing the correspondence. It appeared that in this case the Government consented to an arbitration; but the arbitration was of a thoroughly illusory character, because the person most interested in the matter did not obtain leave to state his case before the arbitrator. He (Mr. Biggar) had never in his life heard of a more absurd arbitration. Only one party was allowed to appear and be heard before it. If the Treasury really wished that justice should be done, they should have allowed Mr. Woods to appear before Lord Cairns and state his case; and if the decision of Lord Cairns, after having fully heard the case, had then been against him, no doubt Mr. Woods would have been satisfied. It was not possible that he would be satisfied, or would believe that he had not been unjustly treated, when he found that the Government refused to submit anything to the arbitrator beyond their own version of the case. It certainly seemed to him, if the case had been properly represented, that Mr. Woods' application for a fresh hearing should be acceded to, and that the case should be re-opened by a fair and impartial tribunal, before which both parties could be heard.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR very much regretted to hear the statement which had been made by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury. The hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) objected to the statement he (Mr. O'Connor) had made that the abolition of the office of Librarian at the Colonial Office had not been bond fide. He had not made the observation with any desire to be offensive, and, as exception was taken to it, he regretted that he had made use of it. All he now asked for was that the Government would consent to print the further Papers which four years ago were ordered by the House of Lords to be printed. The House of Lords consented to print them in the year 1877; but when he applied to the House of Lords for a copy of the Papers he was informed that the entry in the Votes was a Parliamentary fiction, and that, in point of fact, the Papers never had been presented. He believed they had been printed for the official purposes of the Colonial Office, so that it would not be difficult to furnish copies of them if the Government would consent to their being printed. He merely asked now that the Treasury should consent to the production of the Papers, and he had no intention of objecting to the Vote. With regard to what the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had said as to the unreasonableness of the expectation that any particular post should be retained for the benefit of a particular individual, a careful perusal of the Estimates for the present year would show that, in many cases, existing offices were kept open for certain officers. Here and there a note would be found appended to a Vote stating that "this post will be abolished on the retirement of the present officer," or words to that effect. All he would say in regard to the abolition of the office of Librarian at the Colonial Office was, that however unnecessary the post was a year ago, or 10 years ago, it was equally unnecessary when Mr. Woods was first appointed. If the Government thought at that time that in consideration of the past services of Mr. Woods he should have a claim to the office of Librarian, when it became vacant, they would be equally justified, when the post became vacant, in fulfilling their promise, and allowing Mr. Woods to hold the office until he had attained the maximum amount of pay he was led to believe he would ultimately reach. As a matter of fact, by the course pursued by the Treasury, Mr. Woods had been deprived of salary to the extent of £1,000; and the pension upon which he had been retired, having regard to the rate of pay he ought to have received, was about £120 a-year lower than that which he would have received if he had been allowed to go up to the maximum amount of salary he was induced to believe he would reach. He would again press the Government to print and distribute the Papers relating to the case.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I am sorry that I cannot accede to the request of the hon. Member. The case has already been fully investigated. Mr. Woods took legal proceedings in order to assert his rights; and he was subsequently, as a matter of favour, allowed to go before an arbitrator. The case has, therefore, been fully gone into, and I do not think it necessary, or desirable, to re-open it.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £16,077, to complete the sum for the Privy Council Office.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,355, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Lord Privy Seal."

MR. DILLWYN objected to the Vote, because he believed that the Office of Lord Privy Seal was a sinecure. He had objected to the Vote in other years, and had divided the Committee against it; but he should not take a division this year, because he did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of a division. He had often entered his protest against the Vote; and, if he took a division, it would only be entering another protest, and wasting the time of the Committee, without obtaining any practical result. He was, however, influenced on this occasion in not taking a division by this consideration—that the Minister who now held the Office had been appointed because he was thoroughly conversant with Irish affairs, and everybody knew there was a great pressure upon the Irish Office at the present moment. Lord Carlingford, the present Lord Privy Seal, was eminently fitted to assist the Irish Office in the legislation now proposed for Ireland; and, under these circumstances, he (Mr. Dillwyn) would content himself with entering a protest against the Vote; without putting the Committee to the trouble of a division.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to have an explanation upon a much smaller matter. He saw that the following note was appended to the Vote:—

“The Assistant Clerk also draws a pension of £79 6s. 8d. per annum from the Superannuation Vote, as late second class clerk in the Office of Works. His salary has been raised from £105 to £150 per annum.”

He thought it was wrong that this sort of thing should be allowed. If they had a gentleman who, on account of his age, had been superannuated in another Department, he did not see why he should be employed in the Office of Lord Privy Seal, nor could he imagine why it should have been found necessary to raise the salary of such an officer. He certainly thought the matter required a little explanation.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The gentleman referred to in the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) was removed from the Office of Works, where he received a higher salary than that which he receives in the Privy Seal Office, and it was felt right that he should receive compensation for the loss. He has accordingly been awarded the sum stated in the Vote. The transaction was completed shortly before the present Government came into Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR regretted that the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) should be prepared, now that the Liberals were in Office, to take a very different course from that which he took in the year 1879, when the Liberals were out of Office. As he (Mr. O'Connor) was not influenced by any such considerations, he was indisposed to allow the Vote to pass without challenging it. The arguments which the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) two years ago brought to bear against the retention of the Office of Lord Privy Seal had remained unanswered up to the present day. The noble Lord, on that occasion, pointed out that the continuance of this Office, instead of assisting the Public Business, really obstructed it. That was to say, that it acted as an unnecessary check upon the transaction of useful Public Business. No doubt, it might be desirable occasionally to have a Member of the Ministry whose time would not be wholly occupied with Departmental work; but, in this particular instance, that idea was altogether illusory, the fact being that the majority of noble Lords who had held the Office of Lord Privy Seal had not been remarkable for the assistance they had contributed to the work of the Government. It had been abundantly proved that a considerable amount of positive delay in the transaction of Public Business was occasioned in consequence of the necessity of having certain documents stamped in the Privy Seal Office before being passed by the Great Seal. At the time of the last discussion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Office was a very ancient one, and that it had been handed down through a great number of Cabinets. That, however, was about the only argument the right hon. Gentleman advanced. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said he was bound to admit that the Office was a sinecure, and that it ought to be abolished. The hon. Baronet, in the division which followed, accordingly voted in favour of its abolition; and he (Mr. O'Connor) hoped that on this occasion, if the hon. Baronet was in the House, he would vote for its abolition now. He was glad to see that the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) was in his place, because he also voted in 1879 for the abolition of the Office, on the ground that it was a sinecure. And not only did the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department take that course, but he was supported by another hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), who also voted for the abolition of the Office. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. O'Connor) thought he was justified in the determination he had come to of taking a division upon the Vote. He desired, however, to offer a slight hint as to the division, because he thought it would be unjust to nominate as a Teller in support of the Vote the noble Lord the Member for Haverfordwest (Lord Kensington), who acted as one of the Treasury Whips, that noble Lord having voted in favour of the abolition of the Office, as a sinecure, on the previous occasion. He thought the noble Lord could hardly “tell” for the Government now in support of the Vote, seeing that he had voted for getting rid of the Office, as a sinecure, only two years ago. Moreover, he (Mr. O'Connor) believed that the majority of hon. Members who sat below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House not only spoke, but voted in favour of abolishing the Office of Lord Privy Seal. He would not detain the Committee longer; but he would certainly not only object to the Vote, but take a division against it.

MR. DILLWYN wished to make one observation upon the remarks of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. O'Connor). The hon. Member asserted that he (Mr. Dillwyn), when the Conservatives were in Office, always divided the Committee against this Vote, but that he took a different course now that the Liberals were in power. He could assure the hon. Member that he had divided against the Vote time after time when the Liberals were in power, as well as when the Conservatives were in Office, and he should do so in future, whenever a division was taken. He thought he had explained the reason why he did not take the initiative on the present occasion.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 44: Majority 100.—(Div. List, No. 342.)

SIR WILFRID LAWSON rose to Order. He had been informed that two hon. Members who entered the Lobby had not been counted.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Tellers had done their duty, and counted all they could.

(4.) £101,933, to complete the sum for the Board of Trade.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had a question to ask the Government with respect to the Vote. He wished to know what arrangements had been made for filling up the very important office of Chief of the Statistical Department?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that, as he understood, the arrangements were incomplete; and he was, therefore, unable to answer the question of the hon. Member.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS thought the hon. Member (Mr. E. Stanhope) was clearly entitled to an answer.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had given Notice of an Amendment, which he trusted it would not be necessary to move.

There had been a prolonged debate at an earlier of the Session on the subject of the importation of oleomargarine and other butterine substances; and the question had been brought forward in consequence of the figures of the Board of Trade showing an enormous increase in these importations. It was not his intention to detain the Committee at that hour in discussing a matter which had already been fully gone into on a previous occasion; but he would mention that when he drew the attention of the Board of Trade officials to the fact that these products were coming into the country in great quantities, and that no cognizance was taken of them in the Statistical Department, he had not received from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade a very satisfactory answer. Perhaps, therefore, in the course of the debate upon this Vote, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to reply more completely. The fact was that there was an enormous quantity of the substances in question coming into the country—some in the form of oil, and some in the form of butter, while there was no record of the entries, except under terms that were quite delusive. They were, in fact, entered either as butter or lard. What he desired—and what he believed hon. Members would regard as a matter of very great importance—was that the Department should furnish the fullest information possible with respect to these imports, which were, after importation, sold as butter; and, therefore, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would be able to furnish, upon this subject, a satisfactory explanation, which would preclude the necessity of his moving the Amendment to which he had referred.

VISCOUNT SANDON wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade could furnish full information as to what had been done with respect to Mr. Giffen? He was informed that that gentleman was still partially engaged at the Board of Trade. When he (Viscount Sandon) left the Office, he had made a proposal to the Treasury that Mr. Giffen's position should be very considerably improved. He had felt the advantage of that gentleman's talents to the public, and, therefore, desired they should be retained in the Public Service; and, considering the increase of his duties, and the heavy responsibilities that attached to him, he had proposed to place him in the position of Assistant Secretary. The change of Government then took place, and his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer felt it would not be right to commit the country to that large change at a time when he was leaving Office. A Minute had been made to that effect. He had no doubt the President of the Board of Trade would be in a position to state to the Committee good reasons for not acceding to the proposal with regard to Mr. Giffen. He hoped also that some information might be given, if possible, about the changes which were to be made as to a Department of Agriculture and Commerce. He knew the subject was full of difficulties; but he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could state what was the scheme of the Government with regard to it. He could not but impress upon the Committee the great importance and use of the Statistical Department.

. Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, with regard to the last question of the noble Viscount (Viscount Sandon), the Prime Minister had some time ago stated that it was then impossible, on account of the pressure of public affairs, either for himself or his Colleagues to give that consideration to the subject which it required; but he proposed to consider it during the Recess, and to take action with regard to it on a future occasion. With regard to Mr. Giffen's position at the Board of Trade, he rather regretted the remarks of the noble Viscount, because he had referred to matters which, he considered, were of a confidential character, and quite apart from the subject of the Vote. He believed the noble Viscount would see that there was some inconvenience in referring to the matter, because there arose at once a conflict of testimony on the subject. He was compelled to say that he differed from the view of the case which had been taken by the noble Viscount, and would add that his view was not that taken by Mr. Giffen himself. Mr. Giffen's impression with regard to the matter was, that he had received a distinct promise from the noble Viscount that his position at the Board of Trade should be improved; and he seemed very much aggrieved by the fact that the noble Viscount had left Office without carrying out the pledge which he considered had been given. When Mr. Giffen made that statement, he (Mr. Chamberlain) considered it his duty to ask the noble Viscount privately whether he had given such a pledge; and the noble Viscount stated that he had not done so, or, at all events, that he did not recollect it. He, therefore, considered it impossible to pursue the matter any further. Mr. Giffen had only expressed his view of the affair, and the noble Viscount was, of course, entitled to state his recollection with regard to it. All that he (Mr. Chamberlain) knew officially with reference to the matter was that undoubtedly an application had been made by Mr. Giffen to the noble Viscount, who referred it to the Treasury, and that it was refused by that Department under the late Government. The present Government, therefore, had simply to consider whether they should do something which their Predecessors in Office had distinctly refused to do. They had not finally decided that they would not do what was asked of them. The matter was still under consideration, because he felt, especially after the experience which he had had of Mr. Giffen's value, that it was of importance to the Public Service that his services should be, if possible, retained. He was in communication with the Treasury upon this subject when Mr. Giffen had, as he believed, some offer made to him which he said would greatly improve his position, and which he felt himself justified in accepting; and, accordingly, he asked him (Mr. Chamberlain) to accept his resignation. When a Question was asked in the House by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart Wortley), he stated, in reply, that Mr. Giffen had resigned his position in the Service in order to better his prospects. Subsequently to that changes were contemplated in the Office, which would throw additional work on the Statistical Department, and he had then made another attempt to retain Mr. Giffen's services, and had so far succeeded that Mr. Giffen had, at all events, temporarily withdrawn his resignation, and his final position with respect to the Department would not be determined until the question of a Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture was decided.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, as the right hon. Gentleman was about to enter upon another subject, and as reference had been made to the Treasury in connection with this matter, he wished to express his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman was wrong in saying that the application with regard to Mr. Giffen was distinctly refused by the late Government. The matter came before him at the close of the late Administration, and the directions he had given were simply founded on the desire to leave the question open for their Successors. He had not expressed, on the merits of the case, any opinion against the promotion of Mr. Giffen.

VISCOUNT SANDON wished to make an explanation in reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, he had spoken with him (Viscount Sandon) on the subject; and he had told him that he, as his Successor in Office, was perfectly free to take whatever course that was best with respect to it. All that happened with regard to the Treasury was that his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he did not like to bind his Successors by a change which would involve considerable re-organization in the Department. It seemed to him that the two accounts of the transaction tallied perfectly well.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was sorry in any degree to differ from the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Sandon); but he could not admit that the two accounts actually tallied. He was afraid that the resignation of Mr. Giffen was largely due to his disappointment, owing to a promise which was not fulfilled. He would not enter into any discussion of the statement of the noble Viscount that he had not given any such promise. It was there that the difficulty arose. The noble Viscount had brought the matter before the Treasury in the time of the late Government; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) must remind the noble Viscount that Mr. Giffen's case was brought before him 12 months before the late Government went out of Office. There was, consequently, plenty of time at the disposal of the Department; and he could not understand why the matter had been left open to be dealt with by the present Government.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had done everything in his power to carry out the proposal with regard to Mr. Giffen; but it must be remembered that the Board of Trade could not influence the Treasury in matters of expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Chamberlain) had, no doubt, by that time discovered that in such matters he had rather hard masters in the Treasury.

MR. OTWAY said, he did not wish to interfere in the controversy between the President of the Board of Trade and the noble Viscount the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon); but it appeared to him that Mr. Giffen had, at any rate, resigned under the management of the noble Viscount, and withdrawn his resignation under that of the right hon. Gentleman. It was an unfortunate thing that the country should lose the services of an official when they became most valuable; and he would be glad to know whether it was in consequence of a refusal to make a reasonable advance on the salary enjoyed by Mr. Giffen that he offered to resign and deprive the country of his services. The country would lose the services of a very able and valuable man through what he could not help calling the penurious conduct of the Treasury in not giving proper salaries to their servants. What had they done within the last 10 minutes? He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade took part in the division which had taken place in reference to the Office of Lord Privy Seal; but here they had been granting money for an Office which had been declared by a responsible Minister, when out of Office, to be a sinecure, although, now that he was in Office, that responsible Minister voted for it—they had been voting money for a sinecure Office, and now they were going to lose the services of such a man as Mr. Giffen, because they would not make the addition to his salary which his long service demanded. That might be a very good sport to the Committee; but, out-of-doors, it was looked on as a very serious matter. He considered it most inconsistent to vote a sum of money for an Office that was declared to be a sinecure; and, at the same time, to refuse to treat public servants of value with that consideration which their services deserved.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, they were all delighted to hear from the President of the Board of Trade that he had good hopes of being able to retain the services of such a valuable man as Mr. Giffen; but it should be remembered that this gentleman's resignation did not take place under the régime of his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon), but under that of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain). The noble Viscount had explained that during the time he had held Office he had done his best to induce the Treasury to make an addition to Mr. Giffen's salary, but without success. It was no secret to the Committee that Ministers often made attempts of that kind, which did not succeed. The noble Viscount, however, had done his best; and then the right hon. Gentleman had come into Office and had made similar efforts. The right hon. Gentleman had as much influence with the Treasury as the noble Viscount; and yet he did not seem to have been any more successful; therefore, it could not be said that the resignation was due more to the action of the noble Viscount than to that of the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was not going into the vexed question between different Members of the Liberal Party, whether, in Office, they should continue to vote as they had done out of Office. The matter was one of good taste, and for their own consciences. Mr. Giffen was, undoubtedly, a most valuable public servant; and if his services could be retained, they ought to be, even at the expenditure of a little money by the Treasury.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the case of the Lord Privy Seal and that of Mr. Giffen stood upon a totally different footing, and should be decided each on its own merits. The Committee should avoid the danger of infusing too much personal matter into the discussion. When an increase of salary was given to a gentleman in Mr. Giffen's position, they must expect to see a large demand made for similar development in the case of the other officials of the Department, and the Under Secretaries at the Board of Trade were numerous. It was only a very few years since Mr. Giffen was appointed at a salary higher than that which had been received by his predecessor. An hon. Member had asked what arrangement had been come to, and that question had already been answered. All the questions which had been raised would be most carefully considered by the Cabinet during the Recess. It was probable that great changes would have to be made; and if, in the process of making them, it was found that the position of Mr. Giffen could be improved, he was sure that it would be done. He should be very glad if some arrangement could be made by which the services of Mr. Giffen could be retained.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF wished to know what were the duties of the Translator to the Board of Trade? From a document published by the Chambers of Commerce, it appeared that the translation of the French Treaty was withheld in consequence of the expense to which it would put the country. Well, seeing that they had a Translator at a salary of £400 a-year, he thought the cost of the translation need not have been very great if the Translator had done his duty. What were the duties of the Translators, if they were not to translate documents in the interest of the Board of Trade?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The duty of the Translator to the Board of Trade is to translate all such foreign documents as are required. I can assure the hon. Gentleman (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that the Translator is fully employed. As to the question of butterine, referred to by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore), the Board of Trade have no control over the classification the Customs adopt of the imported articles referred to. The moment I saw the nature of the Motion of my hon. Friend, I communicated with the Customs on the subject; and I have received a reply from them which, I am afraid, will not be satisfactory to the hon. Member, but which I am bound to put before the Committee. Oleomargarine, they say, is an oil, and when imported in large quantities in that form is classed under the head of animal oil, and not butterine. When, however, it comes over in the more finished form of butterine, which is either animal fat alone or animal fat mixed with a smaller or greater proportion of pure butter, then it is classified as butter, and the Customs say they do not think it would be practicable or expedient to alter the classification. In the first place, they say it would be extremely difficult to distinguish between pure butter—real butter—and the artificial compound. I do not think they say the analysis would be impossible, but that it would be expensive and difficult. Then they say that all the butter, and butterine products, are perishable, and that if they are detained for any length of time for purposes of analysis they may be rendered valueless. And, lastly, they say that as there is nothing either in appearance, taste, or smell to distinguish butter from butterine, if a test were adopted every consignment of the article called butter which came through the Customs would have to be tested, which would entail enormous labour and expense. I have said this will not be satisfactory to the hon. Member, and I must confess it is not satisfactory to myself. I cannot but believe that we might be able to hit upon some means of distinguishing, without incurring the difficulty and expense which the Customs suggest. I hope the time will come when the Board of Trade, which has to do with commercial matters in this House, and, above all, with statistical matters concerning the commerce of the country, will have control over the statistics of the country. In the meantime, what I propose to do is to communicate again with the Customs, and suggest that they should appoint someone to meet some representative of the Board of Trade, in order to revise this classification, and see if some better plan could not be adopted.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that as to the difficulty suggested in the matter of analysis, he believed it to be simply without foundation. It was one of the easiest things in the world to distinguish between spurious butters and real butters. The simple test of the application of heat would at once show which was the real and which was the spurious article. The answer which had been given to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade from the Customs was one of the ordinary red-tape replies, suggesting considerable difficulty and declaring the impossibility of any change. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not remain satisfied with the first rebuff he received from another Department. The question was one of great importance, as it affected the health of the whole community. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance of it.

Mr. Chamberlain

Butter came into consumption in every family in the Kingdom; and they had reason to know that, though oleomargarine might not be bad or deleterious in itself, it was mixed with spurious and injurious matter, which could easily spread broadcast all kinds of fearful diseases. Parliament should not remain content unless this matter were taken up and treated as a matter of great importance.

MR. A. MOORE said, he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade for the kind answer he had given. It was clear that, whatever difficulty existed, it was not of the making of the Board of Trade, but of a Department which was not altogether amenable to that House. If large quantities of this oleomargarine were coming into the country in iron casks, there could be no excuse for the Customs not making a distinction between that and other oils. He saw the difficulty of dealing with a beautifully made-up butter, because, in opening and testing it, it might perish; but he would make this remark—that, owing to the Dutch law—and it was from Holland that the best qualities came—every pound was sold under its own name, although next day, perhaps, it was sold in London under another name. He did not consider the answer the hon. Member had received was satisfactory, although he did not blame the right hon. Gentleman.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked whether he would be in Order, at this point, in referring to British seamen at Pernambuco?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: No.

MR. BIGGAR thought the answer given by the President of the Board of Trade to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. A. Moore) was very unsatisfactory. There was a large quantity of stuff imported into London from various places under the name of "butter." Some of it came from France, and a large quantity was imported from Holland in casks and fancy packages. It would not keep more than a day or two, and unless it was used at once it became thoroughly rancid and unsaleable. The Customs would not examine the stuff for the protection of the public, lest some of it should get spoilt. There were three kinds of this material; one was a kind of butter, another was a mixture of butter and animal fat, and the third was animal fat by itself. What could be more easy than for the authorities to say that in the bill of lading it should be specified whether the article imported was or was not animal fat, a mixture of butter and animal fat, or butter alone? The cask in which the stuff came should be branded, so as to show what it contained; and in that case they would not have tallow sold for butter, as was often the case at the present time. This matter was most important for two reasons—first of all, because it was dishonest and unfair to the consumer to make him pay the price of butter when the article he was supplied with was really not butter at all. In the next place, it was unfair to agriculturists who had to compete in the market with pure butter. The agriculturist would get a much higher price in the market for his genuine manufactured article had he not to compete with a spurious imitation. The Committee should insist far more strongly than it had done on the Government protecting the consumers and producers of butter in the United Kingdom. The greatest facilities were offered to the manufacturers of this artificial and adulterated stuff; and the agriculturists were allowed to suffer a reduced price of the real article, as well as restrictions placed on the importation of cattle. The Government, he thought, ought to do two things. First, they should throw all the obstacles they could in the way of the importation of this counterfeit butter; and, in the next place, they should exert themselves to see that the poor of London were not imposed upon, and that the stuff, if sold at all, should be sold under its proper name. The Committee knew very well that during three or four months of the year nine-tenths of what was sold in London as butter was not butter at all. It was almost impossible, in point of fact, for good and pure butter to be obtained retail in London in the spring and winter months; and the Government were not doing their duty in trying to screen a lot of people who were of the vilest description, and who did enormous injury by their conduct.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL urged the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade not to be deterred from a consideration of this subject by the arguments that protection should be given to the consumers in this country. He was quite aware that Protection had an ugly sound in the ears of the right hon. Gentleman opposite; but he trusted that the day was not far distant when it would have a far more ugly sound. The principal reason urged by the President of the Board of Trade for not going further into the matter at present was the difficulty of detecting the difference between the spurious and the real article; but he (Sir Herbert Maxwell) believed researches had been made into the matter, and he was told by men of science that the two substances were chemically identical, or nearly so, but that it was quite possible for experts to detect the difference. He was told that when in a state of liquefaction by heat the real article went into a state which was quite unattainable by the spurious article, and that if it was placed on a hot plate, and subjected to a certain degree of heat, an amount of granulation was produced which could not be got rid of, and which was apparent to the eye of the expert. He thought the excuse of the right hon. Gentleman was unworthy of the great Department he represented. He sheltered himself behind the technical difficulty of ascertaining the difference between the two articles. That was not worthy of him or his Department. Difficulties were meant to be overcome; and if the right hon. Gentleman was fully alive to the necessity of overcoming this difficulty that would be done.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, it had been asserted by the answer which the right hon. Gentleman had read from the Customs Department that it was difficult to distinguish between butter and butterine; but he (Viscount Folkestone) wished to point out that even if there was that great difficulty, that very difficulty was in favour of the Motion of which Notice had been given, because if the detection of the difference was difficult to experts who had some knowledge of the matter, it would be far more difficult for consumers, who simply went into the market to buy butter, to distinguish between butter and butterine, and they would be all the more open to fraud from those who passed off the adulterated article. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would quickly do what he had said he would do—namely, devise some plan by which it would be possible for Custom House officers to distinguish between the two articles, so that the consuming public might know what they were getting.

MR. DUCKHAM thought the farmers of England had a right to ask for some measure for placing the spurious article in its proper name before the public. The analytical chemist was employed to detect the adulteration in milk, coffee, and other articles of consumption, and surely he could detect the spurious article which was sold in the name of butter. He had seen advertisements in different papers of butter which was called "Prime American" at 6*d.* or 8*d.* per lb., when he had seen that in America butter was quoted at 1*s.* 6*d.* and 1*s.* 8*d.* per lb. It must be obvious that this was an imposition on consumers in this country; and he thought that whatever the article was, it should be called by its proper name, and not be brought into competition with our own article under a false name.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Gentleman is wandering far away from the question. The only question is as to the statistics prepared under the authority of the Board of Trade; and, in reference to that, I have given a reply which I am glad to find is satisfactory—namely, that I will, at the earliest possible moment, endeavour, with the Custom House officers, to devise means by which the classification may be altered and the importation of these things kept separate in the Return. Then, my hon. Friend (Mr. Duckham) raises a totally different question—namely, the desirability of taking care that the retailer shall sell these things under their right name. Everything that legislation can do to secure that has been done already. My hon. Friend points out that the chemist, the expert, and the analyst are employed now to analyze milk; but the same analyst may, under the same circumstances and under the same responsibility, analyze these articles; and there have, as a matter of fact, been a certain number of convictions of retailers for selling butterine as butter. If my hon. Friend has any reason to believe that butter is being sold under a false name in any case, all he has to do is to go to the county authority and the law will give him a remedy.

MR. BIGGAR thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had evaded the real point of the case. It was not contended that the law was not sufficiently strong to put down this system of selling adulterated articles, but that the Government had not put the law into operation. It was all very well to say that a few convictions had taken place; but, as a matter of fact, for months in London such a thing as pure butter was hardly to be obtained. It was very well for the Government to enforce laws when it suited their own purpose, and at other times, because it conflicted with something they called Free Trade not to do so. He did not pretend to be a Protectionist himself; but he would protect consumers from spurious goods.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN explained that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was entirely mistaken, for, whatever the intentions of the Government might be, they had no power in the matter. The execution of the law was left to the local authorities, and not to the Government; it rested entirely with them, and not with the Central Department.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had either mistaken the point he brought forward, or the point raised by the hon. Member below him (Mr. A. Moore). His own remarks were addressed, not to the local traffic—not to the sale by the retailers—but to the importation of an article which was admittedly brought to this country for the purpose of adulteration. There was no known use for the substance known as oleomargarine, except that of being mixed with genuine butter, or else being turned into the article known as butterine. Those were the two sole uses for it. Oleomargarine was coming into this country in largely increasing quantities; and all he asked was that the Board of Trade should show how much of the stuff was introduced, and in what proportion it was increasing.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR would not venture on such a slippery ground as butter or oleomargarine; but he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade a question with regard to fees for professional orders. He saw that there was an amount of £1,400 a-year realized by those fees. The Chief Secretary for Ireland some time ago laid on the Table of the House a Return which showed among other things that the Office of Public Works in Ireland, when it granted a Provisional Order, only charged the absolute expenses; but the Board of Trade, for Provisional Orders which affected Ireland, charged a fee of £35 each towards the expenses, when the draft order was deposited, and from that sum of £35 a fee of £10 10s. was paid by the Board of Trade to counsel for settling the Order, so that it would appear that the Board of Trade made a profit of £24 10s. on every Provisional Order passed affecting Ireland. He wished to ask whether it would not be possible for the Board of Trade to follow the same plan in regard to Orders affecting Ireland as that followed by the Office of Public Works in Ireland? Then, on page 102, the Committee would find a perfectly new matter introduced into this Vote, amounting to £3,100, which consisted of fees to Receivers of Wreck and the Coastguard, with travelling and incidental expenses under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. 1854 was some time back, and there never had been such a charge as this on the Estimate for these Services. The expenses connected with the Receiver of Wreck's duties had always been defrayed from the proceeds of wrecks, and a Return furnished to the House pursuant to Act of Parliament in connection with the Mercantile Marine Fund showed that the proceeds of the sale of wreck within the year was £3,329; while the fees and commissions received by the Receiver of Wreck amounted to £3,273, making a total of £6,602, which went to the remuneration and contingent expenses of the Receiver of Wreck. He believed that last Session an Act was passed entitled "The Merchant Shipping Fees and Expenses Act," by which the application of the proceeds of wreck to the payment of the Receiver of Wreck was sanctioned; and, that being so, he could not see the necessity of throwing the expenses connected with these Services on this Vote. On the the first page, £3,100 were put down as among extra receipts. That was the same sum as was charged against the public on page 102, so that the public were not at any loss on account of this innovation; but, whatever might be put down as extra expenses on the first page of this Vote, the introduction at a later page to a charge of £3,100 saddled this Vote with a permanent charge of that amount, which could never be got rid of until the officers receiving the money were pensioned. Hitherto, the wreck had paid its own expenses, and the account had year by year diminished, and the fees might be expected to dwindle down to what was just enough to cover the expenses. He thought it was very bad policy to introduce a sum like this as Exchequer Extra Receipts; and he hoped the Government might have some explanation respecting it beyond anything that he was able to suggest or conceive.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the hon. Member (Mr. O'Connor) had asked two separate questions. The first was, why the charges in connection with Provisional Orders differed from those which were made in reference to Public Works in Ireland?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR hoped the right hon. Gentleman would excuse him while he explained what the real point was. His statement was that, according to the Official Returns furnished by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Board of Trade paid a fee of £10 10s. to the counsel consulted in regard to the issue of a Provisional Order; but the Board previously levied a deposit of £35 from the promoters, so that they made a profit of £24 10s. out of every Provisional Order that was issued, whereas the Irish Board of Works charged nothing beyond the absolute expenses.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he did not know how the hon. Gentleman (Mr. O'Connor) got his information that the Irish Board of Works did not charge anything beyond the actual expenses.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked, that it was so stated in a Return presented to the House.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the hon. Member assumed that because the Board of Trade paid £10 10s. as a fee to counsel, that was the whole cost to the Board. The hon. Member seemed to forget that the Board of Trade had all their office expenses to pay in addition to the fees to counsel. There was no legislation so cheap, so convenient, or that gave rise to so little dissatisfaction subsequently, as this system of legislation by Provisional Orders. The greatest care was taken to see that the Orders were drawn up so as to give as little trouble, and inflict as small an amount of injustice as possible; and he did not believe that the charges made by the Board of Trade had ever been considered excessive by those in whose service the Provisional Orders were issued. In regard to the second point, the hon. Gentleman seemed to attach too much importance to what was, after all, a mere change in the mode of presenting the accounts. The object of the change was to give to the House of Commons more and more detailed information; and the plan had been adopted, for the first time that year, of showing in the Votes the exact amount of the fees charged. There was no fear that the fees would continue to be charged long after the work ceased, because they were apportioned to the work, and all the money received was paid into the Exchequer.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, in regard to the first point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, wished to remind him that if the Board had office expenses in connection with Provisional Orders beyond the sums paid in the shape of fees to counsel, so also had the Department of Board of Works in Ireland. All he contended was, that if the Board of Works could furnish a Provisional Order, when petitioned for, at the absolute expense they had been put to in connection with it, the same course might be taken by the Board of Trade in similar cases. In regard to the second point, he wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that although, unquestionably, they had now in the Board of Trade Vote, at page 102, a detailed account such as had never been supplied before, yet it was not a question of the sum of money absolutely paid as fees which had been introduced at all. The sum put down was a good round sum of £2,200 for the Receivers, and another sum of £800 for the Coastguard. He understood that that was not a varying sum, but a permanent charge. Personally, he thought that that was a very unsatisfactory, and even dangerous way of giving the information.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was very much surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. O'Connor) had raised that debate. His hon. Friend had gone at considerable length into a matter of account, and had attacked what had constantly been pressed upon the Government by Committee of Supply—namely, that in making payments they should set forth what the payments were for, and if they had receipts that they should give them a statement. He believed that that was the best course of checking the public expenditure. It was the course adopted in regard to many other accounts, and he hoped it would be universally adopted. Certainly, if the Government constituted a number of new offices, and suddenly saddled the public with a new charge, there would be ample justification for attacking them; but, in this case, the charges complained of were simply fees that were payable on a certain transaction being completed, and the Committee had before them not the fees actually payable in the course of the year, but an estimate of them given in a round sum. He should like to have some information from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade in reference to one of these items—namely, a salary of £1,000, advancing to £1,200, to one of the Assistant Secretaries, who also received £500 a-year for performing the work of auditor in connection with the Metropolis Water Act of 1871. He had no doubt that the duties performed were highly important, and he believed there was a charge made upon the Metropolitan Water Companies to provide the remuneration; but he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman how far the duties this gentleman had to perform under the Metropolitan Companies Water Act interfered with the duties he was called on to fulfil as the salaried officer of a Public Department? As the sum paid by the Metropolitan Water Companies was large, he presumed that the work rendered was substantial; and he should like to know whether the extra work was done during the time which ought to be devoted to the Public Service? He hoped to hear some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the arrangement to which his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) referred was undoubtedly an anomalous one; but it was one which had been in existence for a good many years, and it had been brought before the Committee each year since it had been entered into. He could not go back to the time the appointment was first made, or state the reasons for it, because he was not in the House at the time. He could only say, in regard to the way in which it worked now, that he believed a great deal of the work was done out of office hours, and in no way interfered with the work done for the Crown. Mr. Stoneham, who performed the two duties, was a very valuable officer, and fully worth the whole of the sum he received from the State for the work rendered to the Department.

Mr. Chamberlain

Vote agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT moved that the Chairman report Progress. It was then half-past 1 o'clock in the morning, and it would be necessary for the House to meet again at 2 in the afternoon. He was sure that the Government would not, under the circumstances, desire to continue the Committee.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN assented.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot,)—put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUMMARY PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND)
AMENDMENT BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 216.]
(The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Application).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, to insert at the end of the clause—

"The provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall also apply to prosecutions under the Tweed Fisheries Acts: Provided always, That it shall be in the option of the prosecutor to proceed either under the forms of the Tweed Fisheries Acts, or under the forms of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, further Amendment made, in page 2, line 21, by leaving out from "this" to "1864," and inserting "the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Regulation of expenses).

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, the scale of fees allowed by one of the clauses was so low as, perhaps, to amount to a discouragement of prosecution, and therefore to interfere with the course of justice.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) explained, that when the Bill was introduced in the House of Lords, some objections were made to the scale of fees, and a slight increase was made, and since then he had not heard that any complaint was made that the fees were too low.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACT, 1880,
AMENDMENT BILL.—[Lords.]—[BILL 226.]
(Mr. Courtney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY said, the Bill was intended to legalize the sale of certain birds in the United Kingdom, which, notwithstanding that the birds had been lawfully killed here or had been killed abroad, could not now be sold under the Act of last year. He trusted the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Courtney,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LUNACY LAW AMENDMENT (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 192.]
(Mr. Dillwyn, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Benjamin T. Williams.)

COMMITTEE.

ORDER DISCHARGED. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order for Committee read.

MR. DILLWYN, in moving that the Order be discharged, said, he believed there were some points in the Bill which the Home Office did not consider would work satisfactorily. He therefore begged to move that the Order be discharged. At the same time, as the Department had expressed a general approval of the measure, he hoped that at the earliest possible date the matter would be taken in hand by Her Majesty's Government.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter
before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 29th July, 1881.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Leases for Schools (Ireland) * (188); Land Law (Ireland) * (187).

Second Reading—Public Loans (Ireland) Remission * (176).

Committee—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act
(1877) Amendment * (164).

Committee—Report—Universities of Oxford and Cambridge (Statutes) * (178); Turnpike Acts
Continuance * (170); Patriotic Fund * (183);
Customs (Officers) * (168).

Third Reading—Universities (Scotland) Registration of Parliamentary Voters, &c. * (173);
British Honduras (Court of Appeal) * (167);
Pedlars (Certificates) * (163); Metallic Mines
(Gunpowder) * (169); Seed Supply and other Acts (Ireland) Amendment * (177), and passed.

MINISTERS STIPENDS, &c. (SCOTLAND).

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF MINTO, in rising to call attention to the position and prospects of the question of reform of the Law of Teinds in Scotland; also to move for a “Return for each county in Scotland of the name of every parish in which an augmentation was made of ministers stipend and of allowances for communion elements respectively during the period that has elapsed since the 20th March 1876; also the name of each parish in which there are unexhausted teinds, and the amount applicable to the augmentation of ministers stipends, &c. in each such parish (in continuation of former Return, No. 242, 1876,)”

said, my Lords, I am always reluctant to occupy even a few minutes of your Lordships' time in this House; but the abandonment by Her Majesty's Government of a somewhat important Bill, under the pressure of strange influences, ought not, I think, to be passed over quite without notice. I shall not enter upon the general subject of Teind Law, and beg only to mention that Teind Law constitutes a part, and a very ugly part too, of the Land Laws of Scotland, and that in every transaction relating to the buying or selling of land careful investigations require to be made, sometimes with very uncertain results, relative to the state of the teinds on the property concerned, and in the parish in which it is situated. I must also mention that teinds, in the present signification of the words, is something very different from tithes, as formerly understood. In point of fact, there are no tithes in Scotland now, as they were commuted into a rent-charge about 250 years ago. The teinds of Scotland may now be concisely and correctly described as being that portion of the gross rental of Scotland which is appropriated to the payment of the stipends of parish ministers, or is liable at a future time to be so appropriated. In the early part of this Session Her Majesty's Ministers introduced a Bill called the Teinds (Scotland) Bill, which was read a second time some weeks later without opposition. The Bill sought to place on a clear and intelligible basis the liabilities of landed property in respect of teinds. It sought to place the relations of proprietors on the one hand and parish ministers on the other—namely, the payers and receivers of stipends—upon an easy and amicable footing. It sought to put an end to the expenses and litigation which the present law promotes, and almost necessitates. It sought to effect these objects by the drawing up of an inventory for the information of all concerned, as an authoritative exposition of the state of teinds in every parish of Scotland. The Bill was absolutely and carefully unpolitical in its character, and was totally unconnected with the question of Establishment or Disestablishment. Perhaps the best exposition of the purport and character of the measure is contained in the pointed note prefixed to the Teinds (Scotland) Bill, which I shall, therefore, read to the House—

Mr. Dilhoun

“The Bill has been prepared at the request of a number of landed proprietors representing the counties of Scotland. Its object is to complete the valuation of the tithes of Scotland, and to make up a roll of tithes in each parish under judicial authority. The want of such a roll has been the cause of a great amount of litigation and uncertainty as to the extent of the liabilities of proprietors of estates to the Church. The Bill does not provide for commutation of tithes, nor does it increase or lessen the liability of owners, or shift the incidence of the burden of the tithes in any way. It is purely executive, and aims only at ascertaining the rights and liabilities of parties interested, according to the existing law, in a more summary and inexpensive manner than is possible under the existing statutory procedure."

Now, I venture to assert that the only two classes of men who are directly interested in the simplification of the Teind Laws were virtually agreed in supporting the principle of this Bill. But it has always been said in Scotland that there is one powerful class—the Legal Profession—who are interested in maintaining the present system in consequence of the harvest of litigation that it engenders. But, in point of fact, the most zealous and most efficient Teind Law reformers are members of the Legal Profession of all grades—Judges, Sheriffs, agents, solicitors, are all of one mind in condemnation of the existing law. They feel it as a reproach to Scottish law that so barbarous a state of things, and so ruinous to their clients, should be suffered to continue. But if all these classes—heritors, ministers, and lawyers—unite in condemning the present Law of Teinds, to what influence is the obstruction due which has proved fatal to the Bill of the Lord Advocate? The answer is clear and simple. The influence which has been so efficacious was a purely sectarian one. The word has been passed from high sectarian authority that, in the interests of the question of Disestablishment, all legislation for the reform of the Teind Laws must be opposed at all hazards. The worse the condition of these laws, the greater will be the unpopularity of Church institutions, and the greater will be the popularity of an agitation for Disestablishment. Expensive litigation, and plenty of it, between heritors and ministers, and between heritors inter se, seems to be the aim and prayer of the enemies of the Church. The spirit which animates the opponents of all reform in the Law of Teinds may be seen in the following resolutions of the United Presbyterian Synod, agreed to on the 11th July. They resolve—

" That the working of the system of the Established Church, which is invariably wrong in principle, and its exactions in the matters of church and manse rates, augmentations of stipends and otherwise, have not been more offensive or injurious for a generation than they are at present; and that disestablishment, and nothing short of it, as the only legislative redress to the non-established churches and great body of citizens, and the sole remedy of the religious scandal, ought not to be delayed without urgent cause. . . . That they have learned of the withdrawal of this objectionable measure (the Teinds Bill) on the 4th July. That they have since heard with astonishment of a proposal of the Lord Advocate to re-introduce the Bill on an early day. That they resolve, in the event of an attempt to resuscitate the Bill, to take such steps as they see cause for its prevention, and for raising the whole question of disestablishment in connection with it."

I think it is desirable that these things should be known and appreciated as regards the past; but I, for my part, would have passed them over in silence had it not been my belief that the same influences which have prevailed this Session against the cause of reform will operate with even greater force in future, as the time of a General Election approaches. I conclude by moving for the Returns of which I have given Notice.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: My Lords, every part of the noble Earl's statement, so far as my knowledge goes, is perfectly and entirely accurate. The Bill introduced into the other House of Parliament dealing with the subject of teinds is a useful measure, and well calculated to effect the object in view. In the discussion in the other House of Parliament, so far as I am aware, no successful attack was made on the principle of the measure. It was desired extremely by the landlords and clergy of Scotland, and it was opposed by those who are very zealous for the immediate or approximate Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. The Bill was dropped in the other House in consequence of pressure of Business, and owing to the opposition it received from a certain section of the Liberal Party. There is no chance of that measure being introduced this Session, and I am not able to make any promise with regard to next Session. The matter is receiving the consideration of the Government; but they were unable to state when the matter could be dealt with. There is no objection to give the Return moved for.

Motion agreed to.

Address for—

"Return for each county in Scotland of the name of every parish in which an augmentation was made of ministers stipend and of allowances for communion elements respectively during the period that has elapsed since the 20th March 1876; also the name of each parish in which there are unexhausted teinds, and the amount applicable to the augmentation of ministers stipend, &c. in each such parish (in continuation of former Return, No. 242, 1876)."—(The Earl of Minto.)

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS NEAR ST.
MARGARET'S CHURCH.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to ask, Whether, before coming to any determination as to the contemplated improvements near Saint Margaret's, Her Majesty's Government will consider how far it is desirable to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on Public Buildings of 1878? said, he had put this Question on the Paper, because he had seen in the public journals a statement that Her Majesty's Government intended to give the not very large sum of £1,000 towards the improvement of the ground near St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. The Metropolitan Board of Works, it was stated, would give another £1,000, and the Government intended to appeal to the public to subscribe the other £2,000 that would be required. He would not ask their Lordships to express an opinion as to whether this was a very dignified mode of proceeding to raise £4,000 for effecting improvements near the Houses of Parliament. At all events, the circumstance of the Government giving £1,000 indicated that they took an interest in the improvement of the ground in the vicinity of the Houses of Parliament. When he brought this question forward last year Her Majesty's Government said they were involved in so many wars that there was no money available for any improvement of the Metropolis. But now it was stated that owing to the policy of the Government there was profound peace in Afghanistan and South Africa; and, therefore, he took the present opportunity of asking the Government whether they meant to do anything in the way of giving effect to the recommendations of the Committee of 1878. In the opinion of that Committee, it would be economical to borrow £1,500,000. However, he would leave that part of the Report alone, and would only ask whether Her Majesty's Government intended to take down the houses at the end of Parliament Street? The approach to the Houses of Parliament was now a disgrace to the country. Moreover, to leave it in its present state would lead to increased expenditure, as the Government would eventually have to pay more for the leases of the houses. The Government could very well afford to spend £200,000 in buying up the buildings, and they had better do it at once, because, in consequence of the policy which the Government had adopted, they might possibly be engaged in a new Transvaal War by this time next year. The improvement of a great Metropolis was a question worthy of the consideration of statesmen. The French, after paying some milliards of francs to the Germans, voted, in one year, £1,000,000 sterling for the improvement of Paris, and in Spain, the Government had lately expended £2,000,000 in the improvement of the capital. He trusted Her Majesty's Government would be able to hold out a hope that effect would soon be given to the recommendations of the Committee of 1878.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that he never knew a time, since he had anything to do with public life, when this question was not under the consideration of statesmen. It was under the consideration of the Government of which he was formerly a Member; it was, doubtless, under the consideration of the late Government; and it was under the consideration of the present Government. Therefore, as far as the consideration of statesmen was concerned, his noble Friend had no reason to complain. He understood his noble Friend to argue that, as they were now in a state of profound peace, and were, consequently, relieved from a large war expenditure, this would be the proper time to spend some £2,000,000 on public buildings. He could assure his noble Friend that to embark in the scheme which had been recommended would be to ask for an expenditure that could not be counted by hundreds of thousands. The whole matter had always been one of very great difficulty. Individually, he did not like any more than his noble Friend to see the block of houses in Parliament Street; but, on the other hand, there were a variety of matters to be determined before they were pulled down. The most important part of the whole subject was the convenience of the public offices. He was afraid lest his noble Friend should be dissatisfied with the only answer he was able to give him. That answer was that the subject was really under the earnest consideration of the Government, which would in a very short time, owing to the pressure from the War Office and the Admiralty for further accommodation, have to decide what scheme should be adopted for the extension of those Offices; and that, of course, would involve deciding whether to act on the recommendations of the Committee of 1878.

WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in rising to present a Petition from the National Health Society; and to ask, Whether any measures have been taken, or are in preparation, by Her Majesty's Government for improving the water supply of the Metropolis? said, that this question was one that very much affected the welfare of the Metropolis, and the Petition which he had presented expressed dissatisfaction at the continued delay in reference to legislation upon this subject. The injuries to health arose, in a great degree, from the intermittent supply of water over a great part of the Metropolis, by which water was wasted, spoiled by storage in dirty cisterns, and the basement of houses soaked and made unhealthy; and the Petitioners expressly drew attention to the excess of fires and consequent loss of life being a proved excess of two-thirds beyond the insurable rate in towns where there was a constant supply of water. He sympathized very much with the Petitioners, inasmuch as, from his experience as a London clergyman, he believed that an insufficient supply of water, such as existed in many parts of London, was injurious to the cleanliness, and, consequently, to the temperance, the morals, and, in the last resort, the religion of the population. The working classes living in the West of London were particularly ill-supplied. In the East of London a continuous supply of water was much more common than it was at the West End.

Their Lordships were probably not aware of what the habitations of the labouring classes were, especially in the Western part of London. In Westminster, Soho, and partially St. Pancras, labouring men and their families inhabited, for the most part, single rooms in houses of considerable size, that were built at the end of the 17th or the beginning of the 18th century, and were originally occupied by gentlemen; and the rent was about 5s. for each room. He had visited whole streets of such houses, going from house to house, and his experience was that water was only supplied to them for an hour or half an hour daily, and collected in a water butt in the basement, from which a large portion of it escaped, rendering the underground portion of the buildings damp and unhealthy. The families living in the different flats were obliged to carry all their water upstairs, and when a woman with a family and a baby had to go into the basement and fetch up every drop of water that was required, they might be sure that she would do with as little as possible. It was distressing to see how a family coming up from the country gradually deteriorated in their habits of cleanliness. Then, it was hardly necessary to say, a dirty room was but a poor counterbalance to the temptations of the public-house, and the water in a cistern which might not have been cleaned out for years was not a very inviting draught. All these facts were well known. Committee after Committee and Commission after Commission had sat on the subject; and it was agreed on all hands that the first step towards an improvement in the quality and in the distribution of water in the Metropolis was to consolidate the various agencies of supply. It was only some supreme power that could effect the necessary improvements by obtaining water from better sources, and supplying it in sufficient quantities. By giving a continuous supply, a great waste of water would be got rid of, and this should lead to a great reduction in the cost of supply. There would be a great saving also from the better means of extinguishing fires. No doubt, when negotiations were entered into with the Water Companies, the scheme prepared by the late Mr. Smith showed that a very large sum of money would be required for the purchase of the existing

the Vestries became alarmed; it was reconsidered, and then voted against. Though, however, the cost would be very great, it came in mind that the longer it was deferred the greater the cost of carrying it out. In 1845 the population had increased to 560,000 in the districts of the Metropolitan water supply, and the population of houses was still increasing. In Hammersmith, for instance, it was computed that 100 houses were completed every month of the Thames four were completed every day. According to the general estimate, the chief increase in population occurred in the outer suburbs, the increase in that district having amounted to 50 per cent. while in the inner circle it had increased 10 per cent. This increase in population, of course, necessitated a constant supply of water day by day, and the machinery, mains, pipes, &c. Now, the new works under the Metropolitan Water Companies were being carried out on exactly the same principles as prevailed long ago, so that the old systems were being replaced upon a vast scale. When the matter should be taken in hand by the Government, not only would the cost be largely increased, but all the work done by the Companies would have to be undertaken de novo. The circumstances pointed to the necessity of avoiding further delay. It was felt that the valuable property of the Companies must be bought. To ascertain what price would be given recourse might be had to the Government. This initial step, he might say, could be taken without the intervention of an Act of Parliament. If the Government could assure the House that the Bill would be taken, or were about to be taken, to improve the water supply in the Metropolis, the announcement would be received with very great thankfulness and satisfaction by the large population of London, who were suffering from the present arrangements for the supply in health, comfort, and convenience.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he agreed with the right rev. Prelate that the Government fully recognized the importance of this question. It was the intention of the Government to introduce into Parliament to introduce into Parliament this Session a Bill dealing with the question on the basis of the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which sat last year; but the state of Public Business had made it impossible for the Government to do so. Their Lordships would understand that in dealing with a matter of this kind, in which large pecuniary interests were involved, it would scarcely be prudent to proceed unless with some reasonable prospect of a successful and final issue. The Government hoped and expected to deal with the matter next year.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he agreed with the right rev. Prelate that delay was most undesirable, and was of opinion that some of the recommendations of the Committee who had investigated the subject were of a nature to cause delay, should the Government determine to act upon them. He would urge the Government to proceed with this matter, as a large number of houses were constantly being erected, the population growing rapidly; and the costs resulting from the separate and independent action of the Water Companies in constructing mains and reservoirs would be much larger than if the works were done by one body under a uniform system. He thought that the Local Government Board, who could command the services of thoroughly competent engineers, might advantageously take the initiative, and begin at once to prepare for legislation. He could confirm what had been said as to the unsatisfactory water-butts and cistern arrangements in very many houses which were let out in tenements, and there could be no doubt whatever that it was most desirable that there should be a constant supply of water. By various Acts of Parliament the Companies, if required, were bound to furnish a constant supply; but, owing to the want of unanimity and co-operation among householders, the cases were very rare where a constant supply was obtained. The question was one of the highest importance, both as regarded sanitary matters, fire, and intemperance, which was largely increased by the want of pure water.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he desired to point out that if any nuisance existed in consequence of a short supply of water, the sanitary authorities of the district could take cognizance of it. In many cases the owners of houses did not take proper care that the occupiers obtained a supply of water. The Companies were bound to supply water, and if they did not the sanitary authorities should interfere and compel them to do so. The condition of the cisterns was also a matter for the sanitary authorities, and did not concern the Water Companies, who were frequently blamed indiscriminately for things for which they were not responsible.

TURKEY — MIDHAT PASHA — FULFILMENT OF SENTENCE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, in rising to ask the Government, Whether their influence at Constantinople is being exercised to arrest proceedings in the case of Midhat Pasha? said, he hoped that in the absence—which he regretted—of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, some Member of the Government would be able to give an answer to his Question. No doubt all the Members of the Government knew what answer to give, because the Prime Minister really decided these matters, and his Colleagues must be in possession of his views. The fate of Midhat Pasha was a question in which the people of this country took great interest. There was no doubt that he had not had a fair trial, and obstacles were put in the way of his defending himself. There was little doubt that Abdul Aziz had put an end to his own life; and he thought that the public law of Europe, about which so much had been said of late years, should be put in motion on his behalf. It might be said that public law would be an obstacle to exercising influence to arrest proceedings in the case; but if that were so, public law had been set at nought by every Ambassador whom the Queen had employed at Constantinople recently.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he regretted the course which the noble Lord had taken, as damaging to his consistency, since he usually respected the Law of Nations; but now he asked the Government to do something which was quite contrary to it. He was not only asking them to obtain a commutation of the sentence passed on Midhat Pasha, but to arrest proceedings. A month ago the noble Lord intimated that the Foreign Secretary had not the control of the Foreign Office, but that the Prime Minister had; and the Prime Minister had stated in "another place" that this was a case in which the Government had not the right to interfere. The noble Lord should have been satisfied with that answer. When Midhat Pasha was Grand Vizier he was responsible for what was going on at Constantinople; and after the time that Sultan Abdul Aziz Khan's death took place he did not institute any inquiry into any of the circumstances that had surrounded it. No doubt, it was unfortunate that in the recent trial the Ottoman Government had adopted European forms; and it would have been better if the Turkish Government had followed their own forms of trial in this case. However, he had no doubt that substantial justice had been done to Midhat Pasha. The present Question was, moreover, unnecessary, because the sentence had already been commuted, and Midhat Pasha was going into a healthy climate where there need be no fear on account of his health. Midhat Pasha was a good administrator in Bulgaria, but he had been too much praised for what he had done; and, on the whole, he was an ignorant rather than a learned man. However, in Midhat Pasha's present situation, he would rather not make further observations upon his administration of affairs. There was no ground for any alarm in regard to the country to which he was banished.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was sorry that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was not present to answer the Question of the noble Lord. As to the actual form of the Question, he agreed with his noble Friend opposite (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that it would be an extraordinary interference on the part of one Government to exercise its influence upon another in order to arrest proceedings which the latter had thought it necessary to take in regard to an accusation against a subject of that Government. But probably his noble Friend desired to know what course had been taken by Her Majesty's Government in the whole matter; and what he had to say was that in a question of so much delicacy, involving the internal government of the Porte, and touching the Sultan himself, Her Majesty's Government had not thought that it would be desirable to exercise any direct advice or interference; but feeling, as they did, an interest in this matter, they had been able, through Lord Dufferin, in a perfectly private and unofficial manner, to express their wish that it might be the pleasure of the Sultan to deal with this matter in a merciful spirit. He was not in a position to state that it had been officially notified that the sentence passed upon the incriminated Pashas had been commuted; but he had good reason to believe that the statement in the newspapers alluded to, that the sentence had been commuted to banishment to Arabia, was true.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY intimated that the Land Law (Ireland) Bill was expected from the other House in a few minutes.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If I may ask a question about a Bill which is not yet before the House, I should like to know whether the Bill will be printed and circulated to-morrow. It would be a great convenience.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was not certain, but he thought it might be circulated to-morrow evening.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed at Eleven o'clock.

The Lord THURLOW—Chosen Speaker in the absence of the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Commissioner.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Monday next: (The Lord Privy Seal). (No. 187.)

LEASES FOR SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to facilitate leases of land for the erection thereon of schools and buildings for the promotion of public education in Ireland—Was presented by The Lord O'HAGAN; read 1^a. (No. 188.)

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

The Earl of Kimberley

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 29th July, 1881.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Stationery Office (Controller's Report) [No. 356].

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS—Committee R.P.

Resolutions [July 28] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Superannuation (Post Office and Works) * [228].

Committee—Petroleum (Hawking) [222] [House counted out].

Third Reading—Land Law (Ireland) [225], and passed.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. CROTTY AND MARSH, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Messrs. Crotty and Marsh are confined in Limerick Gaol on suspicion of having been concerned in an attack on a house near Tomgraney (Clare) on the 29th of May; and, if so, whether representations have reached him to the effect that Messrs. Crotty and Marsh assert that they can prove, by the evidence of policemen and others, that they were at a considerable distance from Tomgraney, on their way to Nenagh Fair with cattle, when the house in question was attacked?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, there seemed to be reasonable ground for the suspicion on which the arrests were made; the evidence that had been laid before him confirmed him in that view; and when the time came to reconsider the matter, if there were any further information the case should be inquired into.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—IRREGULARITY IN KILRUSH WORKHOUSE, CO. CLARE.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that a pauper lunatic in Kilrush (Clare) Workhouse has been found to be pregnant; and, whether an inquiry has been made into the case by an inspector of the Local Government Board; and, if so, whether it is intended to publish the Inspector's Report?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the fact mentioned in the Question of the hon. Gentleman, and an inquiry had been held by an Inspector of the Local Government Board; but the poor woman was so imbecile that nothing could be made of her statements. The nurse in charge of the ward was considered to have failed in attention to her duties, and she had been discharged by the Local Government Board. He did not think it necessary to publish the Report of the Inspector, the substance of which had been communicated to the local Guardians. He could not say whether reporters were excluded from the inquiry.

LAW AND POLICE—PRACTICE OF CARRYING FIREARMS.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will take into consideration the question of dealing by legislation with the cases of burglars and others carrying revolvers or other firearms and shooting innocent people, and of appropriately punishing such crimes whether attended or unattended by fatal results?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I answered a Question similar to this earlier in the Session. I learn from the police that the practice of carrying firearms is not very frequent. At the same time, I think it would be very desirable to provide some severer punishment for offences committed by persons carrying them. In any amendment of the Criminal Law it would be well to introduce such a change.

SIR HENRY TYLER said, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had not taken any notice of the last part of the Question, with regard to appropriately punishing such crimes, whether unattended or attended by fatal results.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, what I meant to say was that slight offences committed by men carrying firearms should meet with severer punishment than crimes committed by men who do not carry firearms.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879—FINES AND COSTS.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of cases like that of the "lark's nest" recently before him, and other instances in which defendants are being sent to gaol for non-payment of fines, he will consider the propriety of calling the attention of justices of the peace to the power given to them by "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," to afford time for payment by instalments so as to avoid unnecessary imprisonment; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the scales of costs and fees in use at petty sessions throughout the Country, with a view to their revision and reduction, and thus prevent the disproportion of costs to the fine inflicted, which occurs in many cases?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I doubt whether there will be any great advantage in calling the attention of justices to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act—they are perfectly well acquainted with them; but I agree very much in the regret that the wise provisions introduced into the Act by my Predecessor are not carried out so beneficially as they might be in many cases. In many cases, as everybody knows, where the fine is under 5s. there can be no costs, unless the justices specially certify them, and this they are too frequently in the habit of doing. I have pointed out to them that this is not what is intended by the Act; it was intended that only in exceptional circumstances should costs be given. The reply I receive is—"Oh, but we impose a small fine on account of the costs." In my opinion, that is not a judicious proceeding; it gives to the public an unfair impression of what has really happened. It appears that a person has been fined only 1s., when, in point of fact, he has had to pay 30s.; therefore, I much desire that the provisions of the Act with reference to costs were more fully carried out. The second part of the Question opens up a very difficult matter. I have very often much regretted that large bills of costs have attended these convictions, especially in the case of poor people; but it must be remembered that our present system is that these costs defray the expenses of the administration of justice to a great degree; and if you are to change the system, either the local authorities must undertake to pay the expenses which are now paid by fines, or the Exchequer must bear them, and both of these are serious propositions.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, perhaps I may be allowed to say, as I had the honour of carrying the Bill of 1879, that I agree with every word of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answer to the first part of the Question; what he has said is in entire accordance with the object with which the Act was passed.

ARMY—THE ORDNANCE COMMITTEE.

MR. LEAMY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he has any objection to state the number of guns examined by the Ordnance Committee since 1st January last; the branch of the public service for which those guns were intended; the names of the inventors; and if any of the guns consisted of more than one chamber, and, if so, how many?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the hon. Member is mistaken in supposing either that the Ordnance Committee commenced its duties in January last, or that it is its function to examine guns indiscriminately. Its work began, as I have already informed the House, in April, and the only duty of the Committee is to report to the Secretary of State on questions of ordnance and kindred subjects especially referred to them by him. The most important question so referred to them is that of the muzzle and breech-loading guns of the greatest calibres, from 43 tons to 100 tons weight; but this has not stood in the way of some less important references, and about 14 smaller guns have been brought by me to their notice. I see no reason to give the House further details now, when the Committee has been at work for so short a time; but I hope, in moving the next Army Estimates, to afford the House useful information on this subject.

PARLIAMENT—MR. BRADLAUGH— THREATENED MEETING IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

MR. WARTON, who had given Notice of a Question which stood on the Paper in the following terms:—

Sir William Harcourt

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the police are still unacquainted with the intention that Mr. Bradlaugh has circulated printed notices convening a mass meeting in Trafalgar Square, to be holden at eight o'clock p.m. on Tuesday next, for the purpose of protesting against his exclusion from this House?"

said, he wished to call attention to the fact that the Question had been altered by the officials of the House in such a way as to make it absolute nonsense. The Question was made to read whether the police were "still unacquainted with the intention that Mr. Bradlaugh had circulated in printed notices." He did not ask about that "intention." What he asked was whether the police were still ignorant of the fact that notices had been circulated?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I attribute the alteration of the Question to a misprint. I have seen the handbill referred to, and it does not appear to me to propose the holding of a meeting which is prohibited by the words of the statute. The words of the statute are directed to Petitions to the House of Commons, and they would also extend to any tumultuous assemblages with the object of interfering with the action of or intimidating the House of Commons. This meeting and these handbills profess no intention of petitioning or remonstrating with the House of Commons, or proceeding to the House of Commons. We have been furnished by the police with certain instructions which have professedly been given on this matter by the conveners of the meeting in relation to the conduct of the meeting. They express a desire that perfect order may be maintained, and distinctly state that no attempt is to be made to go from Trafalgar Square to the House of Commons. That being so, there is no ground on which I can have legal authority to interfere with the meeting. If I am asked whether Trafalgar Square is an appropriate or a favourable place for a public meeting, I may say, very positively, I do not. [MR. R. N. FOWLER: Hear, hear!] The worthy Alderman opposite and the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) know that within the last few years frequent meetings have been held in Trafalgar Square—whether they attended them or not I cannot say. I have witnessed some of them, although they were not for objects with which I specially sympathized. Unfortunately, there has grown up a habit of holding meetings there which I wish was terminated. I need hardly say that every precaution will be taken to prevent interruption to the traffic, and, above all, to restrain any disturbance or any interference with the access to the House of Commons.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—REGIMENTAL COLOURS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has yet consulted the Military Authorities about the continued use of "Regimental Colours," as promised by him on the 12th August last; and, if he can give to the House his opinion on the subject?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that, in fulfilment of my promise given at the end of last Session, and renewed in February last, the Commander-in-Chief sent to all general officers and colonels commanding battalions in the United Kingdom a Circular inviting their opinion as to the expediency of retaining one or both of the regimental colours, and, should they be retained, as to the expediency of taking them with the regiment on active service. To this Circular 83 answers have been received, and after carefully weighing them the Duke of Cambridge has decided upon, and I have approved, a General Order, which will recite that in consequence of the altered formation of attack and the extended range of fire, regimental colours shall not in future be taken with the battalions on active service. When, however, a battalion goes abroad in the ordinary course of relief they will accompany the battalion, but be left with the dépôt which has to be formed on such occasions if the regiment goes on active service. Except in this respect no change will be made, both colours being retained as affording a record of the services of the regiment, and furnishing to the young soldier a history of its gallant deeds. At reviews and occasions of ceremony they will be usually taken with the battalion.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman he would not proceed with the Resolution standing in his name with respect to this subject.

NAVY—THE DISASTERS TO THE SHETLAND FISHERMEN.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If any material assistance has been or is to be sent to the Shetland Islands by the Admiralty for the purpose of relieving the widows and orphans of the unprecedented number of fishermen who lost their lives in the gales of the 20th and 21st instant; and, whether the "Eagle" revenue cutter is a sailing or steam cruiser; and is the only vessel now cruising upon that station?

MR. LAING asked whether he might be allowed to supplement the Question by asking whether the Government would consider the propriety of giving assistance in the form of money?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Admiralty has not sent any material assistance to the families of the fishermen who lost their lives in such a melancholy manner. It appears to be a proper case for a movement on the part of the general public, and I am glad to see that that is the opinion of some very influential gentlemen. The Eagle is a sailing cruiser of 118 tons. She was on the ground at the time of the sudden gale, and has been directed to cruise to the eastward and render assistance to disabled boats.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE MAGISTRACY—THE HIGH SHERIFF OF COUNTY LOUTH.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report in the "Dundalk Democrat" of 16th July, of a police prosecution for assault in a drunken brawl in the town of Louth on July 17th, in which the magistrates considered the case met by a 5s. fine, whereupon the County Louth High Sheriff is reported to have said—

"He was high sheriff for the county and responsible for the peace of it. He was jealous of the character of the county, and did not wish it to be proclaimed, but he warned those present that if his servant or any other persons were again attacked, he would communicate with the Castle and have the county at once proclaimed. He did not say he made those observations on account of this case. The case just decided may or may not be the cause of these remarks, but he again warned the people for their own sake to be peaceable and not to oblige him to take steps and have the county proclaimed;"

if the report is substantially correct, whether it is the fact that high sheriffs can have counties proclaimed in this way; if not, whether he can reassure the public that proclamations are not issued without due consideration and on proper representation; and, whether the Government will take any notice of the high sheriff's language?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had seen the newspaper referred to. The hon. Member had rightly quoted the statement reported in the paper; but he did not know whether it was a correct report, and had not thought it necessary to inquire. He could only say that he could hardly suppose the High Sheriff spoke of proclaiming the county, as he certainly must have known he had no power to do so.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. FLOOD, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the offence for which the Messrs. Flood (since released) were arrested was on suspicion of houghing cattle; whether it is true that the County Grand Jury have since assessed damages on three townlands for the injury to the cattle; whether it is the fact that, although the Messrs. Flood live in Robertstown, the adjacent townland to those on which the damages were levied, the Grand Jury, whose members were aware that the Floods were imprisoned on suspicion of having committed the outrage, and with all the information and evidence before them, did not levy any portion of the compensation paid for the cattle on Robertstown, the townland where the Floods reside; and, if so, whether he can explain this, and say whether any other cattle have been houghed in the district except those for which the Grand Jury gave the compensation above-mentioned; and, in that case, to whom they belonged?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the men named had been arrested on suspicion of maiming cattle, and had been since discharged. With respect to the action of the Grand Jury, he could not enter into a discussion on a matter over which he had no power, and with which he had no concern. No cattle had been maimed except those in respect of which compensation was assessed.

Mr. Healy

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question. It was whether the Grand Jury, knowing all the facts, did not levy the damages on the district in which the Floods resided, but in the adjoining townships?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought he had given an answer to the Question. It was true the Grand Jury had assessed the damages in the manner stated; but he could not say what the Grand Jury knew.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELIEF FOR FAMILIES OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will give directions that the families of persons arrested under the Peace Preservation Act should receive outdoor relief if in indigent circumstances, and if a majority of the guardians are in favour of such a course being pursued?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Local Government Board had issued an Order authorizing Boards of Guardians in Ireland to afford out-door relief to the families of the persons referred to.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS).

MR. MONK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further communication has been received from the French Government as to the proposed new Commercial Treaty with France?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, a communication was received from the French Government on the subject last Saturday, and a further communication to-day. The latest Papers will be considered at a meeting of the Royal Commission to be held this afternoon; but we are not in a position to make any statement with regard to the present state of the negotiations.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has made no communication to the commercial community of Great Britain respecting the new French Tariff, and the negotiations for the French Treaty, beyond inviting by public advertisement the evidence before the Royal Commission of any parties interested in the trades affected by the French Tariff; and, whether he will give the altered Return which he has placed on the Paper, namely, a Return of the names of all places, under the heading of Counties in alphabetical order, from which communications have been addressed either to the Foreign Office, or the Royal Commissioners for the French Commercial Treaty, or the Board of Trade, on the subject of the new French Tariff, and of the proposals of France for a new Commercial Treaty; giving, under the heading of each place, in order of time, the names, and, as far as possible, the trades or occupations of the persons by whom such communications were addressed, as well as the Department to which they were sent; and stating in each case if such persons are representatives of any public body, Chamber of Commerce, or Trade Society; and a list of all the witnesses (with their trades, occupation, and addresses, so far as they are known,) who have been examined by Royal Commissioners for the French Commercial Treaty, and of the Witnesses, if any, who offered themselves for examination, but whose evidence was not taken?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, communications respecting the new French Tariff, forwarding documents connected with it, have been made from time to time to Chambers of Commerce and to Commercial Associations which have addressed the Foreign Office on the subject. On the 25th of March, when the discussion on the new Tariff in the French Parliament was approaching its conclusion, these Chambers and Associations were informed, confidentially, of the state of the case, and asked for their observations with respect to it. On the 31st of May a Circular was addressed to all the Chambers of Commerce, calling attention to the appointment of the Royal Commission, and stating that any further statements would be received, and that the Royal Commissioners would confer with any delegate who might be appointed. The Return in question will be given as far as possible; but, as any communications which have been made to the Board of Trade have been passed on by that Department to the Foreign Office or the Royal Commissioners, it would be better to limit it to communications addressed to the Foreign Office or Royal Commission.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— MURDER OF CAPTAIN ELLIOTT AND MR. MALCOLM.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take in order to bring to justice the murderers of Captain Elliott and Mr. Malcolm, the persons accused of these crimes having just been acquitted against the weight of evidence; and to punish those who are responsible for the massacre of Colonel Anstruther's detachment at Brunker's Spruit?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware of what was being done in the case of Dr. Barber; but it was desirable that the House should be made acquainted with what was intended in that case.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, he had been requested by his right hon. Friend to reply to these Questions. With respect to the inquiry of the right hon. Baronet, he had to request that Notice should be given of it. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member, it was placed on the Paper at a late hour last night, and he had not since had any opportunity of seeing Lord Kimberley, or of reading the Papers in the Colonial Office on the subject. He would, therefore, ask that any part of the Question of the hon. Member, not covered by his answer, might be renewed at another time. A brief telegram from Sir Hercules Robinson had been received, which stated that with regard to the inquiry into the murder of Captain Elliott, the Chief Justice and the Attorney General both stated that the jury was a respectable one. That was all that the telegram said with regard to the justice or injustice of the verdict. As to Mr. Malcolm's case, Sir Hercules Robinson telegraphed on the 27th instant—

"Persons accused of Malcolm's murder acquitted. The Chief Justice considers that the evidence was conflicting on many material points."

As regards the massacre of Colonel An-struther's detachment, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was not in a position to state whether any further steps were contemplated; but Her Majesty's Government had not received any information which indicated that the transactions were of such an exceptional nature as to bring them within the definition of acts contrary to civilized warfare.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH inquired whether, when full Reports were received by the Government in reference to the cases, they would be presented to the House? It was most desirable that hon. Members should know in what way the investigation had been conducted, and what was the opinion of the Government on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had no doubt that such Reports would be received; the first duty of the Government would then be to consider the Reports very carefully, because they related to matters which were grave in themselves. He did not know, however, that anything had happened which would justify the expression of any opinion; and he thought the right hon. Baronet would agree with him that it would be premature to give any pledge with respect to the production of the Papers until they had been received and considered.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked whether any information would be given as regards the massacre at Brunner's Spruit?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would be glad to answer the Question if the hon. Member would give Notice of it; and he repeated that the Colonial Office had no information that the transactions referred to were of such an exceptional nature as to bring them within the definition of acts contrary to civilized warfare.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he hoped that information in regard to the murder of those officers would be laid before Parliament before the end of the present Session; and, further, that the House would also be informed as to the steps which Government intended to take in reference to the matter.

AFGHANISTAN—DEFEAT OF THE AMEER'S FORCES.

SIR HENRY TYLER (for Mr. ONSLOW) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, At what distance from the scene where the recent engagement between the Amir of Afghanistan and Ayooob Khan has been fought is there any considerable force of Anglo-Indians, and under whose command?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this Question. I had, perhaps, better state all that it is at present possible to state with regard to the circumstances which have occurred in Afghanistan. The only official telegram which has been received, and which has not been communicated to the Press, or read to the House, is the following, received late last night:—

“From Viceroy, Simla, July 28.

“Two Sirdars have reached Chaman from scene of action, which lasted from 8 to 11 a.m. They say the Cabuli regiments fought at first, but, after action, Khanabad regiment went over in a body to Ayooob. The other three dispersed and fled. They heard firing in Candahar direction last night and again this morning. General Ghulam Haider went first to the city before starting for Cabul. They estimate the loss at 300 to 400 on both sides.”

With reference to the distance from the seat of action of the force of Anglo-Indians, I may say that the headquarters force, under the command of General Hume, is at Quetta and in the neighbouring districts of Pishin and Sibi. That division amounts to a force of between 5,000 and 6,000 men; but, up to the present, I cannot say what is the exact distribution of the forces. The most advanced fort which has been occupied—I am not certain whether it is occupied at present or not, but I think it probably is—is Chaman, about 85 miles from Candahar; and Karez-i-Atta, where the recent action took place, is situated about 25 miles beyond Candahar. I have received a private telegram from the Viceroy stating that he had directed General Hume to concentrate all the troops at his command, if necessary, in the neighbourhood of Quetta, so as to be able to cope with any fresh disturbance that may arise there.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the Prime Minister what meaning he wishes the House to draw from the expression he made use of last night—“A considerable Anglo-Indian force is in the neighbourhood of the action.” [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] I do not know whether these are the Prime Minister's exact words. These were the words that fell from him, as reported in The Times of this morning, and

Sir Charles W. Dilke

I want to know the exact meaning to be put upon them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot give any meaning to the words—I never used them. I certainly did not say that there was a large Anglo-Indian force in the neighbourhood where the action took place. What I said was “in the neighbourhood of that portion of Afghanistan—namely, Candahar.” That is not where the action took place.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister to state distinctly what impression is to be drawn from the expression used by him last night with regard to the presence of a large Anglo-Indian force in the neighbourhood?

MR. GLADSTONE: In my view, the question of the noble Lord has been answered by the telegram just read by the noble Lord.

COLONEL STANLEY: May I ask the noble Lord a question with reference to the answer he has given? He stated that the troops are close to Quetta. Are we to understand that in consequence of the directions given to General Hume to concentrate the forces under his command at Quetta, the troops are to be withdrawn from Pishin and Sibi?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot give any further information than I have received. A division, as I have stated, under General Hume's command, numbering between 5,000 and 6,000 men, is, no doubt, at present in occupation of various positions in the district. If General Hume considers it necessary to concentrate the whole force at Quetta, it would involve withdrawal from Pishin and Sibi.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Would the noble Lord make inquiry on the subject? Are Pishin and Sibi to be left entirely at the mercy of—

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will finish his question. At the mercy of whom?

MR. E. STANHOPE: What I intended to say was whether they were to be left to anarchy?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Viceroy appears to have considered that any excitement in the district which was likely to follow the report of the victory of Ayoo Khan would be best met by the concentration of the forces under General Hume's command. It is impossible for me to state at this moment what is the position in regard to Pishin. No doubt, General Hume will take the measures which he considers best adapted for preserving the tranquillity of the district now occupied by British troops.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: I wish to ask the noble Lord whether any application had been made by the Ameer for the assistance of British troops?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Not that I am aware of.

SIR HENRY TYLER: May I ask the noble Lord a Question, of which I gave Notice at the commencement of the Sitting, Whether he would be so good as to inform the House what steps, if any, Her Majesty's Government intend to take, and what attitude they propose to adopt, with reference to the circumstances of the defeat in Afghanistan—that is to say, what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government as to supporting Abdurrahman after his defeat?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have no further communication to make to the House. No doubt, if the Viceroy considers further steps necessary he will communicate to Her Majesty's Government; but until I have received further information from the Government of India it is not proposed to take any further steps.

LORD ELCHO: I should like, if my noble Friend will excuse me, to trouble him with one more question. It is with reference to a possible contingency, and the course the Government will take. Supposing Ayoo Khan gets possession of Candahar and the Khojak Pass, which, as everybody knows, is a most important pass, will the Government allow the pass to be occupied by Ayoo?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I really think it would be unnecessary, and probably inconvenient, that I should answer the question.

INDIA—PENSIONS FOR EMINENT SERVICES—SIR FREDERICK ROBERTS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in the year 1869, an Act was passed to enable Lord Napier of Magdala to receive the full benefit of the salary of Member of Council for the Presidency of Bombay, or as holding any other office in India, notwithstanding his being in receipt of an annuity, and notwithstanding other Acts of Parliament; if he can state why a similar indulgence was not extended to Sir Frederick Roberts in respect of the annuity granted to him for his services in Afghanistan; whether a sum of £25,000 was voted to Sir Garnet Wolseley for his services in Ashantee; whether the annuities conferred on Lords Keane, Gough, and Hardinge, and Sir H. Havelock, were charged on Imperial Revenues, though granted for Indian services; whether, in commemoration of the famous exploit of General Roberts, a bronze star is to be or has been given to those who took part in it; whether it has been held that we cannot clearly define as an Indian object the purpose of the Afghan War, and that in consequence a grant has been made from Imperial funds towards the expenses of that war; and, whether, taking into consideration the foregoing precedents, and also the admittedly composite character of the campaigns in which Sir F. Roberts took part, Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their decision as to the £12,500 awarded to Sir F. Roberts, and grant him either from Indian or Imperial funds a pecuniary reward more in consonance with such precedents?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is true, Sir, as stated in the Question, that an Act was passed to enable Lord Napier of Magdala to receive the full benefit of his salary as a Member of Council, notwithstanding his being in receipt of an annuity. It is also true that £25,000 was voted to Sir Garnet Wolseley for his services in Ashantee. It is further the fact that Her Majesty's Government have held that the Afghan War cannot be considered to have been undertaken solely for Indian purposes, and that it was just, therefore, to make an Imperial contribution towards the expenses of the war. That Imperial contribution has been made in the shape of a grant of £5,000,000. It has never been proposed or suggested that any further contribution should be made, or any division of the detailed expenditure of the war should be made, between the Indian and Imperial Governments. There is, so far as I am aware, no more reason why the Imperial Government should undertake a share of the payment of the officers than why they should undertake to pay the commissariat or any other of the expenses in-involved. The hon. Member asks why a similar Bill was not introduced in case of General Roberts as in the case of Lord Napier of Magdala. I may in reply, that it is perfectly certain such a Bill could not have passed through this House without considerable opposition and delay. The circumstances would have been in that respect different from those in which Lord Napier's Bill was passed; and I am prepared to say, even if I could I been certain that the Bill would pass without any opposition, that I should have been prepared to introduce it, that the Council of India would have been prepared to support me in introducing a Bill in conformity with precedent. All I can say in answer to the general question is, that, looking at the precedents which have been published in the Return recently moved by the hon. Gentleman, it appears to the Government that the services of Donald Stewart and Sir Frederick Roberts would be adequately met in conformity with former precedents, a grant of £1,000 a-year for life, looking to the exceptional circumstances in which those two officers were placed by their being at the time in high command under the Indian Government, thereby disqualified for an immediate pension, a grant of £12,500 in commutation of the annuity was an adequate and even a liberal one.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFE begged to point out that the Marquess had not replied to that portion of his Question relating to annuities conferred on Lords Keane, Gough, and Hardinge, and Sir H. Havelock.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I believe it is a fact that the annuities referred to were charged on Imperial revenues. I have not made any inquiry into the circumstances in which these annuities were granted; but I do not see anything to induce me to modify the general reply I have just given.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND).

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How it was that The Times correspondent at Dublin had been the day before yesterday to furnish the journal with the substance of the information contained in the 49th Report the Irish Board of Works, which had only reached the hands of hon. Members this morning; whether he was aware of the means by which that person had obtained a copy of the Report in question; and, if not, what course he intended to take to prevent public documents of this character from being prematurely published?

Sir H. Drummond Wolfe

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that this was the first that he had heard of the matter; he had not seen the statement in The Times referred to by the hon. Member, and, therefore, he could give no explanation of the matter. The hon. Member, however, must be aware that the Irish Board of Works was not under the control of the Irish Government. His right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland informed him that a proof of the Report in question had been in the Library of the House of Commons for some time.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 225.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he rose to move, as an Amendment to the right hon. Gentleman's Motion, that the Bill be re-committed in the terms of the Notice which he had given with regard to Clause 35. It was hardly necessary that he should do more on that occasion than shortly state the grounds upon which he asked for the re-committal of the Bill. He took that course because he was desirous of inserting in the clause to which he referred a provision to the effect—

"Provided always, That in case at any time after the expiration of a period of six years from the passing of this Act a Commission shall have been issued by Her Majesty under Her Royal Sign Manual to ascertain and report whether the business of the Land Commission makes it requisite or not requisite that, after the expiration of the said period of seven years from the passing of this Act, there should be, in addition to the Judicial Commissioner, one or two other Commissioners; and, in case that Commission shall report that the business of the Land Commission makes it requisite that there should be, in addition to the Judicial Commissioner, one or two other Commissioners, and that such other Commissioner or Commissioners should be appointed for a period to be stated by such Commission, Her Majesty may, by Warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, from time to time appoint some fit person or fit persons to be such other Commissioner or Commissioners to hold office during the period stated in such Report. If such Commission report that the business of the Land Commission does not require that there should be any Commissioner in addition to the Judicial Commissioner, then upon the expiration of the said period of seven years after the passing of this Act, all the jurisdiction, powers, privileges, and authority by this Act conferred upon the Land Commission shall thereafter be exercisable and enjoyable by the Judicial Commissioner alone."

On a former occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had courteously accepted the principle of that Provision. Under the Bill, as it now stood, the Commission came to an end in seven years, and only the Judicial Commissioner retained office, whereas the powers conferred by the Bill would require to be administered by more than one Commissioner. Application, consequently, would have to be made to Parliament to wind up the Commission, or to transfer the powers to the one Commissioner left, or, again, to appoint other Commissioners at the end of seven years to carry out the duties under the Act. Such a state of things would lessen the weight that would be attached to the decisions of the Commission. He thought there could be no doubt, after the discussions in this House and the additions made to the Bill, that that Commission would not come to an end in seven years, and that important interests would remain to be performed by the Land Commission—duties which would probably require the attention—and the undivided attention—of more than one important officer. He ventured to think that in matters of this kind legislation should not be enacted more often than was necessary. He thought that if legislation on this subject was not again rendered necessary at the expiration of seven years, the duties sought to be imposed on the Royal Commission would be discharged by that Commission with greater advantage to the public, with greater security, more perfect impartiality, and more satisfactory results, than if, at the end of that time, they had to resort to Parliament to determine whether there was sufficient work for one or two Commissioners besides the one Judicial Commissioner, who would remain under the Act, or whether it should be performed by one Judicial Commissioner alone. His object in asking the House to accept this proposal was to secure stability, and also permanence, for the work sought to be accomplished; for it was highly desirable that there should be the utmost stability in all the machinery of the Commission, and that the decisions of the Court should be respected. It appeared to him that if the Court came to an end within seven years, there might be an agitation in the country and discussions arise in Parliament which it would be most desirable to avoid, and therefore it was that he now moved the re-committal of the Bill, so far as the 35th clause was concerned.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "re-committed, with respect to Clause 35,"—
(Mr. William Henry Smith,)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GLADSTONE said, that on a former day the Government, perhaps unconsciously influenced by a desire to reach the conclusion of the Bill, and on that account having satisfied themselves with a less minute examination of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman than, perhaps, ought to have been made, expressed themselves favourable to a proposition of this kind; but on a closer examination of the matter they had arrived at the conclusion that there was a flaw or defect in the plan which would prevent them from giving their assent to it as it stood. The machinery of the Royal Commission would be put in operation under the clause, and the Commission might report in favour of the prolongation or renewal of the functions of one or more of the lay Commissioners. In that case, the arrangements would be made complete without any reference to Parliament; and he did not know of any reason why they should withhold their assent to such an arrangement, or why they did not make provision for it. But there was another alternative open. It was that there would be no occasion for the re-appointment of either one or two lay Commissioners, and in that case the plan of the right hon. Gentleman provided that the business of the Land Commission should be handed over entirely to the Judicial Commissioner. There was involved in that proposal a principle of great importance, and one to which the Government would not ask Parliament to give its sanction—namely, that the final appeal in those cases should be confided to the single hands of the Judicial Commissioner. But it might be said—"Strike out that portion of the proposal and retain the rest." If, however, they were to do that, then the proposal became entirely incomplete, because it might happen that after having authorized the Government to put into operation the rather cumbrous machinery of a Royal Commission, it would still be necessary to make application to Parliament, in order to provide some assistance to this Commission in the exercise of its important jurisdiction. Well, certainly the Government could not agree to a proposal for additional machinery at a distant period, unless it were a complete and satisfactory proposal. As it stood it would be unsatisfactory on a very important point, and to strike out part of it would make it incomplete. Therefore, the Government were not prepared to adopt the proposal on either view. He agreed with the observation of the right hon. Gentleman that Parliament was, and probably would continue to be, amply charged with Business, and therefore that it was a good thing if they could dispose at once of something which might otherwise remain and occupy time, and give trouble upon a future occasion. He could not say that he embraced the whole of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, for he seemed to anticipate that it would become necessary, probably at the close of five or six years from this time, to adjust the powers of the Commission. That certainly would be a very formidable affair in Parliament, and would renew all the discussions on the matter. The Government did not take that view. On the contrary, having faith in the provisions of their Bill and in the good sense of the people, they thought that as a matter of business the question would be disposed of without a great amount of trouble. On the grounds he had stated, the Government could not assent to the re-committal of the Bill.

Mr. W. H. Smith

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the Prime Minister stated that, in the favourable language he employed a few nights ago, he was influenced unconsciously by the consideration of getting on with the Bill. He was afraid the Government had been unconsciously influenced by a good many considerations during the progress of the Bill in Committee. He did not know what the unconscious influence might be at the present moment; but he must say the objections raised to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal were not very formidable, and he should have thought that the Government might still have considered it possible to adopt the suggestion, and allow this question to be at least discussed. They would, he thought, act wisely to go into Committee, and see whether this clause would be adapted to the circumstances of the case. The Prime Minister admitted that it would be highly desirable at the expiration of seven years to renew the appointment of these Commissioners, and that the clause suggested would meet that difficulty; but the Government were now going to make it imperative on the Government of the day to bring in a Bill on the subject. The House, he thought, must be aware that when a Bill was brought in on such an interesting and important subject there was a tendency on the part of the House to enlarge the scope of the discussion. It seemed to him that the course proposed by his right hon. Friend was wiser than that contemplated by the Government.

MR. SHAW said, he did not think it wise to occupy time now in an endeavour to save the time of the House seven years hence, because it was manifest that if the labours of the Land Commission were consummated, no Ministry in power seven years hence would have the slightest trouble in dealing with the question. He believed before three years were over they would have to legislate on this question of a Royal Commission. The business of settling rents would be complete, and the Commissioners would have nothing to do but to carry on the process of purchasing estates from landlords and re-selling them to tenants, and it would probably strike Parliament that it was unnecessary to keep up this large machinery for doing what would become a very small matter. Why postpone for seven years what probably they should be bound to do in two or three years? This Commission might be amalgamated with some other Commission before seven years were over. He hoped the third reading of the measure would be allowed to be proceeded with.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, who had given Notice of his intention to move the following Amendment:—

"That the Land Law (Ireland) Bill as originally introduced and as amended in Committee, is the result of a revolutionary agitation, encourages the repudiation of contracts and liabilities, offends against individual liberty, is calculated to diminish the security of property, will not contribute to the peace or prosperity of Ireland, and tends to endanger the union between that Country and Great Britain;"

said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had not taken the course which was usual when a Motion did not meet with any amount of support—namely, to withdraw it, because in that case he (Lord Randolph Churchill) could have moved his Amendment. He could congratulate the House on having at last escaped from the discussion of the intricate and complicated details of the Land Bill, and on being in a position to take a comprehensive view of the measure before it went to "another place." Having watched the progress of the Bill through Committee with as much care and attention as was in his power, and having offered no remarks on the second reading, he would now ask the attention of the House while he communicated to them some of the results of his observations, and made a few valedictory comments on the measure. They had been told in all the Radical newspapers, and as far as he could make out by every Radical orator, that this Bill was the greatest measure which was ever submitted to Parliament, and that its contents and its career were subjects of legitimate pride and delight to the Liberal Party, to the Liberal Government, and, beyond all, to the Prime Minister. He did not think he was exactly in a position to give complete assent to that. He might with confidence lay it down that before any measure could be said to be a subject of legitimate pride to those officially connected with it, it must fulfil one of three conditions—it must be the original design of its author, represent the ratification of a great principle for which its author had long and constantly contended, or, in default of these two conditions, it must be the sure and certain means of great benefit to those who would be affected by it. He would just glance at the Bill from those three points of view. Was this Bill the original design of the Government? Was there anything in it from beginning to end of which the Government could be said to be the inventors and patentees? The Government would be doing very great injustice to certain parties in the House, and be acting in an unworthy manner, if they made such a claim. They now knew, from the indiscreet revelations of the Duke of Argyll, that when the present Government succeeded to Office the idea of an Irish Land Bill had never entered their heads. Either the force of circumstances or their own evil destiny compelled them, or as they thought compelled them, to deal with the Irish Land Question. Searching about for a programme, which they were unable to draw up themselves, they lighted upon and adopted the programme of the Irish Land League, and they determined to enable the Irish Land League to fulfil its promises and to justify its existence to the Irish people by conferring on them the benefit of the “three F’s.” This much was certain, that if there had been no Land League there would have been no Land Bill; and if the Liberal Government had not adopted the programme of the Land League, the Land League would not have allowed the Government to pass any Bill into law at all. The Irish people knew perfectly well to whom they might ascribe that Bill. They knew that its author was not the Prime Minister, the Member for Mid Lothian, but was the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). At every public meeting in Ireland resolutions were passed to that effect. At no meeting in Ireland worthy the name of a public meeting had any resolution been passed giving the Government the smallest credit for the Bill. He must, however, notice that one unfortunate individual whom the Chief Secretary for Ireland had let out of prison did preside at a meeting in that country, and passed a vote of thanks to the Chief Secretary. That was the only public meeting held in Ireland at which the merits of the Government had been recognized. And when the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) told the Prime Minister the other day that the Irish people owed him no gratitude for this measure—[Mr. HEALY: I did not say anything of the kind.]—when the hon. Member said that, he spoke the mature and intelligent conviction of the Irish people. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) could not help thinking that when the Prime Minister witnessed the reception of his Bill in Ireland, and the comments which were there made upon it, he would be heard sadly to say, Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit altir honores. He did not wish to dishearten the Government, nor to infuse too much melancholy into their noble minds. There was one measure which, no doubt, they might console themselves with claiming as their own—he alluded to their Coercion Bill. But while the Prime Minister and his Colleagues could never hope to have their names coupled in Ireland with that Land Bill, they would be eternally identified with the suspension of liberty and Constitutional rights. When the Bill was first brought in by the Prime Minister it embodied, in a more or less imperfect form, the doctrine of the “three F’s,” which was the programme of the Land League and its sine quâ non. The Representatives of the Land League in the House on that occasion, and on the second reading, expressed great dissatisfaction with the Bill on three chief points. They denounced the Emigration Clause, they blamed the Bill because it contained no provision with respect to existing leases, and they also found fault with it because it did not make any arrangement with regard to arrears of rent. What had happened? The Emigration Clause had been struck out. [“No!”] The hon. Member was severely accurate. It had not been struck out, but it had been reduced to an absolute nullity—a perfect farce; and it was impossible that emigration could take place worthy the name of emigration under that clause. On the other two points the Prime Minister had more than met the Irish view. He did not expect him to admit it; that would spoil the game; but he had no hesitation in saying that the Prime Minister had gone beyond their highest hopes, because, after that Bill became law, every lease in Ireland would be promptly reviewed by a Court of Justice in that country, and, if necessary, quashed. Further, all tenants in Ireland who at the present moment were enjoying fair and reasonable leases would, at the termination of those leases, though it might be 60 years hence, be placed in the same position as if they had never had a fair and reasonable lease at all. And with respect to arrears of rent, tenants up to a certain figure who had been wise enough to refuse to pay their rents were to have them liquidated by the taxpayers of Great Britain, and those who had been foolish enough to pay their rents were left to curse their stupidity and to vow that they would never be so caught again. He said, then, let him who deserved the laurel wear it. He felt it his duty to offer his congratulations to the hon. Member for the City of Cork on the magnificent results which he had achieved, although supported by only a small fraction of the House. He wished that the hon. Member would communicate to him the secret of his success, and he would further remind him of the views which the Prime Minister had sketched with respect to town property and absentee landlords. With that vista of splendid possibilities before him, he could congratulate the hon. Member for the City of Cork on the extended field of usefulness which remained for him as long as the Prime Minister continued in Office. All the merit which the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary for Ireland could claim in the matter was that by their Disturbance Bill of last year, and the violent language which the latter had used against the House of Lords, they had given the signal which had invited the hon. Member for the City of Cork and Mr. Michael Davitt to commence their winter crusade. Could the Government, then, make out that that Bill affirmed or sanctioned the principles for which they had long contended? In the speeches which the Prime Minister delivered in 1870, he elaborately and painfully argued against and controverted every leading provision in the present Bill. To destroy the theory of the "three F's," to cut the ground from under the feet of its advocates, was then the right hon. Gentleman's great object, which it must be admitted he attained as completely as any man ever attained any object in Parliament before. From the year 1870 to the year 1880 the Prime Minister and his leading Colleagues sustained the battle against the "three F's" and against the Bill of Mr. Butt, which embodied the "three F's;" and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India and the Attorney General for Ireland rose to heights of Parliamentary eloquence and argument on that subject as high as it was possible for those two individuals to reach. They were invariably supported by the whole of their Colleagues, and by a united Liberal Party. Moreover, in all the great speeches made by the Prime Minister before the late Election, and which must be deemed to have exercised a controlling power over the issues of that Election, they found no shadow of a trace that the justice of the "three F's" had dawned on his mind. If that right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues were to abandon the principles of Free Trade and raise the flag of Protection, they could not undergo a greater or more sudden and startling conversion than they had undergone in regard to the Land Question in Ireland. During the whole course of the recent protracted debate, neither the Prime Minister nor his Colleagues had attempted to disguise that conversion or to escape from the embarrassment of their former declarations. It was a melancholy fact, which must fill anyone who reflected on these matters with gloomy forebodings. Recollecting, as he did, the great political apostacies which had surprised and shocked even his contemporaries, he was tempted to ask in despair whether it was to be the inevitable lot of public men to be compelled at intervals, and at short intervals, to repudiate in a humiliating manner the creeds by which they had formerly sworn to abide. Would the Bill produce any benefit to Ireland commensurate in any way with the time and labour Parliament had devoted to it? No doubt, it was a wise maxim not to prophesy unless you knew, and he did not intend to depart from it. ["Oh!"] He hoped the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), would not interrupt him, although he knew it would be a great demand to make on that hon. Member.

Lord Randolph Churchill

The Bill was the result of agitation. That was not of itself against the Bill; but what an agitation it had been! It had been an agitation to transfer property by force from one class to another; to bring the landlords on their knees, by fair means or by foul, had long been the undisguised object of the Land League. The agitation had been furthered by speeches of a kind rarely made before, even in the history of Ireland, and that agitation had reduced the Government of Ireland to impotence, an impotence in which they were still grovelling. It had been accompanied by incidents of a kind permanently to disgrace our boasted civilization. It had been assisted, whether intentionally or not he would not say, by crimes of a frightful nature against men, women, dumb animals, and property. It had enabled terrorism, such as Ireland had been mercifully preserved from for generations, to stalk unhindered through the land. It had been acknowledged by more than one Irish speaker that it had reduced society in Ireland to chaos, that it had put an end to mutual trust between individuals, and that it had stifled for a time the feelings of kindness, charity, and inter-dependence which ought to exist between man and man in a well-governed State. That was a terrible parent for a message of peace; and, looking at the matter in the most superficial way, he doubted whether anyone would place much confidence in the child of such a father. What, after all, was the principle established by this Bill? It was not the adjustment of rents, nor the perpetuity of tenure, but it was simply that agitation, be it audacious and unscrupulous enough, constant, and pertinacious, would suffice for the destruction of almost any of the institutions of this country. Parliament, acting on the advice of the Government, and following their lead, had invited the Irish tenant farmers to endeavour to set aside contracts which, for all we knew, were fair and reasonable. Parliament had consented to liquidate the liabilities of these men, some of whom we knew were perfectly able to discharge them, and who had merely taken advantage of the prevailing disorder to fly in the face of honesty. They had deprived the few for the benefit of the many of privileges and property which could be easily appreciated, and they had, at the same time, denied the claim of the smaller to compensation. They were withdrawing and alienating from Ireland those who were devoted to our rule, and who, moreover, were the only channels through which a higher civilization, a more advanced prosperity, and a nobler morality could descend upon the masses of the Irish nation. A profound thinker, for whom the Prime Minister had great respect, Sir George O. Lewis, many years ago wrote a passage which confirmed this view. He said that in Ireland improvement and civilization must descend from above; they would not rise spontaneously from the inward workings of the community. And what were the objects of this Bill? They were two—one of a temporary, and the other of a permanent character. To buy out the Irish landlord was the great object of the Bill. They had been told on authority that the first part of the Bill, complicated as it was, was only a modus vivendi, to last until the desirable result of buying him out should be accomplished. The other day the Prime Minister said he hoped in six years' time to have bought out £10,000,000 worth of Irish landlords. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Nothing of the sort.] Notwithstanding that contradiction, he adhered to the statement; but he was of opinion that it was a very low and modest estimate to make. Unless the circumstances of Ireland were greatly altered, and if the Land League were permitted to control the destinies of Ireland, it would not be £10,000,000, but it would be £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 worth of landlords who would have to be bought out. Surely, no State ever before took upon itself such a curious task. Who were the Irish landlords? They had lately been designated as the English garrison. He quite admitted that the times were not ripe for English garrisons. The Irish landlords were those who, for many generations, in spite of the greatest trials, had manfully upheld the Union in the midst of a population for the most part hostile to it. For the State to spend its substance in buying out its friends in order to deliver over Ireland into the grasp of its enemies was surely an act of folly of which it might have been thought not even a Radical Government could have been capable. If we recognized the uses of a land-owning class in a country, should we take steps to preserve them, or kill them by inches and cruelly drive them out? The Prime Minister admitted that in 1870 he made an enormous confiscation of the property of Irish landlords; but in 1881 he had gone further and deprived the Irish landlords of every right and every privilege appertaining to the ownership of land, except the right of collecting rent. Nothing else was left to the landlord if this Bill passed. And what security could be given that the liability would be discharged by Irish tenants? He assumed that the Commission would be independent of the Executive Government, and that it would be a Court of Justice. Suppose it found the great majority of rents were fair rents in the sense of the Bill, and imposed these rents for a term of years on the tenants, what guarantee could be offered that the decisions of the Court would be obeyed? If they were not obeyed, would they be enforced? What sign was there of returning peace and order in Ireland now that the Bill was all but law? Had not Crown counsel recently demanded the adjournment of Assizes and the postponement of trial on the ground that the trial was an abortive mockery? He unhesitatingly said that there was no precedence for such an Act in the whole history of the Irish Government. Did they dream that the addition of the Royal Assent to the sanction already given by Parliament to the measure would bestow upon it a Divine energy, which at present it did not possess? He further asked, had the landlords of Ireland any guarantee that the Legislature had now taken from them all that it meant to take, and that what remained to them of their property would not in another year or so be sacrificed? Would the Prime Minister be prepared to enter into a solemn pledge in the face of the House, and with the concurrence of the Parliament of England—a pledge of such a solemn nature that it must bind future Parliaments—that at any rate what was left to the Irish landlords should be absolutely secured to them and impregably fortified? In such a state of things as now existed he did not see how any capital could be imported into Ireland, and in the absence of capital the resources of the country must languish and wither away. How could they have any guarantee that the law of the land would be respected? Let them not talk about the majesty of the law, for since the present Government came into power the majesty of the law had been as defunct as were the mummies of Ramesis and Pharaoh. He feared very much the effect of the Bill on the quick-witted Irish people, and believed that it would be to the Union what the wooden horse was to the city of Troy. It contained within it all the elements of destruction to States. In it and by it, plunder, rapacity, dishonesty, agitation, mob-law, all received the final and solemn sanction of Parliament. Originally designed by the Land League, their mortal foe, it had been joyfully captured by the Government and incorporated in the machinery of State. And they were told that if the door of the law was not wide enough to admit the measure, the bulwarks of the Constitution would be levelled and every obstacle swept away. Furthermore, if anything was required to make the analogy complete, all hon. Members who from time to time took part in those prolonged debates and proclaimed their suspicion of the monster had been seized, and enfolded, and strangled, like so many Laocoons, in the multitudinous folds of the Prime Minister's endless eloquence, and had been denounced with increasing vehemence in speech after speech, as men, since the days of the Laocoon, had never been denounced before. Well, this great Bill was not yet in the citadel. It had still a course to travel before it received the Royal Assent; and if in its course it happened to be wrecked, he doubted whether it would have many mourners in this country. But if in the following conflict, which he had no doubt the Prime Minister would immediately precipitate, any institutions succumbed, holding, as he sincerely did, the views of the measure which he held, he still said that institutions, however ancient and respected, which in the hour of trial were not capable of protecting the country from imminent peril were, perhaps, hardly institutions in which they ought to repose very great confidence. He greatly regretted that he was unable to submit his Amendment to the House. He believed the principle of that Amendment was recognized by the oracle of the Tory Party; but the political wisdom which was supposed popularly to attach to the prefix of "right hon." decided that the Amendment was inopportune. Well, it was not his business to speculate upon what was opportune or inopportune. It was enough for him that the assertions made in the Amendment were incontrovertible. The Bill, it said, was the result of agitation—a revolutionary agitation. It was revolutionary, because it had been enthusiastically propounded that the Bill which it precipitated was the first rung in the ladder leading to the Olympus of Irish Independence. The Amendment further stated that the Bill encouraged the repudiation of contract and liabilities, offended against individual liberty, and was calculated to diminish the security of property. Whether it would conduce to the peace or prosperity of Ireland, or tend to endanger the Union between that country and Great Britain, he was quite content to leave to time to show. The Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, said that it was inspired by the Divine light of justice. Well, the opposition to the Bill, of which he did not think the Prime Minister would make any complaint either as having been unfair or unduly obstinate, had been conducted by a brighter light than that of justice—namely, the light of freedom; that freedom which the Coercion Bills and the Land Bill of the Liberal Party had altogether blotted out of Irish life.

Lord Randolph Churchill

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, there was a Latin proverb which urged that it was not for the eagle to catch flies. He trusted that, in the spirit of the proverb, the Head of Her Majesty's Government would not condescend to reply to the speech which had just been delivered by the noble Lord, but would leave to men of humbler position and of less ability than his own the task of making such criticisms upon it as they thought the occasion required. He confessed that, coming rather late into the House, he was, and he remained under the impression, that the noble Lord was about to move his Amendment. It appeared, however, that that was not so, and he could only say that the speech was strongly and strikingly appropriate to the Amendment. It was, in fact, a speech conceived with a view of bringing that Amendment before the House had not the wisdom which, as the noble Lord said, was supposed to attach to the prefix "right hon." prevented him asking the judgment of the House upon it. They should, therefore, take the speech as a speech, and meet it as best they could; and he was persuaded he was only expressing the general sense of the House on both sides and in all quarters—except, perhaps, in that exalted spot where the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) kept watch and ward over the Constitution—when he said that there was one common feeling to which he only gave very feeble expression—namely, one of very great regret that this great legislative performance of the Session should be allowed, at its close, to degenerate into a farce—he used the word advisedly; for, giving the noble Lord credit, as they all did, for abundant common sense, they could not think that in delivering that speech he was actuated by serious motives. It was out of all belief that his speech could commend itself to the moral feelings or the intellectual palate of the House. He doubted whether the speech commended itself to those hon. Gentlemen with whom the noble Lord habitually acted. Even the Members for Ireland with whom the noble Lord indulged in many passages of harmless coquetry—even they seemed tired of his humour. With regard to the effect which the noble Lord expected his speech to produce on the right hon. Gentleman who led the Opposition, it was quite superfluous to speculate; for they all knew that in the noble Lord's relations with the titular heads of his Party was reproduced, in a political form, the history of Eli and his sons. Injudicious indulgence in the days of early youth had produced in the noble Lord in later life an impatience of all control, and a determination to take the bit between the teeth, which might involve the right hon. Gentleman who stood politically in the parental relation to the noble Lord in consequences hardly less disastrous than those which devolved upon the venerable hero of the sacred story. He thought, therefore, that in thus figuring before the House of Commons at this stage of the Bill the noble Lord must have been gratifying merely his own taste for genteel comedy and light farce. Even his political enemies on this side of the House would abundantly allow that the noble Lord was a first-rate actor of third-rate parts. The noble Lord, however, alas! played habitually to the pit and gallery; he meant to say that in his performances throughout this Session they had never detected an appeal to the higher political sense of the House. What they had seen had led to the belief that the noble Lord was, perhaps, after all, wise in his generation, and was preparing himself for an emergency which might come. He was possibly looking to a time—looming in the distance—when, with a re-distribution of seats, the very few sheep of Woodstock would be left without a shepherd. It was against such a dismal day of retribution that the noble Lord was preparing himself, and making friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness in some larger and more turbulent constituency; so that when his friends of Woodstock, in a Parliamentary sense, failed, he might be received, if not into everlasting, at all events, into more enduring habitations. The effort of the noble Lord against a Bill carried through with such unexampled talent and perseverance, which had received the overwhelming assent of immense majorities of the House, was ludicrous, and he had almost said impertinent. It gained neither in decency nor in acceptability when it emanated from the Leader of a Party which in its corporate capacity was appropriately sketched in one of those inspired sentences of the late Lord Beaconsfield, in one of his earlier novels, when he spoke of “a contemptible clique which dined together and called itself a political party.”

Lord Randolph Churchill

COLONEL DAWNAY said, he believed the interests of the tenants would be placed in a more precarious position than before by the action of this Bill. It was the thin end of a wedge which was intended to be driven into the heart of England and Scotland. He was in favour of reforming the Irish landlords if it could be proved that they injured Ireland; but in reference to this Bill he thought the landlords had as much justice on their side as the agitators. As to conciliating Ireland, he believed the measure would be a total failure. The loyal Irish needed no conciliation, while the disloyal would only be conciliated by the total separation of Ireland from England.

MR. GLADSTONE (after a pause) said: I waited until you rose, Sir, to put the Question, in order that I might be certain, negatively at least, that there was no intention on the part of the Leaders of the opposite Party to enter into this debate. There is nothing that will fall from me, so far as I am aware, that will give them occasion to change that intention. I take this opportunity of saying that, so far as regards themselves, the bulk of the Party who act with them, although, of course, it is matter of serious lamentation to us that a large body of Members of the House of Commons, and many distinguished Members, decline to recognize the necessity of the provisions that we have proposed, yet, as to the mode of their opposition, I am bound to say of them, and of the bulk of their followers, that I do not think we have any reason to complain. There are one or two more or less eccentric and outlying individuals for whose actions they cannot be responsible, and it is not necessary for me to enter into criticisms upon conduct altogether exceptional. I have another duty to perform, and that is to return my thanks to the supporters of this measure. I am thankful to reflect that when I speak of supporters I am able to include a limited though very important portion of the Party opposite. The Gentlemen representing Ireland as Conservative Members have, in most instances, felt it their duty to give a steady support to all the leading provisions of this Bill. I am informed that out of 103 Members representing Ireland in the division on the second reading of the Bill scarcely more than seven Members took part in the division against the Bill. In the division against the 1st clause, which in its permanent operation may be found to be the most important in the Bill, four Irish Members voted only against the clause, and two of these were Gentlemen who undoubtedly voted against it because they thought that it did not confer new liberty, but limited liberty already existing; so that of the 103 Members sent by Ireland to represent her interests in Parliament only two felt it to be their duty to vote against this most important and fundamental clause. On the 7th clause—the other great pillar, if I may so speak of the Bill, and the one which in the present exigency; has excited the greatest interest—not more than six Irish Members recorded their judgment against it. I think that every dispassionate man, reviewing the course of these discussions, whatever may be his own personal leanings and convictions, must feel that, if we be indeed a representative Assembly, this division of Irish opinion, which scarcely amounts to a division—which leaves us at liberty almost to declare it a moral unanimity of opinion—cannot, in view of the interests of the country, be considered less than a most significant and gratifying fact. Passing from that, I desire to return my respectful acknowledgments to those other than Irish Members on the opposite side of the House to whom we owe much of the steady, patient labour, and generous and encouraging support that have enabled us to bring this Bill to its third reading. I desire to make these acknowledgments, first of all, again to the numerous and well-instructed Representatives from Ireland who have so considerately made their own proposals, and so loyally and so generously helped ours; and secondly, to that mass of Members who, reckoned by the hundred, and well entitled by their knowledge and intelligence to enter into the discussions on this Bill, have yet refrained upon almost every occasion from entering into those discussions, lest unawares they should multiply the physical obstacles to its passing, and thereby prevent the attainment of the object in view. My hon. Friend (Mr. George Russell), who spoke with much ability from this side of the House, advised that I should not offer any reply to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). I had no intention of offering to that speech any detailed reply, nor of entering into any detailed discussion of the Amendment of which the noble Lord has given Notice. The terms of that Amendment, in fact, enable me to deal with it, from my point of view, in a very convenient and summary manner. It contains six propositions, some of them negative and some of them affirmative, and my humble method of dealing with those propositions is to take all the negative propositions and to convert them into affirmative propositions, and all the affirmative propositions and convert them into negative propositions. By this most expeditious process I find that the noble Lord's Amendment, so modified, becomes an adequate and satisfactory exposition of my own views on this subject. The speech, however, of the noble Lord does not admit of being dealt with quite so briefly. That speech is a presentative speech—it is eminently presentative of the opinions and ideas of the noble Lord. It abounded in clamatory invective, of a large portion of which I had the honour and the distinction of being the subject. There are in creation small animals whose office it is to bite, and who are able to produce a sense of irritation on the part of a person bitten. There are also other small animals whose office it is to bite, but whose victim is left unconscious that he has been actually bitten. I may say that, so far as comparisons can be made, the effect of the speech of the noble Lord reminds me of the second rather than the first class of these small animals. Now, one counsel I ventured to give to the noble Lord, and that is to keep himself to rhetoric, of which he has at his time of life, no inconsiderable mastery; but, above all things, to eschew dealing with facts, for I listened carefully to everything in his speech that purported to be a statement of fact, and I believe I am literally accurate when I say that there was not one of those which would be sustained in their accuracy—from the first which alleged that the “three F's” were the plan of the scheme of the Irish Land League, to those later ones, of which two were concerning myself, the first of which I took exception to when it was uttered, and the second of which was that I had a few nights ago confessed that the Act of 1870 perpetrated an enormous act of confiscation; and, therefore, Sir, I beg humbly to decline being bound by any one of the statements or facts made in the speech of the noble Lord. I would again counsel the noble Lord to keep to rhetoric. If he does that I have no doubt he will do extremely well, for rhetoric and declamation are arts in which it is difficult to excel, provided you relieve yourself from the fetters and hindrances which are imposed upon some men in speech by a slavish adherence on their part to accuracy of fact. I will not speak of the originality of this measure, nor will I speak of my own consistency in regard to which I have said on former occasions what appeared to be necessary. I should be doing what would be excusable at this stage of the Bill with

Mr. Gladstone

I to waste the time of the House by making a long speech. There is, however, one point to which I should wish to bring the mind of the House for a moment, and I will do so in as few sentences as possible. It is alleged in the Amendment of the noble Lord that the measure has been the product of revolutionary agitation. I have never disguised from this House that it is, in my opinion, a most grave and serious matter to bring into a Court of Justice for alteration and re-consideration private contracts entered into by private individuals, and I am prepared fully to admit that the institution of a Court for such an object is an exceptional and an extreme proceeding. I, however, entirely deny that the other main provisions of this Bill are open to the same objection. With regard to the provisions for the extension of the tenant right and for the prevention of the too frequent augmentation of rent, there is nothing extreme or exceptional in the Bill. I presume, therefore, that it is to the institution of the Court for the purpose of fixing the rent that the noble Lord refers when he says that the provisions of the measure are the result of revolutionary agitation. But how was it that the necessity for the institution of such a Court was made evident? It was made evident, if anywhere, by the Report of the Richmond Commission, which was concurred in not only by the Liberal minority, but by the Conservative majority, who, in a special sense, represented the landed interest in Ireland, and who felt it to be their duty to recommend that there should be legislative interference to check the undue augmentation of rent. That recommendation is the foundation of the provision that we have introduced into this Bill. Does the noble Lord think, when the representatives of the landed interest found it necessary to go to such a length in the recommendations they made, that even if it had been our disposition to have stopped short of that recommendation, it would have been possible for us to do so? I am quite sure his intelligence will make him perceive that the very moment that recommendation went forth from such a source it became absolutely certain—which I do not think Gentlemen opposite will deny—that any measure which was to have a chance of dealing with the question of land in Ireland must contain, within whatever limitations, provisions giving discretion to the Court with respect to contracts. That recommendation we have dealt with, I believe, in the spirit of moderation, and we have certainly attached limitations to the provisions in which we seek to give effect to it. In the recommendation itself there were no words which conveyed an idea that it was intended that the application of that principle should be other than universal and perpetual. The Bill, as it stands, however, provides that the application of that principle need not be universal or perpetual. No holding in Ireland will come within the jurisdiction of the Court except by the act of either the landlord or the tenant. We have provided that it need not be perpetual, because there are various contingencies contemplated by the Bill under which the tenants in Ireland now invested with power to go into Court may come to be divested of that power; and therefore it remains that Parliament, in its consideration of this most important recommendation, has not accepted it in a spirit of reckless vehemence, but rather, while leaving it in all the force which seems necessary to meet the emergency of the case, has made provision to keep within the limits of that necessity the action of a principle which we deem and admit to be exceptional. Then, again, there was the difficult subject of fair rent which we had to deal with. I think that it does some honour to the House of Commons—and, certainly, the compliment I feel bound to pay the House in this respect falls with full force upon hon. Members opposite—that it should have entered largely into a discussion of this subject, and should have been able finally to arrive at a conclusion in reference to it without having exhibited sharp and painful differences of opinion with reference to it. In using the term “fair rent,” I believe that we have secured a rent that will really be fair to all parties. I believe that we have acted wisely in having disembarrassed ourselves of the difficulty of attempting to guide the Court in arriving at a conclusion as to what a fair rent should be, and in leaving the whole matter to the discretion of the Court. We have been able to take that course safely for two reasons. The first is this, that in Ireland the forming of an estimation of fair rent is already a matter known to the usage of the country and its Courts. In Ulster and out of Ulster, since the Land Act, there have been various forms of proceedings before the Courts, which have indirectly, but substantially and effectually, raised the question of fair rent. That being so, and it having been found practicable by the Courts to handle that difficult question without dissatisfaction or palpable injustice to either party, I believe we have done wisely to leave the matter in their hands; because any efforts of ours to guide them, imperfect as they must have been, would only have tended, in all likelihood, to induce confusion rather than to facilitate the working of the Bill. But there was another reason why it was well, as I think, that we should not attempt to define scrupulously a fair rent, and it was this—that, happily, in Ireland a fair rent in many cases—I do not now enter into the question whether in the majority of cases or not—but in many, in very many cases, a fair rent is a thing perfectly well known and understood by practical experience. There is no district in Ireland in which fair rents are not known, in which the thing meant by a fair rent is not practically and popularly understood. That being so, we have deemed it better rather to rely upon the traditions of the Court, and upon the knowledge current and recognized in the country, than to attempt difficult, not to say impossible, definitions. I am very glad, if I understand aright, so far as regards any large body of Members of this House, this Bill is to be passed uncontested into the other House of Parliament. It is quite needless for me—I think it would be very bad taste on my part—to attempt to pronounce on the Bill any eulogy whatever. On the other hand, I must be pardoned for saying that against such attacks as have been made upon it I feel it needs no defence.

MR. GIBSON: It is not my intention, Sir, to enter into any long discussion or minute examination of the details of this measure or to review its history. Its scope and its character, its progress, and the various debates that have taken place upon it have been amply placed before the House and the country. The measure has been described by the Prime Minister himself on more than one occasion as one exceptional in its character, and it is absolutely impossible that it can be measured or judged of by any ordinary standard whatever. I venture to think that never was submitted to this House or to any Parliament a measure of so absolutely novel and startling a character. My noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), in a speech somewhat unfairly commented upon—in a speech certainly of marked ability—stated from his own point of view what he conceived to be the circumstances of the introduction of the Bill. I say, without fear of contradiction, that in no civilized country, not in France, Germany, Belgium, or the United States of America, is there any Land Law having any similitude to that which will be established by this Bill; and anyone who looks at the provisions of this Bill and the exposition that has been given of its principles must recognize its sweeping character, for it includes within its purview all tenants, good, bad, and indifferent, and deals out the same standard of justice to all landlords, improving or the reverse, all landlords, whether they have charged little or whether they have charged much. The right hon. Gentleman says that this Bill leaves this House carried by a moral unanimity—[Mr. GLADSTONE made an inaudible remark across the Table.] I have not the slightest desire in any particular to misrepresent anything that fell from the Prime Minister; but I think it not unreasonable, when notice is taken of the character of the divisions on the Bill, to say that, whether or not there will be a division upon the third reading, many Members thought proper to record a protest against principles in this Bill, and that they have done so on many occasions. Many Members, I have no doubt, voted for the Bill on the second reading, considering that in the present state of Ireland some legislation on the Land Question should take place. But I venture to think that not only on these Benches, but among the Members whom the right hon. Gentleman so ably leads, there are some who took part in the divisions on the second reading of the Bill and on clauses that were challenged who felt serious misgivings as to the principles involved. The present position of the Bill is not, in some particulars, exactly the same as when examined at the earlier stages; but I am bound to say, when we come to consider the changes, they can be regarded from many different points of view. I readily admit that many things that were so indefensible that they could not be argued, and were not argued—that many things that were so unintelligible that they could not be construed—have fallen out of the Bill, and that, as a matter of machinery and administration, the Government found it necessary, to insure any working of the Bill at all, to consent to alterations. But many principles and points of a mischievous character still remain unaltered and unamended in the Bill, and I regret to say that the catalogue of serious and mischievous points and principles was enlarged during the progress of the Bill, and notably last night. I am bound to say I think the Prime Minister himself had but a scant amount of sympathy for this most recent Amendment, because I remember that he left to the Chief Secretary for Ireland the difficulties of the task of explaining it and did not commit himself to it. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has been the Minister who has had charge of the Bill. He has had the advantage in that overwhelming task, in addition to his own genius, his own enlightened energy, his own infinite resources, and that versatility which enables him in debate to run “From grave to gay and from lively to severe,” of having been encouraged by a strong and obedient majority ready to cheer and support him always—just as much when he is wrong as when he is right. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech just delivered, has selected one or two points for which he appears specially desirous to obtain the approval of the House and the country. I will pass from his references to free sale without making any elaborate examination of it, but I will make one criticism upon it. Now, at the end of two months, it remains as undefined as it was on the introduction of the Bill what it is that the tenant is permitted to sell. No one who examines the Bill can arrive at the conclusion that a tenant may not be permitted under the operation of the Bill to sell a very substantial part of his landlord's property. In the very clause of free sale some changes which had taken place have been all against the landlord's interest. We were told throughout by the Prime Minister and his Colleagues that the Bill would give a right of pre-emption to the landlords. I am disposed to think the Bill in its present shape leaves the right of pre-emption absolutely worthless. The way in which the Bill originally proposed that a fair rent should be measured dealt with details and particulars in such a way that it was speedily pointed out that it would enable the landlord's rent to be eaten into and possibly destroyed. The Government sought to meet these objections by leaving the whole question absolutely in the control of the Court. The Government have not, however, adhered to their second proposal in its integrity, and have assented to changes which are open to much criticism. An Amendment was introduced at the instance of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), which re-introduced, not in the same form as originally appeared in the Bill, but in more general terms, the same possibly misleading principle, and directed the Court, in measuring the fair rent, to have regard to the tenant's interest, which might be inflamed by prices forced up by giving the pretium affectionis, or by “land-hunger,” of which we have heard so much. If the Court are told, without qualification, that they are to have regard to the tenant's interest, it is competent for the Court, under those words, to arrive at every one of those vicious consequences which had been apprehended from the clause as it previously stood. The way in which the matter was sought to be dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition was entirely logical. My right hon. Friend took up, as the Prime Minister frankly admitted, quite a reasonable line. As late as the year 1878 a Bill was introduced by Mr. Butt—a master of this question—Mr. M'Carthy Downing, who was as well acquainted with it as any Member in this House, and the Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw). That Bill, in its 44th clause, laid down this proposition, which I commend to the attention of the House—and remember that this was the proposition of the Irish tenants, repeated from year to year, and formulated by their most able advocates in Parliament, as to the mode of fixing rents—

Mr. Gladstone

“In fixing the rent to be specified in the declaration of tenancy, the Chairman shall proceed in manner following—that is to say, the rent to be fixed shall be that which a solvent and responsible tenant could afford to pay, fairly and without collusion, for the premises, after deducting from such rent the addition to the letting value of the premises by any improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title in respect of which the tenant on quitting his farm would be entitled to compensation under the provisions of the Land Act."

Well, that proposal was presented for consideration to the House by an Amendment which stood on the Paper for weeks in the name of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. The Government, however, thought it right in their wisdom to know more about the question than those who had studied it for years. And I invite the attention of the House to the fact that all that was asked was the adoption of that proposition, strengthened and developed by words taken from the Government themselves, and possibly by the addition of others which would have made it more definite. Nevertheless, the Government thought proper to leave the matter at large to the Court, with the addition of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, and, also adopting an Amendment which was brought forward a few days ago, they put into the Bill a reference to improvements, not as framed by Mr. Butt, nor as assented to by the hon. Member for the County of Cork, nor as formulated by the Leader of the Opposition, but in a crude and undigested state, which obviously required revision and alteration. This Fair Rent Clause made practically no distinction between good and bad landlords, with this one exception—that a feeble, petty effort was made by the Prime Minister, by taking note of English-managed estates, to save the Bill from the charge of making no discrimination. That little proviso never was of very much practical consequence. It was rendered almost worthless because of the Amendment which had been accepted from the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Then, the admission of the landlord to the Court was at first denied, but had afterwards to be conceded; but it was not conceded frankly and fully. The tenant can go into the Court and say, "Measure me a fair rent." But the landlord must formulate his proposition and demand an increase. Common justice required that both parties should be put on the same footing. Let each party be equally able to appeal to the Court for a fair rent; or if the landlord is required to formulate his demand, the tenant also surely ought to be called upon to state clearly and definitely what he had to object to. The Prime Minister, a few days ago, in Committee, said—

"They were endeavouring by an almost supreme effort to bring about a great and rapid change in the social condition of Ireland."

I do not deny that the effort was a supreme one. It was so when the Bill was introduced, and it became more so during its progress. The measure was not brought in, I feel sure, without very anxious consideration. We know that the Government had been considering it for months, and that the Cabinet had meeting after meeting on the subject. As to leases, they deliberately arrived at the conclusion that they could not ask the House of Commons, no matter what might be their majority, to interfere with existing leases; and anyone who reads the original clause saving existing leases will see that a more intelligible series of propositions was never laid down. For no purpose or consideration were the Government to have tampered with the obligations which tenants had contracted by existing leases. That having been the position taken up by the Government in introducing the Bill, when did the change take place? As lately as June 28, after the second reading of the Bill, when the measure had been for weeks and months, I might almost say, in Committee, the Prime Minister, meeting an Amendment from the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet), said—

"If the hon. Member proposes to say that every provision of these leases shall be brought into Court, that is a proposition to which we are not prepared to assent."—[3 Hansard, col. 1600.]

The very day after that, I believe, we had an absolute—I will not say change of front, because the Prime Minister has requested that that word may not be used—but a very rapid development of opinion took place, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who has had some disagreeable things given him to do which must have tried his legal mind very much, had the task imposed on him of putting on the Paper Amendments with which we are all familiar. The first of those Amendments proposed in regard to every lease in Ireland, no matter when or for what time it was made, or what was the rent, or what its conditions as to improvements, or as to the valuation of the farm, that the most important covenant for the landlord is to be broken and that the tenant may hold on for all time if he likes. Under what circumstances was that Amendment moved? My right hon. and learned Friend moved it in a House not of half its ordinary strength, and he occupied just two minutes in moving it. He read it out as if it were a mere verbal Amendment that required no explanation. The Amendment spoke for itself; but it was impossible to explain or defend it. The Prime Minister is almost always able to say he is adhering verbally to everything that he has said. I have much pleasure in reading his speeches, and I find that it is the hardest thing in the world to take one of his sentences which appears to convey to the House the clearest meaning in regard to which he is not able readily to say he was only referring to some particular thing mentioned in discussion, and, no matter what the language may have been, there is some little word that enables him to point out that he was not correctly understood. On the 29th of June the Prime Minister said that if the object of the hon. Member was to bring the covenants of existing leases under the cognizance of the Court, that would be enlarging the Bill to an extent to which the Government were not prepared to assent. Accordingly, the Prime Minister, severely accurate, to quote the expression of my noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill), does not submit the covenants of leases to the cognizance of the Court, but he saves the Court the trouble, and he himself in the Bill breaks the most important covenant in every lease. The next Amendment was one that conferred on the Court the power of breaking every lease made since 1870. The Irish Land Act of 1870, in clause after clause, indicated to the landlord and to the tenant that they were encouraged and invited to enter into contracts by lease; and to prevent all questions or doubt about the matter the Prime Minister, speaking on the second reading of the Land Bill of 1870, used these emphatic words—

Mr. Gibson

“The Bill will proceed on the principle . . . that from the moment the measure is passed every Irishman, small and great, must be absolutely responsible for every contract into which he enters. . . . We ought to embody nothing in it that can encourage any man to tamper with good faith or to disparage or undervalue in any shape security and solidity of contract.” —[3 Hansard, cxcix. 380.]

It would be impossible for any man to use clearer and stronger words. Is the conduct of the Government in reference to leases defensible? Can any man say it is in accordance with good faith? If solemn and serious contracts, entered into as leases have been, can be broken in the summary way these leases may be, can any contract that can be made or suggested for any purpose be regarded as safe? As to the “three F’s,” the Prime Minister has no objection to be responsible for fair rents and free sale; but he will let no man say fixity of tenure is involved in the Bill. Why? Because in 1870, in speech after speech, he demonstrated that if it were granted in any shape it would bring with it the right of the landlord to compensation. Accordingly, having committed himself to the principle that no matter what happens to the Irish landlord, he shall get no compensation, we have fixity of tenure in this Bill, real, substantial, but denied and very slightly disguised. In the West of Ireland there are a vast number of small tenancies, many of them under £4. What is the position of the landlord there? Under the existing laws of Ireland, the landlord has to pay all taxes and local rates for such small tenancies; and under this Bill he will have to continue paying with great certainty as to the necessity of paying, but with great uncertainty as to whether he will receive the means to do so. If there was one thing in the Bill for the benefit of this poor population, it was the Emigration Clause, which was kept before the House for three nights, and which elicited from the Prime Minister a powerful and eloquent denunciation of the delay; but on the same night that he delivered it, and as a tribute to the delay, he cut the clause down to something so shadowy and frail that, except for the principle involved, it is not worth having. These poor tenants in the over-populated districts of the West, if you freed them this moment from all rent, could not save themselves from periodic famine without relief and substantial assistance. In the face of all these changes—fair rent, free sale, and fixity of tenure—with all the other advantages in the Bill, why the Government deemed it necessary to give an increased scale of compensation for disturbance puzzles me; it is illogical, unneeded, and out of place. It will puzzle anyone to say why it was introduced except as a further anomaly in an exceptional Bill. With all these stupendous and unprecedented changes, where is there about this Bill the element of durability, of certainty, of anything verging on a settlement? Everyone admits there is nothing final in politics; but when Parliament is asked to make a great change by a great measure they have a right to expect that great results will be accomplished, and that the measure will bear fruit for a considerable time. The Prime Minister himself, in the way he has dealt with many topics, has from time to time suggested the possibility of this being anything but a permanent settlement. Whenever it was intimated by the wily, quick-witted, sagacious Members from Ireland that a certain thing would lead to a discussion which would occupy a considerable time, there was a consultation of three wise-heads on the Treasury Bench, and shortly afterwards the wish of the Irish Members was sometimes conceded, with verbal changes, and sometimes postponed until a more convenient season. In this way have been left as legacies to the future the question of absenteeism and of town park lands. Instead of saying — "We are dealing with questions of sufficient magnitude by this Bill, and we will not pledge ourselves now as to how we will deal with other questions, or whether we will deal with them at all," as the Prime Minister was fairly entitled to do, he has said that the views of the Government were not matured, or that the matter may well come up for consideration at a future time. In one point the Prime Minister has almost taken care that this shall not be regarded as a final and durable measure. We are not responsible for the drafting of the Bill or for its shortcomings; the whole responsibility of its passage, its interference with principles, its results, rests absolutely upon the Government. We pointed out to the Government a great flaw in their new drafting which did not exist in the original drafting—that at the end of seven years this Bill would require a further Bill. But because the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) said yesterday that if the Bill were re-committed to deal with this point proposals would be made for the re-committal of several clauses, the Prime Minister re-considered his position, and gave ingenious reasons for leaving the matter so that there must be a Bill dealing with this question at the end of seven years. The Government, having had an opportunity to make this Bill a final one, deliberately elect to leave it open so as to render legislation necessary at the end of seven years. Is this Bill a message of peace to Ireland? Has it been accepted as such? It will concede much that was asked for by the Land League, and more than the most sanguine member ever expected. At the meeting of the Land League last Monday, a meeting at which they acknowledged a munificent contribution of thousands from America, and of £2 or £3 from Ireland, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) said—

"The Land Bill might be the business of the Government, but it was not the business of the Land League as an organization to favour any proposal for alleviating the horrors arising from landlordism, thereby making it more tolerable and giving it a longer lease of life. They did not seek to change landlordism into some tolerable shape; they sought for its extermination."

And that in the face of the stupendous efforts of the Prime Minister to pass this exceptional Bill. That is the way it is received by the Land Leaguers in Ireland. Lately a new proposition has been put forward, in the form of a construction of the Bill which I am happy to say is a false construction, and that is that when this Bill is passed no rents need be paid until they have been fixed and sanctioned by the Court. Bad as the Bill is, it leaves the old rent payable and the landlord in possession of his right to recover it until the gale day next following the fixing of a judicial rent. I admit that the wretched Amendment for the suspension of writs of fi facias, which was passed yesterday, may possibly mislead some people to a confused understanding of the matter. It was passed in a House of less than half its strength, without any Notice whatever, being brought up in manuscript by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The Land League, I believe, have a proposition for the extermination of landlords; the Government are more moderate—they seemed to favour an Amendment which would only have the effect of starving them. If the Amendment had been considered, it would have been seen that it had the practical effect of damning the Bill, for it announces to every tenant who owes money that if he goes into Court he can tie up the debt. Never before was such an invitation given to enter upon litigation. We all know that one of the great difficulties in the way of accepting this Bill, and one which may cause the most serious interference with its progress, is the serious danger of litigation; and, in the face of that fact, I decline to accept this Amendment as a serious proposal of statesmanship. I do not suggest motives, or say that the way it was accepted points to what may be expected to happen; but the Government may have remembered that an untimely birth is often followed by a premature death; and I pass by the Amendment, treating it as an unwholesome fungus in an unsound part of a not very sound Bill. There is one serious and substantial omission from the Bill. If, for high purposes of State, it was found necessary to apply this drastic measure to Irish landlords, to mutilate their property, and deprive them largely of their means of usefulness, at all events in common justice some provision might have been put in which would have guaranteed and insured the enjoyment of the small residue of property which remains to them. Instead of that, we have accepted Amendment after Amendment permitting a possible extension of the redemption period, interfering with the landlord's right of sale and with every possible right, short of getting rent; we have, on the other hand, Amendments proposed, not to give new privileges to the landlord, but to save him from some uncertainties and doubts, and we are met by distinct refusal; and the fact that the Opposition is conducted with forbearance is made a ground for denying measures of justice, which might have been conceded to Obstruction. I am bound to state that there is one thing I contemplate with satisfaction in this Bill. At all events, now that it is about to be passed, we have a right to expect and a right to insist that in Ireland we should have a firm and capable Executive. The nation will insist that the miserable scenes of last winter shall not be re-enacted. Never before in the history of a country or of Parliament has any Government been given, and that without stint, so full a measure of ordinary and extraordinary powers. They have, in fact, been given every power, coercive and remedial, which they asked for or suggested. There can, therefore, be no justification for faltering action, no excuse for feeble words or palsied hands. The responsibility of the Government, always existing, now stands out in conspicuous relief, and the nation will see and judge how that responsibility is fulfilled. The responsibility of the Government must be fulfilled by a resolute maintenance of law and order and full protection of life and property in Ireland. The Government have got all they asked for, and they cannot complain if, during the Recess, their course of administration of affairs in Ireland is regarded, not by us alone, but by the whole nation, with constant vigilance and jealous watchfulness. I am no pessimist. I have hope for the future of Ireland; but my hopes do not depend upon or centre round this Land Law Bill. I have spoken of this Bill, I hope, in no unreasoning spirit. My opposition has been frank and open. I have made already my protest by word and by vote, and shall not vote again against the progress of the Bill. I am speaking now my last words with reference to it. But in parting from this Bill I cannot say that I regard its possible future without much solicitude and many misgivings. It is a measure which has been largely procured and directly influenced in its progress by unrighteous agitation, and which involves, in the case of Ireland, the sacrifice of principles which have tended to make England herself great.

Mr. Gibson

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I cannot but regret, Sir, that a Member of the Opposition, occupying the high and distinguished position which my right hon. and learned Friend worthily enjoys, should have marred the generous tone he took during the Committee stage of the Bill by the course he has now adopted. ["Oh, oh!"] It may be owing to my inexperience in this House, or possibly to the fact that everything is fair in political warfare; but I think it strange that my right hon. and learned Friend, having a carefully prepared speech to deliver, seeing that the Speaker rose, and seeing, too, that the Prime Minister then rose, should not himself have first risen and allowed the Prime Minister to follow him in debate

MR. GIBSON: I wish to explain. I did not see you, Sir, rise, and I was quite surprised to see the Prime Minister rise.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Of course, I accept the explanation of my right hon. and learned Friend. But what has been the course adopted by the Opposition? They have criticized severely every part of the Bill, and now my right hon. and learned Friend has delivered a strong protest against it; but will they dare now to divide upon the third reading? I have crossed swords before now with the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill); but I think the course that he has the courage to take on the present occasion does him credit when compared with the course adopted by the Opposition. Why was it left to an outsider to raise this debate? Why have the Leaders of the Opposition disappeared from the House during the debate? I say it with great respect, but I am bound to say, after observing the course which has been taken by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the Opposition has not the courage of its convictions, and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock has. My right hon. and learned Friend has, in the absence of the Prime Minister, spoken of him in a way that, I think, might have been spared; and he has summed up his criticism by saying that under the Bill the landlord will be damnified, and the tenant assisted at the expense of the landlord. I deny both those propositions. My right hon. and learned Friend asks—What has the tenant to sell if he does not sell the landlord's property? Well, over and over again it has been explained that what the tenant has to sell is his interest in his holding—that is, his right of occupancy, and, outside that, the improvements he has effected, often by his money, and always by his labour. This is not his landlord's property. The tenant must give notice to his landlord of his intention to sell, and as the landlord can buy, in what respect is he damnified? Does he ask to get the tenant's interest in his holding for nothing? My right hon. and learned Friend says that the Court may actually have to say what is a fair price to give. I was, I confess, under the impression that a Court was the proper tribunal to resort to if a man has a right to assert or a wrong to be redressed; and I submit that an impartial Court is the right tribunal to decide the questions which may arise between landlord and tenant in the event of their not being able to agree between themselves. The next point criticized by my right hon. and learned Friend was the fixing of this fair rent by the Court. Does my right hon. and learned Friend want the landlord to obtain an unfair rent? Where is the landlord who will assert that? The provision in question is the best that could be devised for Irish landlords themselves, among whom I have many personal friends. Only yesterday I spoke to one, who said that his rents had not been raised during the 40 years he was in possession of the estate, and that, notwithstanding, he felt he should assist them by making them gifts of timber, slates, and other things. In these good relations how stands his rent. It is paid even in these times. After all, in fixing a fair rent, the Court would simply moderate—to use a University term—between the parties. But, said my right hon. and learned Friend, at least the landlord should be paid the old rent till the new was fixed. The Bill provided that such should be the case, as the new rent was not to become payable until the gale day next after the fixing of it. What unfairness was there in that? And yet, to hear my right hon. and learned Friend, it would be thought that some scheme was carefully wrapped up in the Bill for inflicting injustice on the Irish landlords. As originally brought in, the Bill did nothing more than carry forward the principles of the Act of 1870, which gave protection to occupancy. I will not delay the progress of this measure by any lengthened observations; but will simply say that, in my view, no one who has any knowledge of Ireland can deny that there is an eager wistfulness for the passage of the Bill, and a feeling of great anxiety occasioned by the delay which has occurred in its progress. It will give a security of tenure, which is most strongly desired and needed in Ireland; and it is not the visionary or disastrous scheme which has been pictured from time to time by hon. Members who are opposed to it. I deny that the measure will operate against the landlord; but the peasant as he drives his spade into the ground will feel that his arm is strengthened by knowing that wife and weans will be bettered by it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has immensely exaggerated the effect of the clauses in regard to leases, which only give power to the Court to set them aside in case it is satisfied as to their injustice, and that they have been obtained under a threat of eviction. The hour has well nigh struck when the Bill will pass, and I believe it will be a great and generous message of peace to Ireland. But to bring that peace, language must be used very different from that used by my right hon. and learned Friend. Those are not the words which will win back alienated friends or heal the wounds which civil discord has left festering amongst us. It is my belief that this Bill will give safety to person, will add to the stability of property and the security of the Constitution in Ireland, will give a more manly tone to the nation's strength, and restore a healthy beat to the nation's heart.

The Solicitor General for Ireland

LORD ELCHO said, he joined in the hope that the measure would have the effect of bringing peace to Ireland, even although it sinned against all those principles that had heretofore guided legislation. He was, however, glad that the decencies of procedure had been so far maintained, that a measure of this importance was not passed through both the last stages—Committee and Third Reading—in one night; for, in his experience in Parliament, no Bill of such importance had thus been dealt with. The discussion had been a very useful one, and the House had listened to some very able speeches. He had said little in Committee, but had followed the Bill carefully, and had given his vote whenever he thought its injustice or harshness could be modified or remedied. He felt bound to say that after all the weeks of careful labour in Committee, he did not find that the Bill was any sounder in principle than when he denounced its principles in the debate on the second reading. So far from that being the case, the Bill still was a return to the legislation of the Plantagenets, and to the French Revolution law of "maximum." It destroyed individual liberty and freedom in men's dealings with each other, and confiscated property without compensation. And this was the act of so-called Liberals. The Bill, now more than ever, made the landlord nothing more nor less than a plundered rent-charger. Fair rents were to be fixed, not by the ordinary transactions of ordinary business, but, for the first time in our modern history, by the State. The Court was put in the position of the landlord, and the privileges of property were taken away from the landlord and placed in Commission; while the Bill severed for ever—unless he was prepared to purchase it—the labourer of Ireland from the future occupation of the soil. It further established the principle of the State breaking leases, and using State money to pay arrears of rent—that was, to advance money from public funds for the benefit of those who had repudiated their rightful contracts; while those who, through all this trying agitation discharged their contracts, were left out in the cold, without any benefit at all. A Bill such as this was not worth the support of the House. Its character and origin might be summarized thus. It was a measure "begotten by lawlessness, conceived in fear, founded on injustice, its ends corruption." They could not deny the truth of this. They could not deny that if there had been no Land League, and no resistance to the law, they never would have heard of this Bill. Was any hon. or right hon. Gentleman prepared to say the contrary? He also averred that there had been ill-concealed fear on the part of the Government, which had led them to introduce this measure; and he based his assertion on the words of the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister looked astonished at that statement; but he had himself heard the right hon. Gentleman say, on the 19th of July, that this Bill differed materially from the Irish Land Act of 1870, inasmuch as every line and every clause of this Bill was of vital importance, because the maintenance of law, the security of life and property in Ireland would depend upon them. He therefore asserted that it was in consequence of the fear of lawlessness in Ireland that the Government had brought in this Bill, in the hope of thus protecting life and property, which they should have been able to have secured without legislation of this kind. He maintained that the Bill was founded in injustice, and, further, that its ends were corruption, inasmuch as it was a bribe to the 600,000 tenants in Ireland to obey the law. But would the Bill have the effect of tranquillizing Ireland? He ventured to say, reasoning by the analogy of the past, that this system of concession, followed by coercion and further concession, had alone brought about the present state of things in Ireland; and what was there in this Bill which was calculated to render it more effective for its professed purpose than previous measures? He believed, on the contrary, that it would encourage greater agitation in the future; and, looking at the effect the Bill was producing in this country and in Scotland in disturbing men's minds, and in altering their views as to the rights of property, and the relationship between the different classes which had hitherto governed society, this Bill was fraught with great danger. He was not prepared to let it pass in silence, or without recording his vote against it. He intended to divide the House on the Question. A speech had been made a short time ago by a right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench, in which he denounced the Bill, root and branch; and in the good old days such a speech would have been naturally followed by a division. Now, however, we lived indifferent, if not better days, and the Bill was to be allowed to pass a third reading unchallenged. He admitted that the Conservative Party was in a difficulty. They, or rather their principles, found themselves between the upper and the nether millstone. The upper millstone was the fact that two great Conservative Peers and three Conservative Members of Parliament had put their names to a Report—the Duke of Richmond's—which the Prime Minister had often told the House was the basis of legislation. In their rear, and even on their own Bench, they had right hon. and hon. Gentlemen whose action had also been appealed to by the Prime Minister, as it was in similar circumstances in 1870, in reference to the Disturbance Clause of that Act. He referred to the Representatives of Ulster, whom he would call, if he might do so without offence, the Esaus of Ulster; for what was their position as regards this question of tenant right? They or their fathers or grandfathers, for beneficial purposes to themselves, had sold their birthright, and, to obtain payment of rents and arrears, established tenant right on their estates. He could not understand, for the life of him, how these hon. Members, having done that—either themselves or their ancestors—could bring their consciences to vote for this Bill, which imposed tenant right for ever on every estate in Ireland now free of it, they knowing that the tenant, and not the landlord, would have the benefit of the free sale of tenant right under this Act of Parliament. The Bill allowed tenants to sell their right in the market for the highest price; but the landlord was debarred from getting the highest price he could for his land. Thus, between the upper millstone of the Duke of Richmond's Commission and the nether millstone of the Ulster Representatives, the principles of the Conservatives were ground into impalpable powder. Now, as to the hon. Members below the Gangway on the other side, no doubt their motives were perfectly patriotic, but the fact remained that, in acting as they had acted, they had cast aside all their traditions and principles; and although they might think they were doing what was right and would be beneficial to the country, they were establishing the principle that justice must be measured, not by justice, but by votes; and as sure as they had done that, they would find, when they enfranchized the masses, that they had taught them a lesson they would not forget. In every line of this Bill they had hatched a legislative chicken, that would come home to roost in the homesteads of England and of Scotland, in the houses of the large towns, in their manufactories, in their mines, in their ships, in their scrip and stock. For do not let them imagine if the great Liberal Party thus sanctioned the principle of the spoliation of one class for the benefit of another, that when they had enfranchised, as they no doubt would do one day, an ignorant and unintelligent Briareus, he would be slow to learn the lesson they had taught him, or fail to apply it to all kinds of property alike. He had a good many Friends among what was called the old Whig school. He knew they hated this Bill as much as he did; but they had submitted to it. They were bound down by ties of Party. And these same men who bowed down before the fetish of Party, when held up by their medicine man on the Treasury Bench, laughed at those who worshipped and believed in the Black Virgin of Loretto, and sneered at the untutored Natives of the South Sea Islands who worshipped stocks and stones. [Cries of "Question!"] He was speaking so much to the question that the il-Liberals did not like it. He would venture simply, as regarded his weak Whig Friends, to say that he believed that Party, properly conducted on sound and distinct principles, was the best and soundest form of government. But he would also say this, that he believed man was not made for Party, but that Party was made for man. Holding these views, he believed that this measure, whilst outraging all sound principles of government, would be more hurtful than beneficial to Ireland. This Bill would absolutely destroy the foundation on which our social system had hitherto rested. [Mr. HEALY: Thank God for that!] He accepted that expression in support of what he was saying. It was the truth, and he hoped it would be taken to heart by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Bill would destroy liberty of contract and the security of property, the only sound principle upon which nations could hope to prosper and progress. Holding these opinions strongly, he must record his vote against it. He did not care whether more than half-a-dozen hon. Members accompanied him into the Lobby. "The fewer men the greater share of honour." And if evil should come of this legislation, they would at least be able to say that they had taken advantage of all the Forms of Parliament to resist unprincipled and pernicious legislation.

Lord Kleno

MR. SHAW said, that notwithstanding the strong eloquence poured out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) against the Bill, it struck him forcibly, when listening to that speech, that after all there was an undercurrent of feeling that, on the whole, it was not such a bad Bill. But the noble Lord who had just sat down had the courage of his convictions, and had taken a very different course. He had attacked it root and branch. The noble Lord believed it to be a bad Bill, and, that being his belief, he would not be justified in adopting any other course than that which he had mentioned. The noble Lord said that the lawlessness existing in Ireland was the result of the operations of the Land League; but did the noble Lord think that in any country, even in Ireland, a body of young men of no social position, and no wonderful powers of eloquence, could have got up such a state of things as existed in Ireland if there were no social wrongs in Ireland that gave them power? The social state of Ireland which had brought about this measure sprang from the effects of a series of bad harvests and the action of the landlords themselves. He had by his side the original first copy of the Bill of 1870, and on the margin of it were the notes he made when it was discussed, and they embodied precisely the principles that were involved in the Bill now before them. The noble Lord said the Government had adopted the programme of the Land League. Nothing could be more absurd or incorrect. Why, the Land League at their meetings ridiculed and made it a special point to attack the "three F's." The noble Lord said the Bill would not pacify Ireland. Well, it was very hard to prophecy about Ireland. He thought he might say he had a fair knowledge of the country; and his opinion, which was fortified by letters which he received every day from all parts of Ireland relating to this Bill, was that the Land League was not Ireland; that there was in Ireland an amount of common sense; that the Land League had an amount of common sense; and that when this Bill became law they would see it to be their duty to lay hold of the real principles of amelioration in the Bill, and try to apply them for the benefit and welfare of Ireland. He could not think so meanly of the men at the head of that League as to believe that they would be so lost to all patriotism and right principle as to keep up the agitation for the mere sake of agitation, independently of the good or evil to be effected. He firmly believed that in the Bill there were many things which would tend to cure the sores and evils of his country, and also many things which would improve the system of land tenure. It was true there were points in the Bill that he would like to see improved; but he believed that in the circumstances, with all the surroundings and difficulties that Ministers had to contend with, no better or more complete Bill could possibly have been passed. He earnestly hoped and believed that it would do much in the direction of pacifying Ireland; and, so far as regarded himself, he could honestly say that nothing that one man could do would be left undone to bring its provisions fully and fairly before the minds of the Irish people. He expressed the feeling of every Member of the House when he said he was astonished by the ability with which the Prime Minister had conducted the Bill. The oldest Member in the House had never seen anything like it, and the youngest Member, as long as he lived, would never see anything like it—the earnestness, the wonderful power of language and expression of “the old man eloquent.” The masterly grasp of facts and details, and his enthusiasm in conducting his measure had never been excelled. The Irish people would be grateful for what the right hon. Gentleman had done. He believed that in the hearts of the Irish people there was a deep feeling of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman, and a conviction that he had done his very best for the settlement of the Irish Question. During the right hon. Gentleman’s absence from his Office he had opportunities of becoming acquainted with the opinions of Bishops, priests, and laymen in Ireland, and he found that there was no living statesman in whom the Irish people had such confidence as in the right hon. Gentleman, not because of his great ability, not because of his unexampled position in the world as a statesman, but because they believed he had earnest and honest principles. The Bill was about to pass to “another place.” For himself, he was not concerned as to how the other House treated it. If they showed the wisdom that the aristocracy had always shown in looking at all the circumstances in the face and acting generously with the facts before them, they would send the Bill down to the House of Commons very little changed from the condition in which it was sent up. If, on the other hand, they sent it down so changed that the Government could not accept it, then the agitation in Ireland would broaden and deepen, and the settlement of the question would be as remote as ever. But they anticipated different treatment of the measure by the other House.

Mr. Shaw

MR. WARTON (who spoke amid the marked impatience of the House for a division) was understood to say that the Prime Minister, whatever charges might be fairly brought against him in other respects, had been wonderfully consistent at least in what he had said in 1870 and what he had said this year with regard to Irish ideas. The right hon. Gentleman stated in 1870, as he stated now, that there was an old Irish notion that even when the contract between landlord and tenant had expired, what was called the right of occupancy still remained in the tenant. But while he admitted the consistency of the Prime Minister on that point, he regretted it, because it showed that the right hon. Gentleman’s notion of statesmanship was to give way to Irish ideas. The connection between England and Ireland ought to exercise a civilizing influence on the latter country, and there was no surer mark of the civilization of a country than the observance of contract. In a barbarous country contract was not understood, and when a contract had there been entered into it was not felt that it should be religiously respected. By this Bill the Government were perpetuating ideas which ought to be discouraged, and were not raising Ireland to the high standard of civilization which was indicated by a regard for the sanctity of contract. He looked upon this measure as a relapse from a civilized state to a state of barbarism.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, he did not know whether the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) intended to go to a division on the question of the third reading of the Bill or not—[“Yes!”]—but if he did, he could not refrain from saying a few words as to the vote which he meant to give on that occasion. He had listened to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock with great interest, because every word which had fallen from the noble Lord had found an echo in his heart. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had been taunted by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell) with being the exponent of comedy in that House; but the hon. Member for Aylesbury appeared to be the exponent of broad farce—

And it being ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Debate resumed.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE, on rising, was greeted with loud cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Question!" After comparative silence had been restored, he said, that as hon. Members had now finished exercising their lungs, he might, perhaps, be permitted to observe that he did not intend to pursue his remarks any further. He only rose to appeal to his noble Friend below the Gangway (Lord Elcho) not to proceed to a division. It would be impossible for the noble Lord to get adequate support, and if he challenged a division he could not expect it to have any effect on the future of the Bill.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that, as the noble Lord (Viscount Folkestone) had brought them down to the House at 9 o'clock, he hoped he would give them the advantage of a division. At the same time, he was gratified to find that the idea of dividing upon this measure did not proceed from an Irish Member. The noble Lord had given them a pleasant history of the disintegration of the Conservative Party, and had incidentally alluded to a Commission of which he was not a Member. If the noble Lord had been a Member of it, he would have learnt something which would have prevented him from making his speech. As it was, the noble Lord, like the Bourbons, had learnt nothing and forgotten nothing. For his own part, he had since the year 1852 pursued an even and a continuous course in regard to that subject. ["Divide!"] The House was evidently impatient to go to a division, and he would, therefore, content himself by expressing his satisfaction that the principles which he and others who had been made the objects of unmitigated vituperation had consistently advocated by vote and voice were now triumphant.

SIR HENRY TYLER said, it was true there were but few Members on those (the Opposition) Benches; but he should be proud hereafter, when, perhaps, a measure of a more radical character would be introduced, to recollect that he was one of the few who joined in this final protest against a Bill which they so strongly disapproved.

MR. MILBANK maintained that the course taken by the noble Lord opposite the Member for Wiltshire (Viscount Folkestone) reflected the greatest discredit on the House. Instead of delivering a speech, the noble Lord made some excuse and sat down. The noble Lord had simply been put up to talk the Bill out at 7 o'clock. He saw the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) go up to the noble Lord the Member for Wiltshire—"Question!"

MR. SPEAKER: I must call upon the hon. Member to confine his remarks to the Bill before the House.

MR. MILBANK would not say a word about the Bill. He was happy to say that he had throughout recorded his vote in favour of the measure.

MR. HEALY wished, before the Bill passed from that House, to make one thing clear. [Mr. O'CONNOR POWER: Divide!] He might inform the hon. Member for Mayo that he was in the habit of speaking there despite English Members, and certainly he was not to be cowed by Irish Members. He would not occupy the House more than two minutes, and what he had to say was in reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) on this Bill. The hon. Member seemed to have considerable faith in the measure, and he made certain prophecies with regard to its action in Ireland, and then went on to refer to what course the Land League would take on the measure. He (Mr. Healy) would venture to remind the hon. Member for Cork County, and those especially interested in this matter in Ireland, that the men who had brought this measure about—the men whose determination, whose resolution, and whose persistence had produced this measure—were not those who were now sitting on the Treasury Bench, but the men who were in penal servitude in Dartmoor and in the prison cells at Kilmainham. To those men they owed whatever was good in this Bill, and he begged to return them his most sincere thanks. It was to such men, and to their persistent efforts, that they owed this measure. He gave no thanks to the Government. He had none to give to those Gentlemen who sat on the Treasury Bench. They in Ireland had been accustomed to see every measure that they desired refused them by that House until they were able, in despite of the House or in despite of its opinions, to wring a measure out of the Government of England. They had found the same with regard to this Land Law (Ireland) Bill. They had compelled the Prime Minister of England, who brought about the rejection of much more mild measures 10 years ago and six years ago, which might then have satisfied the people of Ireland—and he, in those days, got up and refused the principle of the measure—they had compelled the Prime Minister of England to swallow his declaration, and to pass in the measure which was now before the House practically the same principles which four or five years ago he had no language strong enough to condemn. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I never said a word upon them.] There was in existence a pamphlet by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), giving extracts and quotations from speeches and writings of the Prime Minister, and it was to his speeches and votes he referred. However, be that as it might, all he had to say on the measure to-night was that they thanked, not the present Government, but they thanked the men whose persistency and resolution had driven the Government into bringing the measure before the House. They were told by the hon. Member for Cork County that that Bill would do a great deal of good in Ireland. Well, there were many sore hearts in Ireland that night, because there were now lying in the prison cells of the Chief Secretary for Ireland 200 of the best and most honest men of the country; and he would say that while those men lay in prison there would be no peace in Ireland. He would say, furthermore, that until that policy of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was discontinued—until they were prepared to pluck from the memory of the Irish people “that rooted sorrow”—no peace or prosperity would return to Ireland, let them pass what measures they pleased.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he could not allow the Bill to leave the House without challenging the declarations of the last speaker. He did not wish to say anything irritating; but he would say this, that he did not believe the Irish people endorsed the sentiments they had just heard expressed. He had opposed the policy of coercion as strongly as the hon. Member opposite—[“No!”]—strongly as any hon. Member in that House; but he was convinced that had it not been for the policy pursued by certain persons, that Bill would have been the law of the land months and months ago, and the prisoners referred to by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy)—some of whom he looked upon as the victims of bad advice, and some as the bad advisers—would never have been arrested. He believed the Irish people were deeply grateful to the Prime Minister for that Bill. They knew with what sorrow of heart he had violated those principles of liberty which he had maintained at all times, not only at home, but in foreign countries, where men were imprisoned for political offences. He had been driven to that course by the conduct of those who, had they been actuated by a true spirit of patriotism, leavened by a little common sense, would have spared their country the bitter herbs with which the dish of the Land Bill had been seasoned.

MR. M'COAN said, that but for the remarks of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) he would have been content to give a silent vote; but he should be sorry if it went forth that the words of the hon. Gentleman represented the opinion of the Irish Representatives on that side of the House, or the feelings of the Irish people, on the Bill now about to be read a third time. He at once confessed what he had always felt—that the measure was largely owing to the agitation which had been initiated and carried on by the Land League, and, so far, much of the credit for it was due to that organization. But, at the same time, neither his conscience nor his sense of fair play would permit him to ignore the fact that its magnificent comprehensiveness was mainly owing to the generosity and justice of Her Majesty's present Government. He acknowledged the concessions which the Prime Minister, step by step, had made; and he believed that the general sentiment of the Irish people would similarly recognize its claims on their grateful acceptance. He sympathized with the men imprisoned in Ireland; but he was not then called upon to express an opinion as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the action that led to their arrest. But he would express an earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government would be able, concurrently with the passing of this Bill, to make some large concession of mercy to these men. If this were done, his conviction was strong that, accompanied by such a measure of mercy, the Bill, when passed, would strike an effectual blow at the root of agitation in Ireland, as all just excuse for it would be removed. At the risk of some unpopularity among his Colleagues, he had voted for the second reading of the Bill; and, as his opinion of it was unchanged, he should vote for its final stage to-night.

Mr. Healy

MR. J. COWEN said, he was reluctant to interpose in that long drawn out discussion, to which it was difficult for imagination to contribute a new thought, or ingenuity to suggest a fresh proposal. But he pleaded, in extenuation of his intrusion at that stage of the Bill, the fact that he had been one of the Members of the Commission whose Report the Prime Minister had more than once declared was the basis of the measure—a Commission which had been inquiring into the causes and extent of agricultural depression, and how far these could be remedied by legislation. He might further say that at no stage of the Bill had he delayed its progress by a single remark or a solitary Amendment. He was told that the first duty of a patriot was silence, and in the wordy warfare of the last few weeks he had the negative merit of having held his tongue. The Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, indulged the hope that it would close a painful chapter of Irish grievances, and transform a poor and disaffected into a prosperous and contented population. That wish had been re-echoed by nearly every succeeding speaker; but it was more a wish than an expectation. The problem dealt with by the Bill was the oldest, most complete, and far-reaching that came within the range of British politics. It embraced agricultural, political, legal, and economic changes, which would go far to re-model the basis of social life in Ireland. It had exercised the ingenuity of successive statesmen. Interest and prejudice, passion and patriotism, rebellion and remedial measures had all, in their turn, been tried; but they had failed to find a cure for the chronic disorder. It had been the occasion of more inquiries and more legislative failures than any Parliamentary question of the time. During the last 40 years five Royal Commissions and 15 Select Committees had investigated the subject. In the same space of time there had been 13 Bills proposed by different Governments, and three times 13 by independent Members. Out of this long list of abortive projects only two had passed into law; and, of those two, one had been an entire and one a partial failure. It was too much to expect that in a field which was so thickly strewn with the wrecks of carefully-devised projects that this measure should be completely successful. It was not within the compass of human wisdom to devise a scheme of constructive statesmanship that would change the organic relations of classes without exciting some prejudices and disappointing many hopes. No settlement, however comprehensive, could at once undo the demoralizing and disintegrating effects of ages of injustice and misrule. The inherited tendencies of generations could not be cured off-hand. All they could anticipate from the Bill was that it would help forward the long deferred work of reconciliation and regeneration, and hasten the end of Ireland's long agony. Some had spoken of the Bill as original. He did not think it could be so described. The question had been dealt with so often—by such different persons, in such different interests, under such conflicting conditions—that strict originality of treatment was impossible. Every single proposal in the Bill had, in one form or other, been made before. But its chief merit consisted in the skill and the dexterity with which old suggestions had been woven into a concrete whole. The materials were not original; but the product evolved by these discussions might be so described. The Prime Minister had exhibited, in conducting it, the very highest faculties of statesmanship. He had been both philosophical and practical—comprehensive enough to grasp great principles, and close enough to apply them. By his patience under delay—inevitable, perhaps necessary, but still troublesome delay—his perseverance in the face of difficulties—some of them unexpected, some of them unnecessary—and by his steady energy and ever ready resource throughout, he had revived the highest and happiest memories of Parliamentary Leadership. However men might differ with the principles of the Bill, however they might question the results it produced, it would be ungenerous and ungracious in the last degree not to acknowledge these powers ungrudgingly. But, while according to the Government the merit of having introduced the Bill, the credit of having initiated it belonged to another. That man was not a Member of the House, but was, unhappily, an inmate of a convict prison. The agitation—which originated in the West of Ireland two years ago, and which in a short time embraced in its ranks the whole of the peasantry of the country—had compelled the Government to submit the Bill, and would compel Parliament to pass it. ["Oh, oh!" and "No, no!"] Hon. Members might object as they liked, but that was the fact; and in politics the first condition of success was to recognize facts, however unpleasant they might be. The Legislature was the machine, the Ministers were the drivers and the engine-men, but the fuel was supplied, and the steam that moved it was generated, by the derided and denounced land agitators. ["Oh, oh!" and "No, no!"] The unwillingness of hon. Gentlemen to listen to these statements would not alter the facts. Agrarian reform in Ireland was not a portion of the programme of the Liberal Party when they took Office 16 months ago. It was added subsequently. During the prolonged and active agitation that preceded the General Election, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Ministry published a list of questions that he deemed pressing. He censured the last Government for supineness, and the last Parliament for its indifference in not grappling with them. In these 22 questions there was a reference to the Irish suffrage and Irish University Education, but nothing about Irish land. ["No, no!"] Cries of "No, no!" did not interfere with facts, and it was a fact he was stating. Out of 300 addresses issued by Liberal candidates in England and Scotland, not an allusion was made to the subject. [Cries of "Question!"]

Mr. J. Cowen

LORD ELOHO rose to Order. He wished to know whether, if the hon. Member was in Order in his remarks, the interruptions of hon. Members sitting immediately behind the Treasury Bench were not disorderly?

MR. J. COWEN, continuing, said, some of those Gentlemen in their addresses denounced Irish obstruction; others coquetted with Irish Home Rule; some of them promised that they would oppose Irish coercion, which promise they had not fulfilled. None of them spoke of Irish tenant right. They dilated on the insanity of the Turkish Convention, on the insincerity of the war in Afghanistan, on the immorality of the struggle in South Africa; but they said nothing of the "three F's." Indeed, he questioned if many of the constituents, or even the candidates, knew the meaning at the time of these cabalistic letters. Yet, notwithstanding this, the half of last Session and the whole of the present one had been occupied in discussing this Irish Question. He was not blaming the Government. They were simply acting according to precedent. It was the usual course under such circumstances. They legislated for Ireland under threats and from fear; and all Parties did it—both those opposite and those on that side of the House. Catholic Emancipation was granted as a result of the agitation by the Catholic Association. The Queen's Colleges and the endowment of Maynooth came as a means of buying off the Repeal agitation. The Church was disestablished, according to the declaration of the Prime Minister himself, in consequence of the determination and desperation of the Fenians. And the Land Bill, in like manner, was a consequence of the agitation that had moved Ireland during the last two years. The lesson he drew from these facts was that the general English public were ill informed of, and indifferent to, what was proceeding in Ireland; for, while they never referred to the question of land reform at the last Election, the same subject was the chief topic on every Irish hustings. The practice that both Parties in the State followed was, in his judgment, cowardly and politically immoral. They refused to deal with the question on its merits, or from a sense of justice or right; but they dealt with it when an agitation made the denial of the demand dangerous to the public peace. If land reform in Ireland was necessary, it was necessary years ago. But the demand made by Mr. Butt and others was treated with indifference, and voted down by the very Party and the very men who were now applauding the passages of the Bill. They did not judge it upon its merits. They judged it from Party exigencies. The agitation had forced it to be a practical measure. For his part, he held that land legislation in Ireland was necessary years since. What he complained of was the delay. But he could not see either the consistency or the wisdom of men supporting projects that they disapproved of, and whose efficacy they denied, merely from compulsion. If a measure was right and just, it ought to be conceded. If it was not right and just, it ought to be resisted, and the men who resisted should courageously face the consequences of their resistance. He did not wish to detain the House or to prolong his observations; but he thought, in justice to the much-denounced Members on the Opposition side, that their share in passing the measure ought fairly to be recognized. He cheerfully and cordially accorded to the Prime Minister and the Government all honour for what they had done; but he repeated that the initiative and the popular force requisite to carry the Bill into law had sprung from the agitation.

MR. R. POWER said, that he should not have wished to interfere in the discussion which had arisen had it not been for some remarks made by the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan). The hon. Member had appealed to the Government to show mercy to the men now imprisoned in Kilmainham Gaol. He fearlessly stated that not one of those men now in prison would come out to-morrow on the terms proposed by the hon. Member for Wicklow. If the Government doubted his word, they could easily afford them the opportunity, and he ventured to say that they had courage and manhood enough to refuse to march out of the prisons into which they had been cast by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Those men had gone to prison believing that they had conducted themselves aright. ["Question!"] Hon. Members cried "Question!" because he was a little too close to the question. It was a question of 200 men being incarcerated in the prisons of Ireland. They could not refer him to a single instance where a Liberal Government had on a previous occasion imprisoned 200 British subjects in Ireland; and the Government dare not bring them to trial in Ireland. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had stated truly enough that the Bill was the result of agitation. It was really the Land League and not the Government which passed the Land Bill of 1881. He would remind the House of the statement made by the Prime Minister at the explosion at Clerkenwell—an explosion which he (Mr. R. Power) condemned in the strongest terms, but which brought about the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Would the right hon. Gentleman venture to deny that? Those agitations taught the Irish people that they need no longer supplicate, but might demand as of right the redress of their grievances. For many years Irish Members had in that House asked for the redress of grievances. But until the most powerful organization that had ever been known in the world was formed, it was all in vain. In consequence of that agitation, the present Bill came into existence. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman supported the Land Bill which had been brought in by the late Mr. Butt—a Land Bill much milder than the one upon which the House was about to divide? Mr. Butt had no organization. He had eloquence and determination, but of what use were they? It was not until his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) started the organization in Ireland, until he showed to the people the real strength which organization gave them, that the Liberal Government thought it would be a very wise thing to take up the Land Question in Ireland. The First Lord of the Treasury had often taunted the Irish Party for not supporting him in connection with many of the Amendments to the Bill. Well, he did not know that they owed much gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman. He had yet to learn that a people owed gratitude for justice, and this Bill was one of mere justice. If there were any faults in it, the right hon. Gentleman must be blamed for them. When certain Irish Members organized a deputation to wait upon the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of laying before him what they believed to be the opinions of the Irish people, how did the Government act? They sent word that no Irish Member sitting below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House should go with the deputation.

MR. GLADSTONE: Who did that?

MR. R. POWER said, he would inform the right hon. Gentleman in one minute. Both the hon. Members for Louth asked to be admitted with the deputation, and were told that no Member sitting in the part of the House which he had already designated would be allowed to accompany the deputation.

MR. GLADSTONE: By whom? Name, name!

MR. R. POWER said, that two hon. Members would get up and give the names. They were told so by the Whips of the Liberal Party. ["Oh!" and "Name, name!"] He knew that he for one was most anxious to attend the meeting; but he was refused admittance. [Cries of "By whom?" and "Name, name!"] The Prime Minister asked him to name. They on that side of the House did not get much information from the Treasury Bench; but his hon. Friend the Member for Louth would be quite prepared to state their names. [Cries of "Name, name!"]

MR. CALLAN: I shall presently be prepared to name them. ["Order!" and "Name!"]

MR. GORST: I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary is in Order in interrupting by persistent cries of "Name, name?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I rise to Order. [Loud cries of "Order!" and continued interruption.]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. and learned Gentleman having risen to Order, is in possession of the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. and learned Member opposite has risen to Order. He has challenged what I have done, and I rise to Order to appeal to you, Sir, upon the Question which the hon. and learned Member has put. The hon. Member who was addressing the House stated that he and other people had gone personally to the Government—[Cries of "No!"] Allow me to appeal to the recollection of the House. The hon. Member, first of all, vouched—[Mr. GORST: Hear, hear!]

Mr. R. Power

I ask whether the hon. and learned Member for Chatham is in Order in interrupting me? The hon. Member who was addressing the House first of all vouched the Members for Louth, and being called upon to give the names said, "I myself." [Cries of "No!"] The hon. Member having thus vouched himself as having gone to the room with the deputation—[Cries of "No, no!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is in possession of the House, and he is entitled to proceed to the end of his address without interruption, so long as he speaks to the point of Order.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If I have misunderstood the hon. Member who was addressing the House—if he says he made no such statement, I shall, of course, accept his denial; but at present all I can say is that it was my impression that he did make such a statement, and it was under that impression that I called upon him as having vouched that he went to the room.

MR. R. POWER said, he was very sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had misunderstood him. He had not said that he went himself to the deputation room. He did not believe in accompanying deputations to Englishmen. The facts of the case were that he asked the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) about the deputation, and that hon. Member told him that he was informed by a Gentleman who they could well suppose possessed the confidence of the Government—one of the Commissioners under the Bill—namely, Mr. Litton, that no Irish Gentleman sitting upon his side of the House could accompany the deputation. He then observed to the hon. Member for Louth that Mr. Litton, though a thick-and-thin supporter of the Government, was perhaps not entitled to say as much as he did say. To that the hon. Member for Louth replied that Lord Richard Grosvenor had informed Mr. Litton that no Irish Member sitting below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House would be allowed to go with the deputation. He would now return to the question of the Land Bill. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had made one or two observations which he could not refrain from noticing. The noble Lord appealed to the Government on behalf of the landlord class, saying—"The landlords have always supported you in Ireland, and yet now at the eleventh hour you throw them over." Well, he agreed with the noble Lord in every word which he had spoken. The landlords had been the support of the Government and the House. They had supported them in connection with every miserable, petty, or tyrannical Act which had been passed in reference to Ireland, and they had carried out the laws passed by Englishmen in every particular, on the Bench and in other Offices. He was not sorry that the landlords seemed now to be inclined to refuse to act any longer as a buffer between the Government and the people of Ireland. He was not, however, so prejudiced as to say that the Bill now before the House contained nothing good. He admitted frankly that it was the best which the English Government could pass at the present time. But it had always been the misfortune of Ireland to suffer on account of the Party tactics of English politicians. If the Government were anxious to do justice to Ireland, as he believed the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was, they could not carry with them the great phalanx behind them, consisting of the Independent Liberals. The worst point of all was that there was no real Radical Party in the House. The one thing capable of destroying the Radical Party in this country was the Birmingham caucus. [Cries of "Question!"] He knew very well that hon. Members below the Gangway opposite would cry "Question!" at that statement, for to them this was a very disagreeable subject to talk about. His opposition to the Land Bill originated in the views which he entertained with regard to the 26th clause. He had seen in that clause a fixed purpose to depopulate Ireland—"No, no!"—and though hon. Members opposite cried "No!" they would find that the people of Ireland had viewed the clause in the same light. But his Colleagues had virtually killed that clause, and had forced the Government to reduce their original estimate of the expenditure under its provisions to the comparatively small sum of £200,000. He should not speak his honest convictions if he did not declare that this Bill could not be regarded as a final settlement.

MR. CALLAN said, he regretted that his name had been introduced, but he must detain the House a few minutes while he offered a personal explanation. The conversation that had been referred to took place six months ago, and it had been accurately reproduced by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power). He (Mr. Callan) came into this present Parliament belonging to the same Party that he had acted with for 12 years, and it was not until he heard from the reading of the Queen's Speech that coercion was to precede land reform, that he tore up the card securing his place on the Liberal side, and changed to the other side of the House.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he was travelling beyond the limits of personal explanation, and that the Question before the House had nothing to do with the tearing up of his card.

MR. CALLAN proceeded to say that he was in 1870 the secretary of a meeting of the Irish Members to consider the Land Bill of that year, and when he heard that the Land Question was again to be dealt with, he thought a similar meeting of Irish Members would be held. Upon learning, however, that arrangements had been made for a deputation, he said to Mr. Litton, who appeared to have the matter in charge, that he should like to accompany the deputation, and Mr. Litton told him that it was the express wish of the Prime Minister that no Members from the opposite side should go, that the right hon. Gentleman entertained a strong personal objection to any Member sitting in Opposition going with the deputation upon this matter. He (Mr. Callan) expressed doubt as to that, and Mr. Litton said they were so careful about those who were to go on the deputation, that a list had to be submitted to the chief Government Whip (Lord Richard Grosvenor). He was told by his Colleague that a similar intimation had been conveyed to him.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he rose to request the favour of being allowed to make a personal explanation, as his name had been introduced. He could promise it should not be one-twentieth part of the length of that of the hon. Member. So far as he was concerned—he could not say anything about Mr.

Litton — there was not the slightest shadow of foundation for any portion of the statement which had been made.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, he was sorry to be obliged to trouble the House for a few moments with what seemed to be required from him—namely, a personal explanation of his course in this matter. He could assure the House that this was the first time he had heard anything of the strongly expressed opinion and wish of the Prime Minister. He did not believe that he ever expressed such a wish on the part of the Prime Minister to Mr. Litton, and he very much regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) was not then present. He could assure the House that this was the first he had heard of it; and he was perfectly certain that the House would believe him that he could not possibly have invented such a statement, as it would not have been the perfect truth.

MR. E. COLLINS said, he was unwilling to intervene in this conversation; but he considered it only fair and just to those who were involved in this accusation to state the facts in reference to the deputation in question. He was a member of the deputation. It originated from a meeting, not of the Irish Members, but of the Liberal Party interested in the passing of a Land Bill for Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER: After the personal explanations that have been made, I think I ought to point out to the House that the Question before it is the third reading of the Land Bill.

MR. BLAKE said, he should be sorry if the closing words on this Bill on the part of Irish Members should appear to be those of ungraciousness towards the Prime Minister, to whom the Irish people owed so much for his efforts to benefit them by this measure. While he (Mr. Blake) believed that no man had the interest and welfare of Ireland more at heart than the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), he thought that on the present occasion the hon. Member had shown more indiscretion than, he was sure, the hon. Member on reflection would wish to show. The hon. Member for Wexford was young, earnest, and impulsive, and the latter quality, as on the present occasion, sometimes led him into not making due allowance for the difficulties of the Government in not accomplishing all he deemed desirable in the interests of the country. He (Mr. Blake) spoke with perfect independence when he said that the Bill did not go as far as he could wish; and he agreed with the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) that it would not be considered a final settlement of the Irish Land Question, as it was not unlikely that after a trial some defects would have to be remedied, and therefore it would be premature to declare the Bill, good as it undoubtedly was, a finality. In its present form it would confer much benefit on the Irish people if properly carried out. But he believed that the Prime Minister had gone as far as he could, and, as an Irish Member, he offered the right hon. Gentleman his most sincere and grateful thanks.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 220; Noes 14: Majority 206.

AYES.

| | |
|----------------------------------|----------------------------|
| Acland, Sir T. D. | Chambers, Sir T. |
| Agar-Robartes, hn. T. C. | Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E. |
| Agnew, W. | Chitty, J. W. |
| Ainsworth, D. | Clarke, J. C. |
| Allen, H. G. | Cohen, A. |
| Allen, W. S. | Colebrooke, Sir T. E. |
| Allman, R. L. | Collings, J. |
| Anderson, G. | Collins, E. |
| Archdale, W. H. | Colman, J. J. |
| Armitage, B. | Colthurst, Col. D. la T. |
| Armitstead, G. | Corbet, W. J. |
| Arnold, A. | Corbett, J. |
| Asher, A. | Corry, J. P. |
| Balfour, Sir G. | Cotes, C. C. |
| Balfour, J. B. | Courtney, L. H. |
| Barran, J. | Cowan, J. |
| Beaumont, W. B. | Cowen, J. |
| Blake, J. A. | Cowper, hon. H. F. |
| Blennerhassett, Sir R. | Craig, W. Y. |
| Blennerhassett, R. P. | Creyke, R. |
| Bolton, J. C. | Cross, J. K. |
| Brassey, Sir T. | Cunliffe, Sir R. A. |
| Bright, rt. hon. J. | Daly, J. |
| Brinton, J. | Davey, H. |
| Broadhurst, H. | Davies, D. |
| Bruce, rt. hon. Lord C. | Dawson, C. |
| Bryce, J. | Dilke, Sir C. W. |
| Butt, C. P. | Dillwyn, L. L. |
| Buxton, F. W. | Dodson, rt. hn. J. G. |
| Caine, W. S. | Duckham, T. |
| Callan, P. | Earp, T. |
| Cameron, C. | Edwards, H. |
| Campbell, Lord C. | Errington, G. |
| Campbell-Bannerman, H. | Evans, T. W. |
| Carbutt, E. H. | Fairbairn, Sir A. |
| Carrington, hn. Colonel W. H. P. | Farquharson, Dr. R. |
| Causton, R. K. | Fay, C. J. |
| Cavendish, Lord F. C. | Ferguson, R. |
| Chamberlain, rt. hn. J. | Findlater, W. |
| | Fitzmaurice, Lord E. |
| | Fitzwilliam, hn. H. W. |

Forster, rt. hon. W. E. Molloy, B. C.
 Fort, R. Monk, C. J.
 Fowler, W. Moore, A.
 Fry, L. Morgan, rt. hon. G. O.
 Gabbett, D. F. Morley, A.
 Gill, H. J. Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.
 Givan, J. Noel, E.
 Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E. Nolan, Major J. P.
 Gladstone, H. J. O'Beirne, Major F.
 Gladstone, W. H. O'Brien, Sir P.
 Gordon, Sir A. O'Connor, D. M.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J. O'Donoghue, The Gourley, E. T. O'Gorman Mahon, Col.
 Grant, A. The Gurdon, R. T. O'Kelly, J.
 Hamilton, J. G. C. O'Shaughnessy, R.
 Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir Otway, A.
 W. G. V. V. Paget, T. T.
 Hardcastle, J. A. Palmer, C. M.
 Hartington, Marq. of Palmer, G.
 Hastings, G. W. Palmer, J. H.
 Hayter, Sir A. D. Parker, C. S.
 Henderson, F. Pease, A.
 Henry, M. Peddie, J. D.
 Herschell, Sir F. Playfair, rt. hon. L.
 Hollond, J. R. Powell, W. R. H.
 Holms, J. Power, J. O'C.
 Holms, W. Power, R.
 Hopwood, C. H. Price, Sir R. G.
 Howard, G. J. Pugh, L. P.
 Hughes, W. B. Ralli, P.
 Hutchinson, J. D. Ramsay, J.
 Illingworth, A. Reid, R. T.
 Inderwick, F. A. Richardson, T.
 James, O. Rogers, J. E. T.
 James, W. H. Russell, G. W. E.
 James, Sir H. Rylands, P.
 Jenkins, D. J. Samuelson, H.
 Johnson, E. Seely, C. (Nottingham)
 Johnson, W. M. Shaw, W.
 Kinnear, J. Slagg, J.
 Labouchere, H. Smithwick, J. F.
 Laing, S. Smyth, P. J.
 Law, rt. hon. H. Spencer, hon. C. R.
 Lawrence, W. Stanley, hon. E. L.
 Lawson, Sir W. Stewart, J.
 Lea, T. Stuart, H. V.
 Lee, H. Sullivan A. M.
 Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S. Sullivan, T. D.
 Leigh, hon. G. H. C. Summers, W.
 Leighton, Sir B. Synan, E. J.
 Lever, J. O. Talbot, C. R. M.
 Lubbock, Sir J. Tennant, C.
 Macfarlane, D. H. Thomasson, J. P.
 Mackie, R. B. Tillett, J. H.
 MacIver, P. S. Trevelyan, G. O.
 Macnaghten, E. Vivian, A. P.
 M'Carthy, J. Walter, J.
 M'Clure, Sir T. Waugh, E.
 M'Coan, J. C. Webster, J.
 M'Kenna, Sir J. N. Wedderburn, Sir D.
 M'Lagan, P. Whitbread, S.
 M'Laren, C. B. B. Wiggin, H.
 M'Laren, J. Williams, S. C. E.
 M'Minnies, J. G. Williamson, S.
 Mappin, F. T. Willis, W.
 Marjoribanks, Sir D. Wilson, Sir M.
 Marriott, W. T. Wodehouse, E. R.
 Martin, R. B. Woodall, W.

TELLERS.

Grosvenor, Lord R.
Kensington, Lord

NOES.

Barttelot, Sir W. B. Scott, M. D.
 Bective, Earl of Tyler, Sir H. W.
 Dixon-Hartland, F. D. Warton, C. N.
 Folkestone, Viscount Whitley, E.
 Gorst, J. E.
 Holland, Sir H. T.
 Hubbard, rt. hn. J. G. Elcho, Lord
 Onslow, D. Hay, rt. hon. Admiral
 Ross, C. C. Sir J. C. D.
 Schreiber, C.

Bill passed.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

IRISH FISHERIES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BLAKE, in rising to call attention to the depressed condition of the sea fisheries of Ireland ; and to move—

"That it is the opinion of this House that it is the duty of the Government to take measures to render the Irish Fisheries more available as a means of affording increased food and employment," said, that he considered he rose under very adverse circumstances, as the House had been, until that moment, engaged with another very important matter.

 His object was to show that great benefits had been conferred on the fishermen by the aid already afforded by the Reproductive Fund, and which afforded a precedent for similar assistance being given to the eight maritime counties without loans. He might also mention that enormous benefits had been conferred on the coast population of the county of Cork by the benevolence of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who, with her characteristic generosity, had aided many fishermen between Baltimore and Cape Clear to follow their occupation.
 It was of the highest importance to develop such a fertile source of food as the sea fisheries of Ireland. At present they did not produce more than £700,000 a-year; but if they were properly developed they might produce £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, materially increase, and, at the same time, cheapen the food of the people, and serve as an admirable nursery both of the Royal Navy and of the Mercantile Marine. Every Fishery Company had failed because of the tempestuous character of the coast. It was only at certain periods when fishermen could safely venture out to sea, and the only success gained had been in cases where fishing and farming were combined. As a means of developing this industry, he suggested that the coast population should be assisted with proper appliances for fishing, and that the necessary aid for that purpose might be given, not out of the Imperial Exchequer, but from the Church Surplus Fund. He believed the Government never had so favourable a chance of doing good at so little cost. It was their incumbent duty to do all in their power to develop the resources of Ireland. It was strange to see fully £2,000,000 worth of good food allowed to be unavailed of, which, besides other advantages, would have afforded vast employment in its capture, and helped to train a large amount of the coast population to various industrial pursuits connected with fisheries. Besides that, by putting the fishing industry in a proper position, they could be rendering themselves less dependent on foreign countries for food supplies. The Chief Secretary had been so occupied with the Land Bill that he could hardly be expected to have devoted much attention to the question of the fisheries; but now that the Land Bill was over, for the present, at least, he (Mr. Blake) hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inquire into the subject, with a view of doing something early next Session. He, therefore, with much confidence, begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he thought it would be well to encourage the development of the industrial resources of Ireland, and the fisheries among them. Apart from industrial considerations, it was a matter of the greatest importance that every encouragement should be given to rearing a hardy race of fishermen, who, after all, were the very best men for recruiting the Navy. As a Scotchman, he ventured to remark, in reference to Irish fisheries, that he thought Irishmen, with the power of fishing off their own coast, might develop to a greater extent than they had done their own fisheries. He lived for many years near a fishing village on the Ayrshire Coast, where, year after year, he observed a small fleet of fishing vessels laid up for the winter. He found that, for the most part, these vessels did not fish on the Scotch Coast, but were accustomed, in the Spring of the year, to sail for the Irish Coast, where they reaped a rich harvest. He thought, therefore, that their Irish friends might do more themselves to develop their own fisheries; and he also thought the Government would spend money well that would in any degree develop that industry. He had great pleasure in seconding the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is the opinion of this House that it is the duty of the Government to take measures to render the Irish Fisheries more available as a means of affording increased food and employment,"—(Mr. Blake,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. W. E. FORSTER, said, that, notwithstanding the pressure of other Business, the question of the Irish fisheries had not been neglected during the year. A considerable sum had been spent on the erection of piers, chiefly in the Western Counties, where the people were very poor, and where there was a vast congestion of the people. Although he did not think a population, partly agricultural and partly fishers, could compete with those who devoted their whole energies to fishing, still that was no reason why they should not do what they could to develop the fisheries of a country whose coasts abounded with fish. Aided by a munificent donation from Canada, some £60,000, including £45,000 from the Exchequer, had been appropriated for the erection of 30 piers, mostly in the Western Counties. As to the reproductive loan to Irish fishermen, he wished the fact could be impressed on Parliament and the country that these loans had been granted to very poor people, yet they had been paid with the greatest possible regularity, only £900 being overdue out of £30,000.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he hoped that the attention of the Government would be given to the condition of the South, as well as the West Coast of Ireland. All efforts, however, to improve the fisheries of Ireland would be ineffective unless the Government turned its attention to the charges made by Irish railways for the carriage of fish, which, in some cases, were almost prohibitive. Remarks had been made about the superior success of Scotch and English fishermen on the English Coast as compared with the Irish. But it ought to be remembered that the former had better markets at command; and if Companies were formed it would be better that they should have, if not their headquarters, certainly some depôts, at English or Welsh seaports, so as to avoid the heavy charges of transport on the Irish railways.

Mr Blake

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to call attention to the Reproductive Loan Fund, which he thought ought to be extended. As far as Galway was concerned, the most successful fishing was by the fishermen themselves. He only knew of one successful Company, and that was an Irish Company, which had succeeded where a Cornish Company had failed. The loans made by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts to individual fishermen had been of the greatest advantage, and had greatly stimulated the industry of the fishermen. His noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury two years ago expressed himself as incredulous as to the repayment of loans to small fishermen. But in the event it was shown that payments were most regular. There was also a great deficiency of harbours and piers. Unfortunately, the choice of the places for piers was not fairly made, but depended upon the amount of pressure which influential localities brought to bear upon head-quarters.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that at present only eight maritime counties got assistance from the fund; and his hon. Friend justly complained that the other nine counties should be left out in the cold. The right hon. Gentleman was in perfect agreement with his hon. Friend as to the importance of the industry and the necessity for developing it. The right hon. Gentleman also admitted that the mode of developing that industry by loans had been found most successful, as was shown in the case of the reproductive loan, the loan of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and the Canadian Fund. It was, therefore, the duty of the right hon. Gentleman, as Chief Minister for Ireland, to see that the loans, which he admitted to be deficient, should be increased. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would knock at the door of the Treasury until he extracted something from the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish). He would request the right hon. Gentleman to devote the most serious attention to this subject during the Recess, and to come before Parliament with a practical scheme next year.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he hoped that the Government would not turn a deaf ear to the appeal of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Blake). He could bear witness to the truth of his statement, both as to the productiveness of the Irish fisheries, and to the sad fact that, from want of proper boats and nets, the coast population had the mortification of looking idly on while well-appointed boats from Cornwall, the Isle of Man, and even from France, reaped golden harvests in which they could not share. It would be said, why did they not show the same enterprize, energy, and industry as their rivals? He (Mr. Villiers Stuart) could assure them that the Irish fishermen were not wanting in energy and daring; but they were in the position of workmen who had lost their tools. Their boats had again and again been destroyed for want of proper shelter, and they were too poor to replace them; while their Cornish, Manx, and French rivals had long ago been provided with harbours on their coasts. He was convinced that public money could not be laid out to greater advantage than in loans to these poor fellows, to enable them to procure boats and nets. Those were their stock-in-trade; and surely it was a legitimate proceeding to enable workmen who lost their tools to replace them, instead of leaving them to swell the ranks of pauperism, and increase the poor rates. If they had proper boats and nets, they would often take in a single season fish enough to repay the entire loan; and not only that, but the population for miles inland would be benefited by a wholesome supply of valuable food. The granting of this relief was the more important at the present crisis, when serious consequences were likely to arise from want of employment, both on the coast and further inland. He must mention that at Ardmore, where valuable fisheries existed, a pier might be built at a very moderate cost, which would enable the fishermen to benefit by the vast shoals of sprats, mackerel, and other fish, which annually visited their coast. He could say the same of Dungarvan Bay. In both these cases most favourable Reports had been made to the Government by the Inspector sent down for that purpose. He had had the honour of taking part in a deputation to the Treasury last Session, and he had understood the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to say on that occasion that the £5,000 annually granted would not be suspended in consequence of the Canadian loan. [Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH dissented.] Well, he had a strong impression that the noble Lord had said so. It was unfair to relieve the West of Ireland at the cost of other distressed districts, which were equally in need of assistance.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he wished to remove a misapprehension which seemed to be shared by hon. Members. When a special grant was made last year, it was on condition that the ordinary annual grant should be suspended for a time. In the present year a certain sum had been taken for the completion of works begun before. Next year, and in subsequent years, the matter might be open for consideration.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked, that it was rather trying to Scotch and English Members to see so much time devoted to Irish questions. The whole of the early Sitting had been taken up by an Irish subject, and now another Irish question was before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought the Irish fishermen could not expect much from the economy of the Financial Secretary. He was sorry this question had excited the indignation of an excellent Scotch Representative; but he must remind the hon. Gentleman that it was a question connected with the well-being of a much larger population than the poor fishing population. The Irish Members quite agreed that they could manage these matters without the patronizing assistance of the hon. Gentleman. Indeed, he was of opinion that Irish Members were much more competent to deal with Scotch affairs than Scotch Members were to meddle with Irish affairs. In his opinion, the only way in which the fishery problem in Ireland could be solved was by a series of comprehensive measures, including the opening up of cheap railways and what were called measures for the direct encouragement of the fisheries.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £17,619, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales."

MR. BRYCE said, that although the subject he desired to call the attention of the Committee to was one of very great importance, involving nothing less than the middle class education of the country, he hoped, considering the lateness of the hour and the necessity of making progress in Supply, to dispose of it very shortly. He did not propose to move the reduction of the Vote, particularly as he expected to obtain a satisfactory answer from the Government to the questions which he proposed to put. Nor did he propose to enter into any general question with regard to the policy of uniting the Charity and the Endowed Schools Commissions. He was quite aware that that policy had been questioned in many quarters, and that the Government had incurred great responsibility in changing the organization of the Endowed Schools Commission. A Commission to inquire into the working of the Endowed Schools Commission sat for some years from the year 1865, and presented Reports in 1866 and 1868. He had had the honour of being one of the Commissioners, and he was, therefore, able to explain what the result of the inquiry was. It went a long way towards showing that the education of what might be called the middle classes of the country—namely, that which was above the elementary education, but below that given in the higher class schools and Colleges, was eminently unsatisfactory. In many cases the endowments for educational purposes had been entirely neglected, and the education given was most defective. The consequence of the disclosures made by the Commission was the appointment of the Endowed Schools Commission in 1869. That Commission worked on until the year 1874, when there was a change of Ministry, and it was superseded in that year by the Commission which, at the present moment, continued to carry on the work. The Act of 1874, although it continued the Commission which was specially charged with the work of re-organizing the Endowed Schools, united the Commission with the Charity Commission, and placed it under the control of the Chief Commissioner of that Commission. Since then the work had been carried on under the auspices of the Charity Commission. Nearly 11 years had now elapsed since the Endowed Schools Act of 1869 began to take effect, and during that time the progress of the re-organization had been very much slower than was anticipated by those who framed the Act of 1869, or by those who made the alteration in the Act of 1874, under which the work was now carried on. It was expected in 1869 that the whole work of preparing new schemes would be completed in five or six years; but since 1869 the schemes which had been framed for the Endowed Schools of the country dealt with less than one-half of the total number of Endowed Schools. It was true that the value of the endowments was slightly in excess of one-half of the total amount; but the number of schools remaining to be dealt with was greater than the number which had been dealt with in the 11 years which had elapsed since 1869. Therefore, at the same rate of progress it was clear that 11 years more must elapse before the work of re-organizing the Endowed Schools could be completed, and before that time some of the schools which had already been dealt with by schemes would require to be dealt with afresh, so as to amend and remove defects that were not foreseen when the schemes were originally framed. It had become quite obvious that something more must be done to improve the secondary education of the country; and he thought he was entitled to ask the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) the causes which had made the progress in the work of re-organizing the Endowed Schools so exceedingly slow.

Mr. Villiers Stuart

The matter was one of the highest importance, because it could not be forgotten that the education of the country, as far as it did not depend on the small number of public schools which existed, mainly depended upon these Endowed Schools. It was they which should set the standard of education for the middle class schools of the country, which should give a better tone to the people, and in all respects act as models for the schools at which the children of the middle classes received their education. But that could not be done without introducing change into the generally obsolete regulations under which these schools were managed, or without the framing of such schemes as the Endowed Schools Commissioners has been directed to frame. He did not propose to enter into details upon the question as one of the educational policy of the country, or to inquire to what extent it was that the Endowed Schools were defective. It was well known that there were great deficiencies in the present working of the system; and he asked from his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council an explanation of the cause to which he attributed this slow progress and the measures he proposed to take in order to remedy this great evil. The Act under which the Endowed Schools Commission was now working would expire next year; and it would consequently be necessary, during next Session of Parliament, to bring in a measure which should renew the Commission, and endeavour, if possible, to set it going anew with greater locomotive power. The present time was, therefore, opportune for calling attention to the defects of the system which now existed, and for endeavouring to obtain some pledge from the Education Office that something would be done to remedy those defects, and bringing the whole matter before the country with the view of passing a satisfactory measure of reform during the ensuing Session. He would not anticipate what the Vice President of the Council would have to say to the position of the staff; but he would point out that one result of the policy adopted in 1874 had been to throw the Endowed Schools Commission into the hands, and place it under the control, of the Charity Commission. It was well known that the Endowed Schools Commission, between 1869 and 1874, went on faster than was conformable with the policy of the Party which came into power in 1874. It was the evident wish and desire of the Conservative Party to put a drag on the wheels of the Commission. The Commission at that time consisted of three able and eminently qualified men. At the head of it was the late Lord Lyttelton, of whom he spoke with the greatest respect as a Nobleman, thoroughly competent to deal with the work of educating the country, and who had greatly identified himself with it. The next Commissioner was Mr. Roby, who was also a man of great ability, and equally devoted to the cause of education; and the last was the Rev. Canon Robinson, who, fortunately, still continued on the Commission. In 1874 those three gentlemen were replaced by a new Commission, consisting of two only, one of whom was Canon Robinson, while the other had had no previous experience, who did the work as well as could be expected, but in whose hands the work of the Commission advanced much more slowly. This gentleman had since quitted office. He (Mr. Bryce) did not make any accusation against him; but he cited the substitution of this Commissioner for Lord Lyttelton and Mr. Roby as a reason why the work of the Commission must have gone on much less quickly and efficiently, and he cited it in the hope that some step would now be taken to remedy the mistake then made by adding to the number of Commissioners directly connected with the Endowed Schools. The amalgamation of the Endowed Schools Commission with the Charity Commission had the effect of making the question of the Endowed Schools one of secondary consideration. It was thought at the time that the Charity Commissioners would be able to devote some of the spare time and labour at their disposal to the work of the Endowed Schools Commission; but he believed he was right in saying that they had found it impossible to do so. The work of the Charity Commission itself was constantly accumulating. It was very important work, and it was becoming more important owing to the increase of the number of charitable foundations which were always growing; and, owing to that fact, the progress of the schemes under the Endowed Schools Act had been slower than might otherwise have been the case, because the schools, when re-organized, were constantly coming to the Charity Commission asking to have orders made, and the Charity Commission was occupied in meeting their needs. The consequence was that the three Charity Commissioners, who had done their work with a considerable amount of public spirit, found that they had no time to spare for the work of the Endowed Schools, and the Endowed Schools' work had been intrusted entirely to the two Endowed Schools Commissioners, who were far too few in number to grapple with the large mass of work they were required to perform. There was a further evil in the limited powers which the Endowed Schools Commission enjoyed. In place of inspecting the schools—he did not mean executing an individual inspection, because that could be properly done by Examiners—but he meant that where a scheme had been framed it might be found, after it had been at work for some years, that it was not working satisfactorily, either owing to some defect in the scheme itself, or some want of heartiness on the part of the trustees in carrying out the scheme—in place of exercising a supervising inspection over the schools, the Endowed Schools Commissioners found themselves unable to ascertain how the work was going on, and could make no provision for remedying the defects of any scheme unless they were prepared to go the length of drafting a new scheme. It was very desirable that powers should be given to them to send down the Assistant Commissioners, who were highly competent men, to examine into the working of the schools, for which schemes had already been framed, to report on that working, and that the Endowed Schools Commissioners should then be authorized to make such alterations in the existing schemes as they thought necessary without going through the long and complex process of framing an entirely new scheme. Further, there were many places which were entirely wanting in Endowed Schools. The most ancient towns in the country generally had endowed grammar school foundations; but there were a number of towns of enormous growth, and some of them even old towns, which were destitute of these schools, and very much wanted them, because it was found that private enterprise did not come forward with sufficient promptitude to supply the wants which these endowments covered. They were, consequently, left to the mercy of private adventure schools; and he believed that every hon. Member who was acquainted with such schools would say that there were very few of them indeed which were fit to give a proper education to the children of the middle classes. The masters, as a rule, had neither the experience nor the skill which enabled them to do the work which might fairly be required from them. The remedy would seem to be to employ the Endowed Schools Commission to apply other charitable funds not heretofore devoted to education to educational purposes. An attempt was made to do that under the 30th section of the Endowed Schools Act of 1869. Under that section, the Endowed Schools Commission, in the case of various specified charitable foundations, were to apply the money which was being spent to charitable purposes in connection with education, provided they received an application for that purpose from the Governing Body of the charitable foundation. He need hardly say that it was only in comparatively few cases that the power was acted upon, because, as a rule, the trustees of these charitable foundations were very far from being enlightened men, and were not aware that, to a great extent, the purposes to which these charities were applied were really pernicious. Take the most obvious case of all—the case of dole gifts. An enormous sum of money was distributed annually all over the country in the shape of doles—tens of thousands a-year. Indeed, he should not be surprised to find that a sum amounting to £100,000 or £120,000 a-year was spent in doles—small gifts of bread, coals, clothes, blankets given away, often to people standing at the church door, and, generally speaking, given away by the trustees on their own unaided responsibility. No one who had studied the subject, and paid any attention to the condition of his fellow-townsmen, would fail to know that gifts of this kind were an unmixed evil. Personally, he did not know of one case out of 10 in which they did any good; and, in the great majority of cases, they did serious harm. But, unfortunately, the trustees of these funds were so much under the belief that they had no right to devote them to purposes other than those originally prescribed by the founder, that even in cases where they confessed that the charitable funds as now applied were doing harm, they could not be induced, in their corporate capacity, to make an application to the Endowed Schools Commission to devote the fund to educational purposes. The consequence was that the money, worse than if it remained absolutely idle, was positively doing harm. Many years, however, must elapse before public opinion would be sufficiently enlightened to induce the trustees to make an application to the Endowed Schools Commission, on their own motion. In that state of things, it would appear to be necessary to enlarge the powers of the Endowed Schools Commission, under Section 30 of the Act of 1869, and give them the initiative in the matter. Power should be given to them, where they were satisfied, on competent evidence, that a charitable foundation of this kind was doing mischief, to apply it to educational purposes. He was far from saying that this power should be given without control. He was fully aware that a good deal of jealousy was felt in the country as to the action of the Charity Commissioners. He had heard it constantly said that this was a proposal to hand over the charities of the country to two or three gentlemen sitting in Whitehall; but he believed that two or three gentlemen sitting in Whitehall were much more likely to do good with them than the large number of irresponsible trustees who existed throughout the country, and who had never considered the matter from the large point of view of those who had gained their experience through the working of the Charity Commission. The state of feeling was undoubtedly such that it would become necessary, in the event of handing over extended powers to a Board in London, to surround their action with numerous safeguards. Nobody would contend that the power given to the Charity Commission or the Endowed Schools Commission should be an absolute power, and it must be accompanied with a power of reference or appeal in the event of discontent being excited. Moreover, it might be generally felt that it would not be proper to take funds which were originally given to the poor and apply them entirely for the benefit of the middle class. In a case where an endowment originally given to the poor was applied to the purposes of secondary education, it would be proper to require that a number of free places—places accessible to the poor—equivalent to the advantages taken, should be reserved. The ultimate advantage would be that while they gave benefit to the poor they would also give benefit to the town generally, by establishing a higher class education than private adventure schools were now able to give. The last point he wished to mention had reference to the education of girls. The Endowed Schools Act of 1869 directed the Endowed Schools Commission to make provision for extending the education of girls. The Commissioners in their Reports stated that they had been able to do much less than they expected, and much less than the House expected, when this power was originally given. The cases in which they had been able to establish girls' schools had been comparatively few; and of the total amount of money applied to educational purposes that applied to the education of girls as compared with boys had been a lamentably small percentage. It was hardly necessary to point out to the Committee that the education of girls was rendering, in reality, quite as great a service to the community as the education of boys. When they taught those who were to become their next generation of mothers, they were doing the best thing they could for the education of the coming generation itself. It was, he thought, very much to be regretted that a far more adequate provision had not been made for the education of girls. He believed that the Commission had been met in some cases by a little opposition in the efforts they had been desirous of using in this direction; and, therefore, he thought there should be a stronger direction from Parliament than any that had hitherto been given for making proper and adequate provision for the education of girls. Those were the evils of which he complained, and which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would, next Session, see occasion to remedy. He had already pointed out what appeared to be the chief remedies required—namely, the strengthening of the staff of the Commission, the enlargement of their powers, the propriety of giving them the initiative in cases where it was desirable to apply charitable endowments to educational purposes, and a more specific direction on the subject of the education of girls. Before sitting down he wished to ask the Committee to consider seriously the great importance of the question, and to express in some way their feeling that next year it ought to be dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council in a bold and sweeping measure. Instead of keeping on the Commission for a few years longer, dealing with the Endowed Schools in a manner which could only be temporary, it was desirable that it should be rendered permanent and strength given to it. It must not be forgotten that great educational institutions like Dulwich College and Christ's Hospital were still asking for new schemes, although many years had not elapsed since the schemes upon which they were at present worked were framed. They were two magnificent institutions, with ample revenues, and yet they could not be properly worked, because the Commissioners had not had time to deal with them. In that state of facts, considering the great importance of the Educational Question, and how dependent it was upon the action of the Endowed Schools, considering that England was far behind every other civilized nation in Europe in regard to intermediate and secondary education, considering that some reform, although far from adequate, had been introduced into our system of University education, it was not right that the Endowed Schools should be left longer untouched; and it was not too much to say that the question was one of the most important that could engage the attention of Parliament and of the Government.

Mr. Bryce

Mr. Bryce

MR. MUNDELLA: At this late hour of the night, and considering also the late period of the Session and the necessity of making progress with Supply, I will not detain the Committee long in answer to the able and interesting speech of my hon. Friend. I have no fault to find with the statement he has made. I am sorry to say that I agree with its general accuracy. There is, no doubt, a general feeling of anxiety and dissatisfaction at the slow progress made with regard to Endowed Schools in England. But I do not think it is necessary to lay any blame at the door of the Commissioners for this. The real fault rests with the Act of 1874. I think that the passing of that Act was a great misfortune for the education of this country. It had the effect of reducing the number of Commissioners devoted to the work of the Endowed Schools from three to two; it merged the two Commissions—the Charity Commission and the Endowed Schools Commission, into one; and it made it necessary that every scheme should be considered at a meeting of the Board when the Chief Commissioner was present. The result was, that you increased the difficulty of dealing with the question, and you practically brought down the work to the narrowest possible limits. Now, the work of the Charity Commission itself is a very largely increasing work. For the last 20 years it has been going on augmenting at a rate that makes it quite sufficient for the Commission to deal with without undertaking the work of the Endowed Schools in addition. The two previous Chief Charity Commissioners—Mr. Peter Erle and Sir James Hill—found the work more than they could well get through; and I understand that it was the anxiety displayed by Sir James Hill to accomplish, with one Commissioner, the work of two, that aided very materially in bringing about his death. He found the labour was far more than he ought to undertake. To show the increased nature of the work of the Charity Commission, perhaps the Committee will allow me to point out that in 1861, 207 orders were made by the Commissioners. In 1862 the number had increased to 280, and it has been going on augmenting ever since until last year, 1880, it reached 444 schemes. That represents the charitable work alone; but let me point out what the amount of stock transferred has been. It began with £6,360 in 1854, and it now amounts to £11,443,000, of which £1,500,000 has been invested, so that, in round numbers, a sum of £10,000,000 has been transferred. Every transfer has to be brought before the Board, and, of course, a large amount of additional work is necessarily devolved upon them. The Commissioners themselves, in their last Report, speak of the increase of the work. My hon. Friend has urged the importance of strengthening the staff of the Commission; and we have pointed out in our 24th Report the amount of labour which the effective regulation of the public interest in the Parochial Charities of the City of London would require. My hon. Friend himself brought in a Bill this Session which most Members will regret he was unable to pass dealing with the Parochial Charities of London. If it had passed, it would have done much to increase the work of the Charity Commission. The result of placing on the Commission the double work of the Charity Commission and the Endowed Schools Commission has really been to block the progress of the two Commissions, and to hinder effective dealing both with the Charity Commission work and the work of the Endowed Schools Commission. I will point out to the Committee how the Endowed Schools Commission stands now. Since the year 1869, the amount regulated by new schemes in a period of now nearly 12 years has been £294,000 per annum, and there remains still to be dealt with of educational schemes more than £340,000 per annum, in addition to a number of other endowments which are only partly educational. It is, therefore, not unreasonable to say that it will take a quarter of a century, at the present rate of progress, to deal with the educational endowments of England alone. In the present state of middle class education, I would ask the Committee if that is at all a satisfactory state of things? As my hon. Friend has stated, we were told in 1869 that in the course of six or seven years we should have dealt with the whole of the educational endowments of the country. We have now reached the year 1881; and at the rate of progress we are now making it is still contemplated that it will take a quarter of a century before the work is completed. The matter is too serious to be passed over lightly, and some effectual means must be devised for dealing with it. I believe it is the fact that many of the schemes already passed now urgently stand in need of revision; and, owing to the want of inspection and examination, many have not been put in operation. Indeed, there seems to be no sort of control over those which the Commission have passed. The Commissioners ask, in their last Report, that there should be examination and inspection; and I must say that the way in which that Report was denounced in "another place" was most extraordinary. It was one of the most astonishing things I ever heard of in the course of my life. All that was asked for was what was reasonable to carry into full effect the schemes framed by the Commission; and it was one of the most extraordinary statements ever made that the Commissioners desired to constitute themselves into a roving Commission, in order to deal with all the charities all over the country. All the Commissioners asked in their Report was that they should have the means of examining the working of the schemes after they have framed them, in order to see whether they are put fairly into operation. They further proposed that they should have power to inspect the schools once in three years, in order to see that they were doing their work satisfactorily. Every hon. Member will recognize how important the inspection of the schools is as an educational matter. I think that there should be a periodical Report as to the working of the schools, showing what their condition is, and how they compare with one another. I know myself of various schools in regard to which schemes have been framed by the Commission; but, because there has been no inspection and no examination within the last 10 or 11 years, some of these schemes, which started very well, and began to do noble work, are now falling into disuse and decay. All I can say now is that the whole question must be dealt with in the coming year. The only desire of Her Majesty's Government is to promote the true interests of the education of the country. We only desire that what is given through the means of these charitable endowments shall be useful to the poor as well as advantageous to the children of the middle classes. I trust that during the Recess, seeing that we are bound to consider the subject, and that the Commission must be renewed, or a new Commission appointed in the coming year—I trust that we shall be able to devise some measure that will, while consulting the interests of the schools themselves, afford adequate means for their examination, and utilize the vast endowments of the country in the promotion of the higher education of the people, and in opening up the means of education to poor and clever children.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, he heartily and cordially agreed in much that had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce); but, at the same time, he regarded with some reluctance the proposal to give larger powers to the present Charity Commission. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council as to the intention of the Government to deal with the question next Session was entirely satisfactory; but he was anxious to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the desirability, when the subject was taken up by the Government next year, of not going too far in the direction of centralization. They must all remember the vigilance of the opposition that was brought to bear on the Endowed Schools Commission which was dispossessed in 1874; and, at the same time, it must be borne in mind that in a great number of these local questions there were a great many local prejudices to consult which required a certain amount of local knowledge, and with respect to which a board in London would find itself incompetent to deal. He wished to point out to his right hon. Friend that when the Government took up the question, they ought, as far as possible, to give to the local authorities in various parts of the country powers analogous, or to some extent analogous, in dealing with Charities and Endowed Schools, to those possessed at the present time by the Charity Commission. By that means, he thought they would be able to get rid of a great deal of the local prejudice and intense local irritation which reduced to a wreck the great measure passed in 1869. If the hour of the night had not been so advanced he would have wished to say a few words from his own personal knowledge in regard to the great Endowed Institution in London, in respect of which he was a Governor—Christ's Hospital. But at that late hour he would not interfere with the course of Public Business further than to say, without desiring in the least to impute motives to the Governors of Christ's Hospital, that nothing could be more unsatisfactory than its present condition in regard to the relations between the Governing Body and the Charity Commission. He hoped his right hon. Friend would bear these remarks in mind when he came to deal with the question next year.

Mr. Mundella

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON said, he rose for the purpose of thanking the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council for the promise he had held out to the House and the country that some system of inspection would be carried out in future in regard to the middle class schools. Having been Chairman of the Governing Body of a small Endowed School in the country, he could bear his testimony to the fact that one of the greatest difficulties the Governors had to contend with was the difficulty of getting their schools properly examined and inspected from time to time. One of the schools with which he was connected, although it had only a small income, educated 100 children. There was another point that was also of importance, and that was the selection of teachers. He and his colleagues, as Governors of an Endowed School, had not had the assistance of the Education Department in the training, selection, and nomination of teachers. They were very much at the mercy of any persons who proposed to go to them for the somewhat low fees they were able to pay. He therefore hoped, through the operation of some measure for the registration of teachers, or in some other way, it might be practicable to provide means for affording the Governors who had the management of these schools an opportunity of knowing where to apply to for thoroughly competent teachers. As far as his own experience went, these were the two great difficulties in the management of Endowed Schools—namely, the selection of teachers and the securing of an efficient inspection.

MR. BRYCE said, that after the satisfactory statement of his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, he would only venture to express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would not only bring in a satisfactory measure next year for dealing with the Endowed Schools Commission, but that he would also be able to deal with the Charitable Trusts Bill.

MR. J. G. TALBOT thought that one or two inaccurate statements had been made on the other side of the House. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject (Mr. Bryce) made a very able speech, to which he had listened with great interest; but the hon. Member did not seem to recollect the whole history of this important transaction. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the slow progress which had undoubtedly been made, and which he (Mr. Talbot) would be one of the last to deny. He was very sorry that the progress had not been greater; but he thought it ought not to be forgotten that the slow progress did not entirely date from the year 1874. The first legislation upon the subject took place in 1869, and it was then expected that the work would be completed in four or five years. But, notwithstanding all the energy of the gentlemen who constituted the Endowed Schools Commission—of whose energy, ability, and integrity there could be no doubt—when the year 1874 arrived the work had not been half done. Indeed, it was not much more than one-quarter done. Therefore, while not wishing to extenuate the slow progress which had been made altogether, he did not think it was fair to put the whole of the blame upon the progress which had been made since 1874.

MR. BRYCE said, he had no intention of imputing blame to the present Board for their action in the matter. All he wished to say was, that the progress had been even slower since 1874 than it had been before.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the explanation of the hon. Member set the matter right; but without such explanation anyone hearing his speech, or the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, would have fallen into the error of supposing that the Commission, which had been in charge of the Endowed Schools since 1874, were solely to blame for the slow progress which had been made. He now wished to ask the attention of the Committee to a point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that when the Conservative Government came into Office in 1874 they had a desire to retard the work of the Commission. Now, he did not know what the motives of the Conservative Government might have been when they entered upon Office; but he did not believe that anybody wished to retard the progress of the work of the Commission. All he knew was, that some Members of the House wished to put that progress on a slightly different basis in regard to control. That might have been wise or it might not; but the desire was not alone confined to the Conservative side of the House. It was a point that gave rise to serious deliberation. The late Government wished that the progress of the Commission should be greater, but without undue friction with the prejudices—or call them what they liked—of the persons who had charge of institutions. He did not see the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in his place; but he was Chairman of the Committee which sat in 1869 upon the subject, and he would agree that this was one of the points the Committee were most anxious to consider. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) did not think it would have a brightening effect upon the country generally if it was now to be understood that on reconsidering the question of the Endowed Schools Commission they were going to re-open the difficult question of non-educational endowments. It was, no doubt, true, as the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council said, that many of these charities had been greatly abused, and that the system of doles had been, on the whole, unwisely administered. But, on the other hand, he thought it would be a very startling thing if it were to go forth from that Committee—and he had risen to enter his humble protest against the acceptance of the suggestion—that there was any intention of diverting the funds which had been designedly left for the benefit of the poorest classes of the community to objects that were, after all, for the education of the middle classes only. It might be wise to do something in that direction; but the proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was simply this—that the Charity Commission, or the Endowed Schools Commission, whichever body was to act in future, should have the power of initiating, in regard to these doles, whether the managers of them wished to deprive them of their present character or not, a scheme which should have the effect of making them educational endowments. By that means, funds which had been left for the benefit of the very humblest portion of the community, although it might be in a mistaken and misguided manner, would be taken away from those it was intended to benefit, and applied to the education of the middle classes. That, he thought, would be a very dangerous course to take, to say the least of it. There was only one more remark he would venture to make on the matter, and it was this—the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council spoke of the question as one which must engage the attention of Parliament next Session. It was obvious that as the Act must expire next year something must be done in that direction; and, that being so, he would earnestly press on the Government that it would be unwise to make an alteration in this important question, either by constituting a new Commission, or arming the existing Commission with increased powers, without full and deliberate consideration. The constitution of the original Commission was made the subject of a careful inquiry by a Committee of that House; and it would be wise, if it was intended materially to alter the conditions under which the Commission was to work, to institute a fresh inquiry next year, either by means of a Royal Commission or of a Committee of that House. With regard to the question of amalgamation, it was said that harm had been done by uniting the Endowed Schools Commission with the Charity Commission. It might have been so; and the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had given them some important statistics as to the increased work which had fallen upon the Commission. That was a matter which probably ought to be determined before they renewed the connection between the charitable work and the educational work; but it was only fair to the late Conservative Government to say that, although they were often charged with extravagance and lavish expenditure, this was an attempt to amalgamate two Commissions, and if it had not proved successful, at any rate it was an attempt in the direction of economy. Personally, he should certainly not stand there as an obstructive of any well-considered change; but he hoped it would not go forth to the country without challenge that any fundamental alteration should be made without due and careful consideration.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

MR. THOROLD ROGERS wished to say a word in answer to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot). As far as he knew, there had never been a case in which any charitable endowment had been deviated in the direction of education without coupling the educational scheme with machinery which enabled boys to rise from the national schools to the grammar schools. He knew of one case, in Bristol, in which the change took precisely that form, and the endowment was made the means of promoting boys from the national schools into the Bristol Grammar School. The same sort of thing had happened in the City of Oxford. Some doles had been left for purposes that were entirely obsolete, and they were taken away and given to the grammar school; but provision was made by means of which boys from the lowest stratum of society in Oxford were enabled to enter the grammar school. As a matter of fact, every hon. Member knew that all the Endowed Schools of the country had been originally intended for the poor.

MR. BRYCE said, the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had fallen into an error. He (Mr. Bryce) had not intended to imply that any of the funds now given to the poor should be taken away from them and given to the middle class. To the best of his belief he had stated distinctly that, in taking the initiative, the Commission should be restricted by ample safeguards, and that equivalent advantages should be secured to the poor.

MR. FINIGAN asked whether anything had been done since last year with regard to Jackson's Trust Fund?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was unable to answer the question of the hon. Member at the moment; but if he would make an application inquiries should be made.

Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £13,798, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR inquired as to the amount of fees paid by candidates at the Army examinations?

MR. W. H. JAMES said, that nothing could be more unsatisfactory, or even scandalous, than the present system of conducting military examinations. He believed that on the last occasion of the examination in connection with the Woolwich Military Academy there was in the morning a concert and in the evening a recital in the Hall where the examinations were conducted, which could not but interfere very much with the proceedings. He had always been in favour of the system of competitive examination; but it seemed to him very difficult to attain to a proper standard in the examinations if such a state of things were allowed to continue.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had strongly pressed upon the authorities that they should take steps for obtaining better accommodation for the purpose of these examinations; and he trusted that his representations would this year lead to a more satisfactory arrangement. The Commissioners of Works had sought for a room more adapted for the examinations; but, up to the present, unfortunately, they had not been able to meet with one in which a sufficiently large number of persons could be provided for. The Government were, however, fully alive to the position of affairs.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked why the fees for the Civil Service of India examinations were paid into the India Exchequer?

MR. CHILDERS said, that the question was about to be taken up by the Government.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would make inquiries, before the Vote was reported, on the question of the amount of fees payable by candidates at the Army examinations.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £9,466, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

(4.) £4,425, to complete the sum for the Inclosure and Drainage Acts, Imprest Expenses.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that this Vote was one of several instances of the public money being advanced and not repaid. There was a note relating to this charge which said that the whole of this Vote was a temporary advance, which was to be repaid to the Exchequer when the works of inclosure and drainage were completed. But the fact with regard to this Vote was that, although a considerable sum was annually repaid, it did not amount to the whole sum advanced; and, therefore, the amount of the arrears increased rapidly. The matter had already been before the Public Accounts Committee, who had urged a reduction of the arrears, but, up to the present time, without success. In the year 1878 the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), and in 1880 the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), as Chairmen of the Public Accounts Committee, had both inquired into the subject; and in reply to the inquiry as to whether any arrangement had been made for providing the Comptroller and Auditor General with particulars to enable him to report to Parliament the progress made with regard to these loans, an answer was sent by an official to the effect that he regretted to say that he could not report that any arrangement had been made. The Committee would be aware that the Comptroller and Auditor General was an officer specially appointed by the House to investigate questions of this nature; and yet it was found that the very materials necessary for his investigations were withheld from him. As he had pointed out, the Public Accounts Committee had expressed regret at the delay that had taken place, and pointed out that the question was one which ought to be settled as soon as possible. The subject had been before the Committee again in the present year, and it was stated at last that the Commissioners had furnished some accounts of a fragmentary character, and that a satisfactory examination of accounts was hoped for in the future. He regarded this as scarcely a satisfactory state of affairs. As a matter of fact, this Vote was not merely a temporary advance, because it was perfectly certain that a great deal of the money could not and would not be recovered. Although it was certain that there would be a loss, it was uncertain what the amount of loss would be; and he questioned whether the noble Lord, on the part of the Government, could tell the Committee the amount of money which had been advanced, the amount which had been repaid, the amount which was still outstanding, or the amount which would have to be wiped off as an irrecoverable arrear, and charged against the country. He regarded this case as a fair illustration of the statement that the system of advancing money to be recovered, if possible, from parties who were not in a position to repay it was an unsound one.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH pointed out that more than £8,000 had been repaid last year, and that the net loss was about £800.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

(5.) £27,233, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and Audit Department.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that, notwithstanding the importance of the duties of the Comptroller and Auditor General, that officer, unfortunately, did not receive from the Public Departments, whose Accounts he had to examine, that assistance which it was desirable he should have. There was probably no Department of the Public Service whose Accounts would be more improved by a careful overhauling than the War Office; and yet the audit which the Comptroller and Auditor General was able to give of the Accounts of that Department was little more than an appropriation audit. Even the first Army Vote had never yet been examined in detail, but only partially, by the Comptroller and Auditor General; but the Committee would see the immense advantage of having a careful and detailed examination of that expenditure by an independent body. He would merely point to one item, the Stock Purse Fund of the Guards. For 25 years that House had voted something like £6,000 annually for the Hospital and Recruiting Service of the Brigade of Guards in perfect ignorance that the money was not used for the purposes for which it was intended, but that it found its way into the pockets of the officers of the Brigade, and that the hospital and recruiting expenses were paid for out of other moneys. Under that system the officers of the Guards had divided amongst themselves since the Crimean War a sum of money which, in the aggregate, amounted to £150,000. But directly the Comptroller and Auditor General got a hold upon the Army Votes, that system had entirely disappeared, the War Office authorities having found it necessary to admit that the money had not altogether been applied to the purposes for which it was voted. There were, it appeared, certain allowances to the officers carefully veiled in the Returns furnished, and which were for a long time kept from the knowledge of the public, but which appeared in the Army Estimates as now drawn up. He mentioned this case as an illustration of the immense advantage in the way of preventing jobbery which resulted from an independent investigation by such an officer as the Comptroller and Auditor General. But, apart from that, there was a system of audit in the War Office which had this great weakness about it, that every Departmental Auditor was obliged to pass charges which he himself might know to be wrong—that was to say, where the money, as in the case he had referred to, did not go for the purpose intended. The charge was covered by the authority of the Secretary of State, and he was a subordinate of the Secretary of State. The audit of the War Office was a perfect farce, there being no independent audit at all; and those who knew the details of the Service knew that the Audit Department should be handed over in its entirety to the Comptroller and Auditor General, and placed in a position of independence so far as the War Office was concerned. He would not go into other matters in regard to the work of the Comptroller and Auditor General; but it struck him (Mr. A. O'Connor) that there were a great many accounts which it would be well to have audited by the Comptroller and Auditor General. He did not know whether the Metropolitan Police Accounts could properly be submitted to him for the purpose. He did not think they were audited by that official; but, at any rate, there were a good many accounts that escaped him which ought not to do so. There was an item on the Paper which struck him as being very singular—namely, £25 for the purveyor of luncheons. He could not, for the life of him, imagine why a man who entered into a contract to supply refreshments should be allowed a money grant, seeing that he made fair charges, had gas and coals for nothing, and lived rent free. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) thought it would be a very reasonable thing to reduce the Vote by £25.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would not follow the hon. Member into many of his statements concerning the audits, as this was not a favourable opportunity for the discussion. He was glad to be able to say that the best audit was now being applied to the Department mentioned. As to the sum of £25, an injustice would be done if it were not granted.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £3,086, to complete the sum for Friendly Societies Registry.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £330,178, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation."

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, this was a grant in aid of local taxation; and as there were several Amendments and a great deal of discussion would take place, and as it was already a quarter to 1, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that, under ordinary circumstances, it would be advisable to report Progress at that time of the night; but they had now arrived at the end of July and the beginning of August, and had only passed a few Votes in Supply. He thought, therefore, they should go on a little longer.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, an hon. Member opposite had an important Scotch question to raise on that Vote—a question in which the people of Scotland took great interest. It was undesirable that it should be debated at that time of night; therefore, he trusted the Government would agree to the Motion.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he presumed they would have all Monday night for the Estimates, and the noble Lord would then be able to get a good deal of money. Under those circumstances, and seeing, as had just been stated, that an important question was to be raised on the Vote, it was not unreasonable to ask that Progress should be reported. There were 17 Orders of the Day; and, as one or two of them involved important questions, the House should be allowed some little time to go through them.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that nearly all the Orders of the Day were blocked. He would not propose to take the Vote upon which, as it was said, an important question was to be raised; but he would appeal to his hon. Friend to allow them to take what Votes were not opposed.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that, looking at the period of the Session, it was not unreasonable on the part of the Government to ask the Committee to go on a little later.

MR. RYLANDS said, that, having regard to the fact that they had now nearly reached the period at which it was usual to end the Session, and at which shooting commenced, hon. Members ought to assist the Government to make progress with Supply, even at some personal sacrifice. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) to withdraw his Motion. It would be possible to dispose, at any rate, of a few Votes to-night.

MR. O'DONNELL would undertake to say that that was the first time in his Parliamentary career that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had suggested that they should hurry over their Business in order that they might go to shoot. He (Mr. O'Donnell) was at a loss to suppose what had produced so marked a change in the hon. Member. There had been references made to the lateness of the hour at which the important question with which that discussion commenced—namely, that on the Endowed Schools system—was taken, and on that point he could say that a great many Members who had observations to make had refrained from making them because it was too late. They were now asked, at a still later hour, to go on with the discussion of the Estimates and vote public money. He did not think, from the hour and the time they had been sitting, that the Committee were in a position to discriminate between the Business which was so unimportant that it might be safely hurried over and the Business that was so important to deserve attention and full discussion. The real Business was the voting of Supply; and unless hon. Members had a fair opportunity of scrutinizing the channels into which the money was to go, even by the present most virtuous of Ministries there might be reckless and ill-considered expenditure.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: You, Mr. Playfair, have put this Vote from the Chair, and I wish to ask you whether it is possible to withdraw it in order to take unopposed Votes? I would remind you, Sir, that on a previous occasion you ruled that a Vote, having been put, could not be withdrawn.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

THE CHAIRMAN: A Vote cannot be postponed by a Motion; but if the Government desire to withdraw a Vote they can do so.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that some hon. Members seemed to think that there were only two things to be done at this period of the year—either to sit here, or shoot partridges. So far as he was concerned, he should shoot nothing; but he did not want to sit in the House of Commons beyond the month of August. If they did not take Supply up to a later hour than this they would assuredly have to sit into September. The next Vote was for the Lunacy Commission of England, and he did not suppose that any hon. Member from Ireland or anywhere else intended seriously to oppose that Vote being granted; therefore, he would ask the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, and allow the Business to be proceeded with.

MR. O'DONNELL: Does the hon. Member for Northampton suggest a certain connection between the Vote he speaks of and the hon. Members who desire to carry on Business beyond a certain hour?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes.

MR. A. MOORE said, that if Progress were now reported they would get through a large number of Votes on Monday, as there would be no delay, such as there was now, over the unopposed Votes.

MR. RAMSAY appealed to the Committee to allow unopposed Business to be taken for a short time.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it appeared to him that hon. Members opposite who were interested in Votes not yet reached were exceedingly anxious that they should get over these intermediate Votes as soon as possible, and then report Progress, so that, at the next Sitting, the proposals they wished to discuss should come on without delay, and they should have an opportunity of making their elaborately prepared speeches at a time at which they would be reported. These hon. Members had regard only to their own personal convenience. The Committee, however, were concerned in the administration of the public funds. There was no Vote here that was not a contentious Vote. Hon. Members seemed to think that the English Lunacy Vote was not one in which Irish Members could take any interest; but to show them that this was not the fact, he had here four pages of notes from the Reports of the Lunacy Commissioners, and four columns of notes from various reports from the medical authorities concerning the treatment of lunatics in this country cut from The Lancet. He thought it was not at all difficult to show that, in many respects, the Lunacy Commissioners of England had not done all that they might have done in their office. He, therefore, objected entirely to the statement that the Lunacy Vote for England was a non-contentious Vote. He would defy any hon. Member to mention a single Vote in Class II. which was a non-contentious Vote.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had had considerable experience of similar wrangles as to reporting Progress, and he had noticed this—that the Government were always in the wrong, and only wasted a good deal of time and expended a good deal of heat unnecessarily, and without doing good to anyone. It was looked on as an established rule that no public money should be voted after half-past 12 o'clock at night, and he did not see why that rule should be set aside now. It would be a saving of time for the Government to give way, for the unopposed Votes would be got through as rapidly as possible on Monday, whereas now they would lead to continued wrangling. They had already wasted more time than it would take on Monday to go through them. The Government would have in the end to give way. They seemed to think that time was valuable at 1 o'clock in the morning; but they evidently did not attach much value to the early part of the day, otherwise they would not, at 4 o'clock, come down and read long speeches in reply to questions. He would not name any individual Minister; but they all knew that this sort of thing was done. And now, when hon. Members wanted to go to bed, the Government made a great point about getting rid of non-contentious Votes. Her Majesty's Ministers evidently wanted to get Business disposed of and Bills passed at an hour when they could not be carefully examined into or fully criticized, and when hon. Member's speeches could not be reported in the papers. This sort of thing might be very pleasantly carried on, no doubt, if there was no opposition in the House.

VOL. CCLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 73: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 344.)

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,196, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England."

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he and several other Members had been sitting on a Committee from 12 o'clock to 4, and almost incessantly since then they had been in the House. They wanted now to go to bed, and he thought it perfectly absurd that a Vote of public money should be taken at 1 o'clock in the morning. He should take every opportunity of protesting against the practice. The Government would have plenty of time for these Votes during the whole of next week. They had no Bills to pass, or if they had they ought not to have any; and not a single Bill ought to be read a second time after the 1st of August. He begged to move that the Chairman leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Colonel Alexander.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that as the minority of the Committee had not shown the feeling displayed by the majority he would not oppose the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PETROLEUM (HAWKING) BILL.—[Lords.]
(Mr. Courtney.)

[BILL 222.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Power to hawk petroleum) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Regulations for hawking petroleum).

MR. DILLWYN said, the words "proper care shall be taken to prevent any petroleum escaping," which he proposed to omit, were too vague, and he did not think any convictions would ever be effected under them. Where any person allowed petroleum to escape into a sewer, the fact itself was sufficient evidence of a want of care which ought to be subject to penalty, otherwise people would allow escapes, and then declare that they had taken all proper care, and the magistrate would have to decide the point. The escape ought to carry the penalty with it; and he urged that the clause ought to be made stringent, for the presence of explosive substances in sewers was a very serious thing, and they could not tell what mischief they might cause. He proposed, therefore, to get rid of the vagueness of the clause, and to make it definite by making the accident itself proof of carelessness.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 1, leave out "proper care shall be taken to prevent any petroleum escaping," and insert "in the case of any person having the care or charge of petroleum allowing it to escape."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. COURTNEY said, he could not assent to the Amendment, and observed that there was a much more serious objection to the Amendment than the vagueness to which the hon. Member objected. It was not safe, it was unreasonable, and it was not just. What the Bill proposed to strike at was the absence of proper care on the part of any person licensed to hawk petroleum. The hon. Member was not content with that provision, but wished to add actual escape as subject to penalty. It was not safe to make escape a subject of penalty before the act of carelessness was made penal; neither was it just, because, although the person might have taken the most absolute care possible, yet, through some defect which he could not have foreseen, there might be an escape. As to the clause being vague, it was simply a matter for the magistrates to decide upon the evidence adduced; and he thought the magistrates were perfectly competent to deal with the matter.

MR. HOPWOOD thought the clause vague as it stood; but he recognized the difficulty of inserting the Amendment in the clause, drawn, as the Bill was, in a peculiar form. He agreed that there should be something in the Bill to more carefully provide against carelessness; but he did not think the hon. Member had thoroughly solved that difficulty, and, therefore, he thought it would be better to abide by the language of the clause.

Mr. Dillwyn

MR. DILLWYN said, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had another Amendment, in line 3, after the word "sewer," to add "shall on conviction thereof be liable to the penalty hereinafter imposed;" but it amounted to very much the same thing as the Amendment just disposed of, and he would not, therefore, move it. It appeared to him, however, that the clause, as it stood, was very vague and indefinite, and that the third Amendment which appeared in his name upon the Paper would remove some of that indefiniteness. The words in the clause were "due precaution," and he certainly did not know what they meant; and he would propose the substitution of words that were much more definite. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 8, leave out from "all," to "hawking," inclusive, and insert "any person having the care or charge of petroleum, who shall do any act which may tend to cause any accident by fire or explosion, and which is not reasonably necessary for the purpose of such hawking, or who shall allow any unauthorized person to have access to the vessels containing the petroleum, shall on conviction thereof be liable to the penalty hereinafter imposed."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. COURTNEY said, he was afraid the same objection really applied to this Amendment as to the former one. In the first place, the proposal of his hon. Friend amounted to the transformation of a most important clause of the Bill. There were three things provided for by the clause, the third of which was that due precaution should be exercised; and, although it might be a somewhat vague expression, it appeared to him that the necessities of the case required that some latitude should be given to the magistrates in dealing with the cases likely to be brought before them. He could not see how there would be any miscarriage of justice under the clause; and, on the other hand, these words were wanted in order to cover cases where it was made clear to the magistrates that due precaution had not been taken. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would not press it if his hon. Friend declined to accept it; but he could not help feeling that the words, as they stood in the clause, were vague and indefinite.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. THOMASSON moved, in line 15, to leave out "no article or substance of an explosive or." He proposed afterwards to add the word "highly" before "inflammable," which would make the clause more stringent.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 15, leave out "no article or substance of an explosive or."—(Mr. Thomasson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. COURTNEY said, he objected to the Amendment, because its adoption would make the clause absolutely unreadable. It would not run together at all, nor would it be possible to make sense of it. It would read in this fashion—"inflammable character other than petroleum nor any of them."

MR. THOMASSON said, he intended, if the Amendment were adopted, to put in the word "highly" before "inflammable."

MR. COURTNEY said, that on comparing the clause and the proposal as it stood on the Paper, he was utterly at a loss to comprehend what it was his hon. Friend desired to do.

THE CHAIRMAN: Of course, the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Thomasson) does not propose to insert words in the clause that are incapable of being considered with it. The Amendment, as it at present stands on the Paper, will render the clause unreadable, and, therefore, cannot be put.

MR. THOMASSON remarked, that if the words proposed to be struck out were omitted, he should then propose to insert the word "highly," which would make the clause correspond with Section 4.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. THOMASSON moved, in line 15, after "or," to insert "highly." He explained that his reason for proposing the Amendment was that the word "highly" appeared in the other sections of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 15, after "or," insert "highly."—(Mr. Thomasson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'highly' be there inserted."

MR. COURTNEY said, his hon. Friend was probably not aware that the word "highly" had a technical meaning in connection with petroleum. Petroleum was variously described as "petroleum" and as "highly inflammable petroleum;" and it was proposed in the clause that neither the high nor the low test should be taken.

MR. THOMASSON said, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. THOMASSON moved, in line 22, to leave out the words "and the carriage conveying the same." He thought it was an exceedingly harsh provision that the hawker, on conviction, should forfeit the carriage conveying the petroleum, because without retaining the carriage the man might have no means of earning an honest livelihood. He looked upon the provision as far too stringent; and he would, therefore, move the omission of the words.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 22, leave out "and the carriage conveying the same."—(Mr. Thomasson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. COURTNEY said, it was necessary that the words "and the carriage conveying the same" should be retained; and he thought the hon. Member and the Committee would see the force of retaining them. It was only liable to be forfeited, and the question whether it should be forfeited or not was left to the discretion of the magistrate. He was afraid that with regard to some persons the only efficient way of making them observe the law was to enact that the carriage conveying the petroleum should be liable to be forfeited. It was, however, not compulsory, but only a liability to forfeiture.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HOPWOOD moved, in line 23, to insert the words "by order of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction" after the word "forfeited." He explained that his object was to show by what Court the forfeiture should be made. The words as they stood were, "shall be liable to be forfeited;" and, in addition, the licensee by whose servants the petroleum was hawked were liable on summary conviction to a penalty. Forfeiture did not necessarily follow on all cases of summary conviction, and it required an order on the part of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It was therefore necessary to insert these words. At present there was nothing to say who was the authority to direct the forfeiture. It might be forfeited in the sense of being recovered in a Civil Court; but he apprehended that that was not what the Government meant. He presumed they meant that the Court before whom the question was brought, and who would have the power of inflicting a penalty of fine or imprisonment, would also have the power of ordering forfeiture. It would, however, be necessary to say "by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 23, after the word "forfeited," insert "by order of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. COURTNEY wished to point out that the Bill was to be taken in connection with the Petroleum Hawkers Acts of 1871 and 1879; and the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) would find that the provision he proposed to insert now was fully provided for. The present measure was simply an amplification of those Acts and supplemental to them, and the same Court already provided would exercise the jurisdiction.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that if his hon. Friend who undertook the responsibility of the Bill was satisfied that was the case it would not be necessary to press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Courtney

MR. THOMASSON moved, in line 25, to leave out "twenty," and insert "five." The Act of 1871 applied to shopkeepers and storekeepers, many of whom would have wool on their backs, and could, upon conviction for an infringement of the law, afford to pay a heavy penalty; but the present Bill applied to small hawkers, to most of whom a penalty of £20 would be a crushing penalty. He therefore proposed to reduce it to £5.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, leave out "twenty," and insert "five."—(Mr. Thomasson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. COURTNEY said, that here again the penalty prescribed was the maximum penalty, and he did not think it would be likely to be inflicted except in cases where gross negligence was proved and it became absolutely necessary that a heavy penalty should be imposed. It must be borne in mind that the business they were about to license by an Act of the Legislature was of an extremely perilous character; and the highest penalty should be inflicted where it could be shown that there had been gross carelessness. The magistrates might, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, decline to impose any penalty at all and might dismiss the case.

Amendment negatived.

MR. THOMASSON said, he would not move the next Amendment which stood in his name, and which was to omit, in lines 27 and 28, the words "or other person."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. HOPWOOD wished to know how his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department read the clause—"Where such servant of the licensee or other person?" Did it mean some servant of the licensee, and then some servant of some other person?

MR. COURTNEY: No; certainly not.

MR. HOPWOOD asked why it should not be read in that way? It might certainly mean the servant of some other person.

MR. COURTNEY remarked, that if his hon. and learned Friend would read the next line, he would see why it would not be read in that way.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the words following were, "shall be liable to the same penalty as if he were the licensee." But the words "other person" might still be the antecedent. But if the Government were content with the clause as it stood he would not object.

MR. WARTON said, he did not think they ought to dispute the grammar of any Bill they were going on with at that hour of the night—half past 1. The phraseology of the clause was certainly most extraordinary. [Cries of "Question!"] If an hon. Member was not to be allowed to make a small observation of that kind, he really did not know what they might not be reduced to. He sincerely hoped the Committee would not consent to pass this 2nd clause. He looked upon the whole of the clause as highly dangerous, and he would tell the Committee why. The hon. Member in charge of the Bill told them the measure was brought in to supplement the Acts of 1871 and 1879. It was, therefore, desirable that he (Mr. Warton) should call attention to the very dangerous character of this clause in comparison with the Act of 1871. It would scarcely be believed that in the Act of 1871, by the 7th section, careful provision was made in regard to the nature and capacity of the vessels in which petroleum was to be kept. They were required to be glass, earthenware, or metal. There was no such provision in the present Bill; and the same section—namely, the 7th section of the Act of 1871—contained a provision which was altogether inconsistent with that which appeared in the present clause, and rendered it impossible to read the two measures together. Under the Act of 1871, no person was allowed to keep petroleum without a special licence in larger quantities than a pint in each vessel; and no person was allowed to keep more, in the whole, than three gallons. And yet it was proposed by the present Bill to send out these 5s. hawkers in the street with as much as 10 gallons. One Act required three gallons to be kept quietly under lock and key in a house properly guarded, and the other allowed 10 gallons to be hawked through the streets; and, by the 2nd sub-section of this clause, it was provided that the petroleum might be contained in an inclosed vessel, so that there was nothing to show that the whole 10 gallons might not be contained in one vessel. Thus, while by the Act of 1871 an aggregate amount of three gallons was to be kept in seven or eight different vessels containing not more than a pint each, by this Bill a hawker was to be allowed to keep as much as 10 gallons in a single vessel. Indeed, there was nothing in this ridiculous clause to prevent a man from sending out a servant into the streets with a 10-gallon vessel full of petroleum. Surely that was nice legislation—a 10-gallon vessel full of petroleum sent into the streets, liable to all the accidents that might arise from smoking and carelessness. He was anxious to hear what reason the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) could assign for the alteration in the provisions of the two measures. He thought the words "ten gallons," coupled with the fact that the entire quantity might be hawked about in one vessel, was quite enough to induce the Committee to reject the clause. The hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Thomasson) had displayed a great anxiety to mitigate the penalty from £20 to £5; but he could not have read the Act of 1871, which laid it down definitely that the penalty should be £20. Altogether, this clause, which was a very long one, was most carelessly drawn; and if it were passed there would be nothing to prevent a mere hawker of petroleum from going about the streets with a carriage having on the top of it a big vessel containing 10 gallons of this highly dangerous material.

MR. COURTNEY said, the reference made by the hon. and learned Member to the Act of 1871 surprised him very much; and he felt very much inclined to distrust the accuracy of the hon. and learned Member's information. The Act of 1871 dealt with the quantity of petroleum which a vendor was to keep; but did the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to persuade the Committee that the vendor was not allowed to have in his possession a greater quantity than three gallons?

MR. WARTON remarked, that if the hon. Member would refer to Section 7 of the Act of 1871, he would find that in order to exempt the vendor of petroleum from the penalties of the Act he must not keep a larger quantity than three gallons, and that it must be contained in vessels holding not more than a pint each.

MR. COURTNEY said, that, to his mind, the Act did not bear the reading placed upon it by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport. It was perfectly well known that vendors of petroleum could keep a larger quantity than the hon. and learned Member referred to; and although at the moment he was unable to explain the point raised, he was quite satisfied as to the state of the law. If the hon. and learned Member would allow the question to stand over, the matter should be inquired into. It was thought that if a less quantity than 10 gallons was prescribed in the Bill the occupation of hawkers would be unnecessarily interfered with. Since the commencement of his remarks his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had explained that the quantity named in the Act referred to by the hon. and learned Member represented the extent to which petroleum was permitted to be kept without a licence. Where a licence was granted no such restriction applied.

MR. WARTON said, that was not his point. He had contrasted the quantity allowed by the 7th section of the Act of 1871, in pint vessels, with the 10 gallons which, under the present Bill, might be kept in one vessel, for the purpose of showing that insufficient precautions with regard to safety were now taken as compared with those introduced into the Act of 1871, and which at the time were considered necessary with regard to petroleum for sale or private use.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 4: Majority 26. — (Div. List, No. 345.)

And it appearing in the Division that 40 Members were not present in the Committee,

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock till Monday next.

Mr. Warton

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 1st August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Fingall, after the death of his father.
PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Shop Hours Regulation * (191).
Second Reading — Land Law (Ireland) (187), debate adjourned.
Committee — Report — Public Loans (Ireland) Remission * (176).
Report—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act (1877) Amendment * (164).
Third Reading—Universities of Oxford and Cambridge (Statutes) * (178); Turnpike Acts Continuance * (170); Patriotic Fund * (183); Customs (Officers) * (168), and passed.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 187.)
(The Lord Privy Seal.)

SECOND READING. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, I think I may count on the indulgence and consideration of your Lordships, which I so greatly need, while I endeavour to state the principal provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill—a very great, a very difficult, and a very exceptional measure for the reform of the Irish Land Laws. I shall only say for myself that no man in this House can take a deeper interest in this measure than I do, both as a public man having formerly had much connection with this very question, and privately as one deeply interested in Irish land. And I may add, my Lords, that, having had no official connection with this Bill before it was introduced to Parliament—not having been one of those who assisted the Prime Minister in the great work of framing this measure—I found that it contained the kind of legislation which I had convinced myself was necessary for Ireland, and I have been able to accept it with full conviction and assent.

My Lords, if this measure were not an exceptional measure, it would be a worthless one, and that because the facts with which it deals are so completely exceptional, measured by the standard of the land systems of England and Scotland. The land systems of the two Islands are as different as they possibly can be—as different as if the Islands themselves were to one another distant and foreign regions. Those differences are deep-rooted and far-reaching. Who can doubt that who knows the familiar facts of the case? Who can doubt it who thinks of the multitude of peasant farmers all over Ireland, to whom the loss of the holding is a calamity compared to which almost anything is endurable, and which they would bear almost anything to avoid? Who can doubt it who remembers the broad general fact, which remains true after all possible deductions and exceptions, that the Irish tenant is generally expected to provide, and must in future provide, by far the greater part of that fixed and durable outlay upon fixed and durable improvements which, in this country, as a mere matter of course, is provided by the landlord? These things are familiar to us now, much more so than they were in 1870, and I am not going to dwell upon them. But although, my Lords, they are familiar to us, I think that up till now it has never been fully perceived or admitted, by those who were responsible for legislation, how far these facts lead us, and ought to lead us—how they point, as a matter of policy quite as much as of justice, to the granting of a kind of tenure, a security of tenure far beyond anything known or anything necessary in this country. Therefore, my Lords, the old Irish complaint is still unappeased—the common complaint of insecurity, of uncertainty of tenure, carrying with it, of course, the danger of an excessive, perhaps an oppressive, rent. That complaint has been heard from generation to generation in Ireland, though it has been seldom listened to. You may go as far back as Spencer; you may come down to Swift, to Arthur Young, and to Burke; you may come down to the Poor Law Commission, the Devon Commission, and to Committees of both Houses of Parliament; you may take the reports of of private observers—Wakefield, Senior, The Times Commissioners, three times sent over; you may take economists, such as Neilson Hancock, and Cliffe Leslie, and Stuart Mill, and you will always find the same story and the same convictions, the old complaint of insecurity of tenure. There is one sentence from the Report of the Devon Commission on this head which I should like to read to your Lordships. My quotations shall be very few, but I think this is one which is worth reading. They say—

“The most general and, indeed, universal complaint in every part of Ireland was ‘the want of tenure,’ to use the expression most commonly employed by the witnesses. The uncertainty of tenure is constantly referred to as a pressing grievance by all classes of tenants. It is said to paralyze all exertions, and to place a fatal impediment in the way of improvement. We have no doubt that this is so in many instances.”

I am afraid that that assertion is as true, or almost as true, to-day as it was then. But you will ask, of course—“Has not the Land Act of 1870 cured all these things?” My Lords, I am obliged to admit that it has not. I think that Act was a great measure of Land Law Reform for Ireland; I think it did great things. It certainly stimulated the industry of the Irish tenants for a considerable time, until they found out that the security it gave was not nearly so great as they expected. It certainly protected many tenants from hardship and wrong, and until of late it greatly decreased the number of evictions; and if it did only those two things, if it only legalized the Ulster tenant right custom and reversed the iniquitous law which made the tenants’ improvements the landlords’ property—if, I say, it had only done these two things, I think it would have been a great measure. But it had, at least, two great deficiencies. It did not give the tenant a sufficient interest and property in his own outlay and improvements to induce him to make them to the required extent, and it did not deal directly with the burning question of rent in the direction of securing him against arbitrary increases of that rent. There can be no doubt that the recent lawless refusal to pay rent, and all the discontent and disaffection we have seen in Ireland, have been largely due to a succession of bad seasons and to a violent agitation. But, on the other hand, who can doubt that there are real grievances and evils lying behind all this agitation? We, at least, on this Bench do not doubt it. We are convinced, in common with a great number of the best judges of the state of things in Ireland; we are convinced by the evidence and opinions gathered from all quarters by the two Commissions which have sat—the evidence, not of tenants only, but of landlords, agents, County Court Judges, and the most experienced men of every class, that these evils do exist. The evidence of the County Court Judges of Ireland is well deserving the consideration of this House, and is evidence of great weight, as coming from persons whose special knowledge and opportunities entitle them to be heard with respect and attention. Seven or eight of them were examined, and I doubt if there was one who did not testify to the existence of those facts upon which this Bill is based, while most of them pointed to remedies such as we now propose, to legislation practically identical with that contained in this measure. We believe, therefore, my Lords, that the statement I have just quoted from the Devon Commission is still too true. And let me remind your Lordships that since that date a new factor has grown up in Irish life, which has increased and aggravated the distrust of Irish tenants—that is, the great change of landed property in Ireland. That great change has largely broken into the old and kindly traditional system of land management which used to prevail, and which still prevails, I am glad to think, to a great extent; but the Irish tenant now wants protection, not so much against his actual, as against his possible landlord. He is always in fear of a change of ownership, a fact that was clearly shown in the evidence before the two Commissions. The tenant is very often satisfied with his landlord, but fears a change; and, to repeat a phrase frequently used by the witnesses, he dreads lest a new King may arise who knows not Joseph. Under those circumstances, the Irish tenant becomes discontented and disaffected; he sullenly folds his arms, and refuses to exert himself and to improve. Nothing is more plainly proved by the evidence taken by the Commissions than the widespread feeling among the tenantry that it is dangerous to improve. My Lords, can any condition of things be more fatal in a country where everything depends on agriculture, where almost all agricultural improvements are yet to be made, where almost all agricultural dwellings ought to be rebuilt, and where it is chimerical, hopeless, and unjust to expect the lords of the soil, the owners of the land, to undertake the burden of so enormous an outlay? We desire to cure that condition of things, if it be possible. We desire to substitute for this uncertainty of tenure the fact and feeling of security, and I am now going to tell your Lordships the means by which this measure aims at that object. My Lords, the three main provisions of the Bill may be described in this way—First, there is the right conferred on the tenant of selling his tenancy—that is to say, the interest in his holding. Secondly, there is the power of obtaining from a Court, an impartial tribunal, a settlement of the rent. Thirdly, there is the restriction of the landlord's right of eviction. I may be told that these three heads of legislation are virtually the "three F's," and if anyone chooses so to describe them I have no objection; but I do not use that term myself, for this reason—that these popular phrases of fair rent, free sale, and fixity of tenure always carry with them a certain natural exaggeration, and that to describe the provisions of the Bill in that way would be unjust to those who have taken immense pains in the framing of the measure to carry out those principles, and in guarding and adapting them to all the circumstances and rights of the two parties. That, my Lords, is my conviction with respect to the framing of this Bill. But I am not ashamed of the "three F's"—I am not ashamed of them, if it were only for this reason—The "three F's" prevail at this moment on great numbers of the best and happiest estates in all Ireland. Now, these three heads of legislation are so closely connected and bound together that if you admit one of them, you cannot but admit the others also. If you begin to deal with one, you cannot possibly help going on to the other two. They follow from one another, and have a natural affinity, growing out of the circumstances of the case. But the Bill rushes at once in medias res, and in the 1st clause deals with the tenant's right to sell the interest in his holding, subject to various conditions, and, above all, to the landlord's right to obtain, either by agreement or at the hands of the Court, his fair rent. This practice of selling the tenant's interest is one that seems strange to those accustomed to the English and Scotch systems, especially to those who think those systems a part of the order of nature, or a branch of the moral law, equally applicable to the whole of the human race; but it is not strange in Ireland. It is perfectly familiar there. The Land Act of 1870 is full of it, although it did not directly enact it for Ireland generally. Ireland itself is full of it, from one end to the other, and perhaps fuller of it at this moment than it ever has been. The moment you look below the surface, you find it in one shape or another, even where you least expect it, and where its very existence is denied. An agent says he sets himself against it; but you find that tenant A sells to tenant B; while the agent winks at the transaction or looks the other way; a landlord says indignantly that he sets his face against the growth of tenant right on his estate; but you find that he is ready and very glad to take from the incoming tenant the arrears owing by his predecessor. What is that every-day proceeding but an admission of tenant right?—the only difference being that the payment, instead of going through the hands of the outgoing tenant, comes direct to the landlord. This is the condition in which the practice of tenant right is found all over Ireland, and I will say, in passing, that there is evidently nothing so satisfactory to the mind of the Irish tenant; and that fact alone, as it appears to me, is an advantage enough to outweigh many drawbacks. But there is one Province of Ireland in which, as we all know, this practice has long been thoroughly established—first as a custom, and now as the law of the land. For my part, I believe that this custom, or a similar one, would long ago have established itself over the whole country if the old and happy relations between landlord and tenant that exist in Ulster had existed also in the other Provinces. If the landlord had had the same feeling for his tenant, and the tenant the same spirit of independence, I believe this custom would have grown up everywhere as a natural condition of tenancies in Ireland. I need not say that such a growth was rendered impossible by the hateful legislation of the last century, and the unwholesome and miserable relations so established between the two classes. In this way, it was in Ulster only that the custom struck root, and originally in the Protestant and Scotch settlement of Ulster, from which it gradually extended itself over the rest of the Province. The men of Ulster believe that the custom lies at the root of the greater part of their prosperity; and I entirely agree with them. To say the very least, it must be admitted that it has grown up in that part of Ireland which is the happiest, the most peaceful, the most industrious, where the most is made of the land, and where there is the largest number of resident landlords. Now, what does this tenant right consist of? It consists, in the first place, and above all, of the value of the tenant's own outlay on improvements, and is the Irish method of securing that value to the tenant. This is by far the most important part of it all, both in a public point of view and in the view of the tenant himself. The tenant has very little confidence in the artificial valuation of his property; he desires to have the full value of his improvements, and to test and realize it by sale. Of course, there is also another element, a subordinate element, which represents the mere price for the occupation of the farm, the goodwill of the farm, as it is often called, and that element is chiefly and especially important in the case of the smaller holdings. It cannot be separated from the other element; and if it has any disadvantages they must be taken with the advantages of the former and main component, with which, in a greater or lesser degree, it is inextricably mixed up. I know that in the eyes of many persons this payment for the goodwill of a holding vitiates the whole system of tenant right and makes it altogether an abuse. But the Irish tenant is not of that opinion. In his eyes—and I think he knows his own interest better than other people—this payment mitigates the hardships of that event which is the great dread of his life—the day when he loses his holding. It forms, in fact, a kind of “compensation for disturbance,” which was looked upon, I know, by many as a very strange device in the Act of 1870, though, in fact, it was nothing of the kind, for in Ireland, on the best managed estates, a voluntary system of compensation for disturbance has always been in operation. These tenant right payments are, of course, sometimes extravagant. We hear a great deal of that—I think a great deal too much; we are sure to hear of cases of excess, and people do not ask how they are to be explained, so that there grows up a notion that tenant right is generally extravagant. I do not myself believe that it is so; and on that point very valuable information was collected by the Assistant Commissioners of the Richmond Commission. They assured us they very seldom found a case in which an incoming purchasing tenant did not get value for his money in the shape of works and improvements. They also stated that a great number of the cases of apparently extravagant tenant right payments could be easily accounted for, because they took place in little farms in mountain and moorland districts, where the tenant himself had made his farm by reclaiming the waste land and putting his home and other buildings upon it. Consequently, the tenant right, measured by the very low rent that is properly received by the landlord from such a holding, appears to be extravagant; but it is not so, for it is evidently absurd to measure the tenant's distinct interest by a measurement derived from the landlord's. We are often told confidently that if a tenant holding at a reasonable rent makes this tenant right payment upon entering on his holding he converts himself into a rack-rented farmer. My Lords, that may be the theory of the matter; but it is not the fact. The tenant knows that the money he has paid is not a rent, but an investment, an insurance against the evil day when he may have to leave his holding. He knows that every addition he makes to the value of his holding is an investment that will add to the price of his tenant right, and that all deterioration of the buildings or holding will diminish it. Therefore, the tenant right becomes a premium on industry and improvement, and a constant penalty on sloth and neglect. Then we are told that if we, for the first time, confer on tenants in other parts of Ireland than Ulster the right of selling their interest, we shall enable them to sell something which is the property of their landlords. Well, I find it difficult to understand that statement. First of all, in the endless cases which are constantly occurring in Ireland, where the tenant is permitted by his landlord to sell his interest, does the landlord think the tenant is selling anything which belongs to him?

[First Night.]

Lord Carlingsford

[First Night.]

Lord Carlingford

Nothing of the kind. By giving the tenant a right to sell his interest in his holding we simply confer upon him that kind of security for improvements which is most satisfactory to him, and which is already enjoyed by his brethren in Ulster; and no one in this House, I take it, will be sorry to see Irish landlords—I am afraid the truth must be admitted that there are in Ireland some landlords who would do it—debarred from levying on a tenant an increased rent on account of that tenant's own outlay and investments. Then, as to the other portion of the tenant right, is it true that the occupation element, the goodwill element, must be taken out of the landlord's fair rent? I utterly deny that. We do not admit it for a moment. We believe that the goodwill element of tenant right grows up inevitably, side by side, in conjunction with, and outside of, the landlord's rent; that it is not carved out of the landlord's rent; and that it does not cut down the landlord's rent. That we believe firmly to be proved by all the evidence bearing on the case and from all the experience of Ulster. I think the Ulster landlords may well be satisfied with the amount and the security of the rents they receive alongside and, so to speak, in spite of the tenant right, and we believe the same thing will be true in every other part of Ireland. We think, therefore, that provided the landlord has security for his fair rent, and provided that the tenant is not allowed to make money out of the mere indulgence of the landlord—and this the Bill will prevent—we maintain that the general power of sale of their interest conferred on the tenants will cause the landlord no loss of legitimate income, and we hold that to legalize that right will be of great public advantage to Ireland; that it will give a great sense of security to the tenant; that it will greatly stimulate his improvements; and that, to say the very least, it will do no injury and no wrong to the landlord.

My Lords, the next main provision of the Bill is closely connected with that which I have just described—namely, the power of appealing to a tribunal for the settlement of rent. This, no doubt, is novel and exceptional legislation. It is legislation which is totally inapplicable to everything in this country; but we are convinced, in common with a great number of the best authorities in Ireland, that there are no other possible means within our power of protecting the Irish tenants against excessive rent. It is remarkable what a consensus of opinion is found to exist upon this subject outside the tenant class. Irish opinion seems to have hit upon this as the only possible remedy for the great evils in this matter of rent, from which both landlords and tenants are now suffering. I do not know whether we shall hear much in this debate about freedom of contract in Ireland; possibly we may; but whatever may be said upon the subject, I think most people have found out that there is not much of it in the case of dealings between a landlord and an occupying tenant. I do not speak of dealings between landlords and new tenants, but of dealings between a landlord and a tenant in occupation, to whom the loss of his farm is the loss of his livelihood. The fact of the utter want of freedom in these cases has been brought out in the strongest way by the working of the Land Act of 1870. The strongest and the most novel provision in that Act was a penalty upon eviction. At that time we fixed our eyes on this matter of eviction, and we thought that if we could check eviction we should check the raising of rent. But we overrated the efficacy of that method, and we underrated the enormous power of coercion which a threat of eviction can exercise on an Irish tenant. We did not fully see, until we learnt it by experience, that an Irish tenant will too commonly submit to almost any terms rather than undergo the pains and penalties of eviction. I will trouble your Lordships with two short quotations which illustrate this fact. One is from the evidence taken by a Committee of this House—Lord Clanricarde's Committee—some years ago. A solicitor in the South of Ireland said—

"They (the tenants) told me, as a matter of secrecy, that they had saved sums of money; but they were afraid to invest them in their farms, or to let the landlord or agent know that they had them, inasmuch as they had no hold of the land. 'Do you really think there was the slightest foundation for such a fear?'—'I do, most sincerely. The tenant's rent might be raised, or a fine required.'"

The next extract is from the Evidence taken by the Bessborough Commission, and is only a sample of what may be found in it from one end to the other.

["Hear, hear!"] I do not know whether noble Lords opposite mean by their cheers that no witness is to be believed because he gave evidence before the Bessborough Commission. If so, that is a wonderful state of mind. A Southern land agent and solicitor said before that Commission—

"There is not a day that I am not told by tenants that there is no use in their improving if the bailiff can go round, and, on seeing a tolerable piece of ground which had been improved, can tell them to go out, or pay an additional rent. At all events, they will not improve under the present system."

We are convinced that the evidence, of which these are the merest specimens, proves that in these dealings between a landlord and an occupying tenant there is such an utter inequality between the parties, such a helplessness on the part of the tenant, that it becomes a matter of the highest policy, in the interests of both classes, to interfere, and to endeavour to settle this burning question by the action of a Court. As to the means of deciding what is a fair rent, we do not believe there will be any great practical difficulty. We think that the Court, aided by competent experts, will be able to settle with sufficient accuracy what is a fair rent for the holding. Such a duty is not so novel a one as many may think, because it is plain that the Irish County Court Judges have, under the Act of 1870, been dealing to a large extent with the settlement of this very matter of rent. The Act of 1870 gave those learned gentlemen no direct power of settling a fair rent; but it became inevitable under its provisions that they should often consider what, between the two parties, a fair rent was. We believe that this reference to the Court will be a great boon to all parties. My Lords, I know some think that this exceptional legislation ought, at least, to be confined to the smaller tenants in Ireland. I see that I myself have lately been quoted in support of that opinion. I suppose I did say, in the year 1870, that tenants of holdings valued at £100 ought to be able to protect themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] I cannot accept those cheers. I say at once that I totally retract that opinion. I have learned since 1870 that that opinion was totally unfounded. No doubt it is true that the larger Irish tenant is not in the same danger of destitution upon leaving his holding as the smaller tenant may be; but the larger tenant is the man who invests the most capital in his farm, and is the very man who, from a public point of view, most requires the protection of such legislation as this. He risks the most, he gives the most hostages to fortune; and certainly his industry and capital require at least as much protection, both from the public point of view and in justice to himself, as those of the smaller tenant. I think, therefore, it would be a very great mistake and misfortune if such a class as the large and improving tenants of Ireland were excluded from the protection of this Bill in the matter of rent. I may state at this point the nature of the Land Court which the Bill establishes. First of all, the measure retains the Civil Bill Courts as under the Land Act, with the assistance of competent valuers. But it also creates a superior Land Commission or Court, and enables either landlord or tenant to pass by the Civil Bill Court, and to appeal at once to the Land Commission. That Commission will consist of three Members. Two of them are legal Members, one of whom is the Judicial Commissioner, both of them being men of the highest standing, character, and ability, and the third is a gentleman who stands at the very head of the profession of land agents in Ireland, and who deserves, and I believe will obtain, the confidence of tenants and landlords alike. This Court will be assisted by Assistant Commissioners, and sub-Commissions will be formed in various parts of Ireland. The Court will be enabled and bound to rehear any case upon appeal, whether from a County Court Judge or from a sub-Commission. My Lords, I pass now to the third main provision of the Bill, which relates to the limitation of the right of ejectment. I need scarcely say that it would be useless to give this power to settle a rent to the Court if it were left perfectly open to the landlord to turn out the tenant for any and every reason, perhaps for the very reason that he had applied to the Court. The Bill, therefore, provides that the fixing of a judicial rent by the Court shall create a statutory tenancy for a statutory term of 15 years, renewable by the Court, if the Court shall again revise the rent. During that term the landlord will not be able to raise the rent, except on account of capital which he may have laid out by agreement with the tenant upon the farm. The statutory conditions to which the tenant will be subject are these—the landlord retains the right to dispossess the tenant for non-payment of rent, for waste, for sub-division and sub-letting, for bankruptcy, and for persistent obstruction to all the various ordinary rights of property, such as the rights of mining and cutting timber, of making roads and drains, of sporting, &c. Beyond this list of grounds for ejectment the landlord will not be able to eject. Now, doubtless, there will be many cases in which the parties will not appeal to the Court; and if they agree, without the intervention of the Court, upon an increased rent, a similar statutory term will be created, and the landlord, in addition, will have the right, with the consent of the Court, and with full compensation to the tenant, to resume any holding or any portion of it for causes connected with the benefit of the estate. This right of appeal to the Court is not made universal or perpetual. It attaches to what the Bill defines as present tenancies. It does not attach to a holding in any case in which the landlord has resumed possession of the holding either by purchase or otherwise. All such tenancies will come under the description of future tenancies, and there will be no right of appeal to the Court. But the tenancy will be subject to the tenant's right of disposing of his interest, and also to a self-acting system under the 3rd clause of the Bill, which is intended to check the demand for excessive rent on the part of the landlord, and, on the other hand, to encourage the tenant to accept any reasonable increase. There are only two or three more points in this part of the Bill with which I need trouble your Lordships. There is a clause dealing with the question of compensation for disturbance under the Act of 1870. The clause improves the provisions of that Act in some respects, and somewhat increases the scale of payment, in compliance with the opinion of a great number of County Court Judges. I believe that compensation for disturbance under this legislation will sink very much into the background. I believe it will be swallowed up in the far sounder system of the sale of the tenant's interest as in Ulster; and if, as we hope, that interest is increased in numerous cases by the tenant's own industry and outlay, it will become less and less necessary to have recourse to this compensation for disturbance. It was at best a palliative for great evils, and I look forward to the time when it will be unnecessary. For the present, however, we think it necessary to maintain and to strengthen it, as a protection, in some cases, for the tenant. I come now to the question of leases. The Bill provides for what it calls a judicial lease to be entered into with the sanction of the Court. Such leases will take the place of all the other provisions of the Bill, and will form the tenure—the contract between the landlord and the tenant. At the expiration of such a lease the tenancy of the tenant will be a future tenancy. But with respect to existing leases, the Bill provides that a tenant who, at the end of the lease, falls into the position of an occupying tenant from year to year, shall be treated as a present tenant. The more we look into the matter, the less reason will be found to make a difference between the position of such a tenant at the end of a lease and that of any other tenant in Ireland. It is well known that the real understanding of an Irish lease, in spite of any formal words, is not that the landlord at the end of the lease shall resume possession. The real understanding is that the lease shall fix the rent for the period to which it refers, and that at the end of it the tenant shall be a tenant from year to year. We saw no reason why a tenant in that position should not have the same protection which the Bill gives to his neighbours as ordinary tenants. Indeed, it may very well be that a tenant at that moment may require more protection than at any other time, because he is likely to have invested his money in his holding, and to have made improvements which might be very easily swallowed up and confiscated by an excessive rent. This is the view of the matter taken in the Province of Ulster. The general understanding in that Province is that the lease is little or nothing more than a fixing of the rent for the time that it lasts, and that the tenant at the end of the lease should have the same right of protection under the custom as any other tenant in the Province. We have followed that analogy, and we propose to treat the tenant at the end of an existing lease as a present tenant, and to give him the same protection as that which other tenants from year to year enjoy. Another provision of the Bill which I ought to mention relates to those leases with respect to which there is reason to believe that they have been forced upon the tenants since the passing of the Land Act by notices to quit or threats of eviction. In those leases there are terms which are totally contrary to the spirit of the Land Act. It is proposed by the Bill that if within the next six months any such lease is brought before the Court, and if the Court shall find it to contain such inequitable terms, and to have been forced upon the tenant by threat of eviction, the Court shall be at liberty to declare such lease void. The transactions in question must be very strange to your Lordships. ["Hear, hear!"] I say the transactions with which the clause deals must be strange to the House. If the remedy is unknown in this country, certainly such transactions are absolutely unknown; and it appears to me that a so-called contract obtained by such means as I have described is not one deserving of the name of a lease at all. At all events, we think it a matter so exceptional and so grievous to the tenant who has been coerced to accept such a lease by force majeure under threat of eviction, that we think the Court may be entitled to take such influences into consideration, and do justice in the matter. My Lords, I think I have said enough as to that great portion of the Bill which relates to the tenure of land. I now turn for a short time to that part which does not relate to tenure. My Lords, the minor provisions of this portion of the Bill deal with reclamation of waste land and emigration from Ireland. My Lords, there is no question more obscure, or upon which more contradictory evidence exists, than that of the reclamation of land in Ireland. For myself, I believe that the best and most effectual reclamation will be carried out in the future, as it has been in the past, by small tenants on their own land encouraged by a system of security. Others think that there is a good deal to be done upon a larger scale, if the means be found, and the Bill proposes to supply such means. The Treasury under the Bill may make advances either to Companies or occupiers, or to the landlord and tenant jointly, and the reclamation of land on a large scale may be tried under these provisions. Then, as to emigration, I will only say that it is not to be thought of as a general remedy for the evils of the Irish land system. In the greater part of Ireland emigration would be an evil rather than a good. But, as we all know, there are districts in the country which the Bill mildly terms "thickly populated"—districts where there is an amount of overcrowding which there are, apparently, no means of remedying, except by the removal of the population to happier regions. We hope that the Bill may enable such removal to take place, and that great relief may thus be given to these overcrowded portions of the country. My Lords, the next and main enactment of this part of the Bill relates, of course, to the purchase of land by the tenant farmers—a subject which is very familiar to your Lordships. The Bill proposes greatly to increase the facilities for such purchases, to improve the machinery for promoting them, and especially to make this important change in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of the other House, presided over by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, that the Land Commission will be empowered to purchase estates from the landlords and to re-sell them, with the assistance of Government advances, to the tenants. My Lords, this plan seems to be watched with eager eyes from two opposite quarters. There are the Land Leaguers, who are longing to buy out the landlords at the cheapest rate possible, and there are a number of landlords who—I think in a panic—are longing to be bought out; but, perhaps, with not quite the same view as to prices. Our point of view is neither one nor the other. There are numbers of resident landlords, and some non-resident, whose separation from Ireland we should look upon as the greatest calamity; and we hope and believe they will find no reason, when this Bill comes into operation, to separate themselves from that country. But there are others, not always from their own fault, whose ownership of land does not confer advantage either upon the tenants, or the country at large; and there are, also, what might be called commercial properties in Ireland which might very well be sold to the tenants, while, of course, it is probable that portions of large estates may be treated in the same way. Upon the whole, I believe that, without impairing the existence or influence of the landlord class in Ireland, means may be found to create a very considerable number, in all portions of the country, of smaller proprietors cultivating their own land, and who, we think, would add greatly to the stability of property in Ireland. My Lords, I now desire to return, for a moment, to the main portion of this Bill, which deals with the tenure of land in Ireland. My Lords, I ask myself, what effect will this legislation have upon the interests and well-being of Irish landlords? I ask that question, not merely as a Member of the Government, but as one of the class affected, and of that portion of the class which is especially affected—namely, the Irish landlords outside the Province of Ulster. My Lords, I maintain that the provisions of this Bill will cause the landlords no money loss whatever. I believe that it will inflict upon them no loss of income, except in those cases in which a certain number of landlords may have imposed upon their tenants excessive and inequitable rents, which they are probably vainly trying to recover. But it will, undoubtedly, deprive Irish landlords of a certain portion of their power. It will deprive them of the free choice of a tenant when a change of tenancy takes place; though it will not deprive them of a reasonable veto on the purchasing tenant. It will also deprive them of the means of enforcing their every wish and every rule of their estates by the capital sentence of unrestricted eviction. It seems to me, however, that there is this, at least, to be said—that the time has almost passed when it was necessary, or politic, or, perhaps, possible, for Irish landlords to exercise those powers in the fashion in which of old they used to be exercised. There used to be, undoubtedly, a system of very despotic power, which, in its best form, amounted to a benevolent despotism. Those times, it appears to me, are nearly past; and it will, in that respect, be no real loss to the landlords if their power is somewhat retrenched. But, my Lords, the question is this—I ask myself, and I should like to ask your Lordships, is it not worth while to surrender some of these powers of landlordism, and to strengthen the rest for the purpose of establishing, upon a firmer footing, the essential rights of property, and basing them upon the contentment of a prosperous tenantry? And, after all, is it not the fact that we who are affected by this Bill shall find ourselves when it passes very much in the position in which the Ulster landlords are now? My Lords, in that case, the prospect does not appear to me to be a very terrible one. Of course, I shall be told by many that this Bill will produce no healing effect. That statement we are prepared to face. We shall be told that it will have no effect upon the minds of the tenants tending to produce a condition of general contentment in Ireland. That is not my belief. I say that there are very strong reasons for believing the contrary. I know not, of course, what difficulties we may yet have to grapple with from the agitation which prevails in Ireland, from the Land League with its American money; but I agree with the remark of a wise Irishman, who said the other day that the Land League is not Ireland. I firmly believe, also, that, in the Land League itself, there are a multitude of members who are not prepared to sacrifice the real interests of the Irish tenant farmers and the prosperity of their country to impossible schemes of social or political revolution. The Irish tenants, as a class, have not asked for revolutionary measures, they have not asked for the abolition of landlords, or the expropriation of landlord property. They have asked for security for themselves, and for fair rents. I have faith in this Bill, because it attempts to attain those objects by methods which are congenial to Ireland, which are copied from the best usages and practices in Ireland; which are not founded upon any theory such as generally ignores half the facts of the case, and which are not modelled upon English and Scotch land systems, so totally alien to the land system of Ireland. My Lords, may I venture to repeat a sentence from a speech of my own in the year 1870? I said then, speaking on the second reading of the Irish Land Bill—

[First Night.]

Lord Carlingford

[First Night.]

Lord Carlingford

"In framing this measure . . . we have had special regard to the best usages prevailing upon the best estates in Ulster as well as elsewhere. We have taken the elements of the Ulster Custom, and translated them, so to speak, into a statutory form for the rest of the country."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1443.]

My Lords, I have trust in this Bill, because it is framed in that same spirit which I then described. It adopts, but far more thoroughly, the same principle; it moves, but far more boldly, on the same path. Those usages, which it steadily keeps in view, are not confined to Ulster; they are Irish usages. But I must pay my humble tribute to Ulster itself. It is to Ulster that we owe the only healthy system of land tenure that has ever got itself established in Ireland. It is to Ulster that we owe the only Irish custom that has ever substituted for the mere indulgence of the landlord a manly, moral, and honourable understanding between the two parties. It is to Ulster that we owe, in the person of Sharman Crawford, the first attempts at a reform of the Irish Land Laws. Few in this House will grudge to Ulster any legislation necessary to make her custom safe. But we feel that it is absolutely impossible to leave all the rest of Ireland—all the agricultural classes of three-fourths of Ireland—in a position of absolute inferiority to the Northern Province. We desire, therefore, to do for the rest of Ireland what custom has done for Ulster. We desire to do what custom, under a happier history, would have done for the other three Provinces. We desire to create, by a just law, that state of tenure which is slowly growing up all over Ireland, with all the sinister accompaniments of agitation and conspiracy and agrarian crime. We believe that the magic of security will scatter those evil influences, if Parliament adopts this legislation. We believe that such a measure as this will obtain the moral support of all that is best throughout the country; and I trust I may be allowed, before sitting down, with all sincerity and earnestness, to entreat your Lordships to join with the other House of Parliament, to join with the great majority of the people of this country, in accomplishing this great work for Ireland. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, whatever decision your Lordships may come to with respect to the course which it is right to take as to this Bill, at all events it is desirable that you should not underrate the importance of the changes which you are making, or the magnitude of this departure from all the traditions which have governed legislation hitherto. Tenant right, up to this year, has been usually understood in political controversy in a sense which now appears limited and restricted. From the time of the Irish Famine, and from an earlier period, the attention of legislators was drawn to the necessity of protecting from any invasion or encroachment that equitable right of a tenant in the improvements which he, and in many cases he alone, had put upon the land. That was an object with respect to which Parliament may not have been happy in its legislation, but which it sincerely sought to effect. There was no difference of opinion between the two Parties on that point. In fact, your Lordships were reminded by Lord Beaconsfield last year, speaking in this place, that the first measure effectively guaranteeing his improvements to the Irish tenant was brought in by the Irish Attorney General of the first Administration of the late Lord Derby. Hitherto both Parties have expressed themselves desirous of securing the interests of the Irish tenant in his improvements; but, unfortunately, a measure was passed which has had the effect of exposing those improvements to somewhat serious peril. Pressed partly by the political economy of the day, pressed also, in some degree, by an unreasoning dislike to old families and a desire to break up old estates, a Liberal Government, some 25 years ago, passed the Irish Encumbered Estates Act. The provisions of that Act I do not attempt to pourtray; but, as to its effect, it is enough to say that the Prime Minister has already branded it as confiscating the improvements of the Irish tenant. This was the act certainly not of the Party with which we are connected. But from that time to this constant complaints have arisen about those improvements being in danger, and constant efforts have been made to save them. Provisions to that effect were introduced into the Irish Land Act; and, so far as we understood at the time, the tenant right contemplated by the Land Act went no further than this. It had no other object in view in its general provisions; and even where it proposed to give compensation for disturbance, we were distinctly assured that the only intention was to prevent undue and inexpedient exercise of the right of eviction. It was in the same spirit that the question came to be examined during the last Autumn and Winter, and it was with this view that the Commission on which the noble Lord who has just sat down sat—the Commission of the Duke of Richmond—made the recommendation which has become somewhat celebrated, because an attempt has been made to fasten upon it as the basis of the vast structure of this Bill. What the Duke of Richmond's Commission really pointed out was that the tenant's improvements were in danger of being sacrificed, and it was natural that the tenants should desire legislation to prevent it. Nothing more natural; and if this Bill only sought to re-enforce the previous efforts in the same direction, it would have met little opposition or criticism from the Party with which I have the honour to be connected. But an entire change has come over the definition of tenant right that is to be given to the tenants under the Bill of the present Session. Now, for the first time, an enormous change is introduced into the relations between landlord and tenant. The tenants all over Ireland are to be authorized to sell for money that which they never bought, which they never earned, and which the noble Lord who has just sat down would persuade us has grown in some manner out of the soil, and can be made over to the tenant without sacrifice on the part of anybody else's interest in the matter. No doubt wonderful things are done in Ireland, and Ireland is a wonderful country; but I defy anyone who pays attention to the multiplication table to show that this money is given to the tenant without taking away property from the landlord on whose estate the farm is, or from the person with whom the bargain is made. This is not all. It is part of tenant right under this Bill that contracts deliberately made are now to be freely torn up by those who made them; and we are told that this is necessary for the protection of the tenant. Yet, when the Act of 1870 was passed, we were assured that from that time forward every person in Ireland would have to abide by the contracts he made. This is to be no longer the case; but Courts are to be set up to destroy the contracts into which people deliberately and knowingly have entered. In what position is the landlord left? Is he worthy to be called a landlord? He may not select his tenant; he may not keep off from his estate any man, no matter how much he may deserve his objection or his hostility. He may not deal with his rent, however much he may justly think it ought to be raised. He may not alter the construction of his estate; he may not unite farm with farm, or consolidate farms which may appear to need it. He may not even select the places where the cottages of his labourers are to be built; but these are to be selected for him, and without his consent, in any part of the estate that is left. My Lords, in what part of the civilized world is that the definition of a landlord? That is not a landlord. He is something between two different characters. He is a sort of mortgagee upon the estate, with an uncertain and precarious hold upon his income, and he is a head agent to Serjeant O'Hagan and his Colleagues. The noble Lord seems to think this is quite reasonable. Say I took a man five years ago and put him into a bit of my park, which I turn into a farm. I gave him no promise, no right to sell the tenancy which he receives. He took it on the clear understanding that he was a tenant from year to year, liable to be evicted, and to have his rent raised according to any agreement to which we might come. He took it under the full understanding that he was liable to leave it. Then this Act comes suddenly down and transfers to him all the rights which he did nothing to earn, nothing to purchase, and which rights are taken away from me. The noble Lord tries to persuade you that this legislation is favourable to the landlord, and not a transfer of the rights of the landlord to the tenant. The answer of the noble Lord is this—"Oh, this is the custom of Ulster, and the custom of Ulster has splendidly succeeded." But that is not the custom of Ulster; it differs totally from the custom of Ulster. An essential part of that custom was that the landlord remained behind with absolute domination over all the transactions that might take place. If the price given in the sale of the tenancy was excessive, the landlord might interfere; if the tenant was objectionable the landlord might prevent him coming upon the estate. If the rent was too low the landlord might raise it; the landlord always had absolute power in the background, whatever custom might prevail. Whatever traditions might induce him to waive rights in favour of the tenant, there he was the master. The holding had but one master; and it is to that arrangement the prosperity of Ulster was due. Do not, then, attempt to claim the example and precedent of Ulster in favour of an arrangement in which every atom of power is taken out of the hands of the landlords and given to a tribunal which may be, and I believe is, rather hostile to the landlords and favourable to the tenants. Now, what is the character of this measure? I think it is an utter misrepresentation of the Bill to represent it as conferring the custom of Ulster on the rest of Ireland, because the custom of Ulster had, as an integral and necessary part, the dominating power of the landlord. But let us admit it is the custom of Ulster; how shall we describe the proposal to confer that custom upon the tenants of the rest of Ireland, as against the landlords of the rest of Ireland, in places where it has not grown up, and, therefore, in places where the consideration which it doubtless represents has not been given? I will call two authorities to that question, and my first shall be Mr. Chichester Fortescue. On the second reading of the Land Bill, in 1870, he said—

[First Night.]

"I do not know whether I make myself understood by the House; but, having looked closely into this matter, I feel strongly that there are great doubts whether what is called vaguely the extension of the Ulster Custom to the rest of Ireland would be fair either to landlords or tenants in that part of the country."—
[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1442.]

This is what was thought in 1870 by Mr. Chichester Fortescue, a statesman who, I regret to say, has disappeared from the House of Commons. There is also another statesman who has disappeared from the House of Commons. It is melancholy how many of those who were defenders of the rights of the landlord have vanished from that Assembly. Sir Roundell Palmer, on the 10th of March, 1870, said—

"But when the right hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) said that the extension of the Ulster Custom to the rest of Ireland was open for our consideration, I must say that that does appear a manifest violation of the principles of justice, and to be impossible, if we mean to respect those principles. It is unquestionable that where the custom obtains and landlords and tenants act on it in their dealings with one another, in such a case it is a matter of honesty for the landlord to allow the tenant to have the benefit of the custom. But when you talk of extending that custom to other parts of Ireland, you speak of a change which would alter the terms which, in those other parts of Ireland, have already been agreed on between landlord and tenant; and, therefore, if you gave in such a case to the tenant the value of the custom existing elsewhere, you would be just taking so much from the landlord and giving it to the tenant."—[Ibid., 1666-7.]

These are the rhetorical doctrines for which I have just been rebuked. I should like to quote another opinion upon the general operation of this Bill. It will not be an English opinion; but I think a French opinion, coming not from any Conservative source, but coming from some of those who have seen Socialism worked where it was originally bred, may, perhaps, shed a useful light upon the procedure which Her Majesty's Government have commenced. This is from The République Française of the 9th of July. I need not remind the House, I am not quoting merely a newspaper, but I am quoting from the organ of the most powerful man in France. In England you cannot speak of a newspaper as being the organ of a statesman, because such a thing does not exist; but in France it is the habitual custom, and this fact is notorious. The République Française said—

"It is impossible to conceal the gravity and the delicacy of the responsibility assumed by the English Government. In order to form an idea of it, it is necessary to imagine the French Government proposing, or rather imposing, its mediation upon landed proprietors, fixing the rates of their rents, and obliging the landowner who desired to get rid of his tenant to buy his right of tenancy from him in ready money. Assuredly, people would say that this was decided Socialism (du socialisme renforcé), and they would be right."

This is the judgment of the organ of the man who represents the most Socialist constituency in Paris. I have quoted these opinions of distinguished men who were in the House of Commons, and of this distinguished organ abroad, because I shrink from using language of my own, as it has met with unfavourable criticism from the Prime Minister. He very much objects that a noble and learned Friend near me and myself have used the word "confiscation" in reference to his policy. I desire, therefore, rather to use the language of other men, because I am aware, so long as the right hon. Gentleman is at the head of affairs, "confiscation" will be rather a monotonous word. The justification which is constantly advanced for all these restrictions of landlords' powers, which constitute this decided Socialism, is that it is to be done through the medium of an impartial Court. To my great astonishment, I heard the noble Lord opposite use that word. I did not expect that term to be used within these walls. What is this Court? It is a sound tradition that we usually abstain from criticizing Courts of Law, because their powers are strictly limited, and their character is well known, as they are constituted according to fixed traditions, they are free from Government influence, and we recognize their impartiality and freedom from bias. Of the three gentlemen appointed to be Commissioners under this Bill, and who are called a Court, I do not wish to say any word that could be thought to be personally derogatory; I have no doubt they are men of the highest character and purest motives; but that does not prevent them being men under the influence of the strongest prepossessions in reference to the matter with which they have to deal. They are all three strong Liberals, with strong views of tenant right. I believe that Mr. Vernon, whose qualities everybody has recognized, and who has not been a bit too highly praised, is the most Conservative of the three; but there is no doubt that all three are appointed with a strong prepossession in favour of views which are advocated by the representatives of the tenantry in Ireland, and which are deprecated by the landlords, to constitute a Court where the litigants will be landlords and tenants. Now, my Lords, to call that an impartial Court seems to me as reasonable as it would be to apply the term to an Ecclesiastical Court, appointed to decide some matter of Ritual or Creed, which would consist solely of High Churchmen or of Low Churchmen. They might be men of the highest character; but it would be ridiculous to speak of them as an impartial Court, where the prepossessions were not only avowed, but where those prepossessions were admitted to be one of the grounds for their selection. To say that this Bill is to be administered by a Court seems to me to be an abuse of words. A Court, as we know it, is a tribunal composed of men who are selected impartially, without special regard to their opinions on the matters with which they have to deal. It is also a tribunal which decides facts by a jury; if it does not decide them by a jury, it decides them subject to appeal. In all the law it administers it is strictly guided by tradition or by statutory law, which governs the discretion of the Judge and prevents him wandering to the right hand or the left from the narrow pathway prescribed to him. What is the case here? I suppose that Mr. Litton and Mr. Vernon will pair off, and the decisions will practically rest with Mr. Serjeant O'Hagan. I will not inquire into his past history, for his prepossessions are well known. He will decide absolutely on matters of fact without appeal. He is controlled by no authority whatever. There is in the Bill, as it is now on the Table, no words to guide him in exercising that which will be his chief and most important function—namely, the decision in the case of every tenant of what will be a fair rent; and, therefore, without control, without appeal, without guiding words, he, a man subject to known prepossessions, will have it in his hands to decide the incomes of every man—landlord or tenant—connected with agriculture in Ireland. It is impossible to call that a decision by a Court. The words of The République Française are more to the purpose when it said that they would be decided by the mediation of the Government. It is not the relegation of landlord and tenant to an impartial tribunal. It is Parliament and the Government coming down with an act of power, and imposing certain terms advantageous to the tenant, detrimental to the landlord, and imposing them without appeal. Why are we going to do these things? What reasons justify us in departing from the principles and breaking down the traditions by which our law has hitherto been nurtured. The noble Lord spoke much about the impossibility of freedom of contract in Ireland in the transactions between landlord and tenant. We have heard a great deal of that; but I have never been able to understand it. If, whenever the demand exceeds the supply, you say to the demander—"You are not at liberty to make your bargain in the open market," all transactions in the open market will soon disappear. But these principles will apply also to other things. I wish the Government, when they are bent upon a revolutionary measure, and the only real motive at the bottom of their hearts is the tyrant's plea, necessity, I wish they would say plainly what the state of the case is, instead of spending their time in the mischievous task of finding principles to justify their acts. They have sent political economy to Jupiter and Saturn, and they have invented a doctrine of free contract which, if it ever comes to be applied to the industries in this country, will produce the utmost confusion and most bitter contention. The noble Lord seemed to have a particular regard for leaseholders, for he said that the leaseholder was a person who specially required the protection of the State when his lease terminated. And why did he say so? Because the leaseholder had invested his means in the improvement of the land, and when the lease came to an end there was a possibility that the rent might be raised. But, my Lords, strike "Ireland" out of the Bill, and insert "Scotland," and how will this doctrine read? By what possible means are you going to prevent tenants in other parts from claiming the extension to them of the extraordinary principles which the noble Lord has invented in order to disguise his acts? What may be the effect of this measure on the wage-receiving class I do not know; but it must be obvious that many of the arguments which are being advanced in favour of the tenantry of Ireland will apply equally well in favour of artizans. We are told that eviction is a sentence of death. That is a strong phrase. But is not dismissal from employment, when there is no other employment open to a man, sentence of death as well? We are told that there is land hunger in Ireland, and that the Irish tenant will not betake himself to any other employment than the cultivation of the soil. But is that not the case with the artizan, whose physical constitution is formed to the performance of certain functions, and who cannot adapt himself to any other mode of living than that from which the circumstances of the market drive him? And if you tell him that the market supply is not equal to the demand, that he is not free to make a contract, and that the House of Commons has a right to come in and make it—will you not raise difficulties and excite bitternesses between the classes of which now you have little idea? There is another justification of this policy which is, I may say, so comical that I cannot help asking the attention of your Lordships to it. We are told that the Irish tenant has acquired a new property—a tenant right of land. And how do you think he has acquired it? He did not buy it; he did not earn it; but he got it because at a certain moment Mr. Gladstone and the House of Commons went to sleep. We have this strange statement attributed to the Prime Minister—

The Marquess of Salisbury

“It was not perceived by anyone during the passage of the Act of 1870 that the foundation of tenant right was being laid. The House was not fully conscious of the result of what it was doing. The object was to fine the landlord for ejecting the tenant. But the case now was totally different. They had now affirmed a real tenant right, and given the tenant the power of selling that right. That right embraced more than the mere value of the improvements.”

Well, my Lords, of all the extraordinary forms of legislation of which I have heard the form of legislation by inadvertence is at once the strangest and the most alarming. At all events, if it is really the case that the property of the landlord has been given to the tenant because, in one unhappy moment, Mr. Gladstone was inadvertent, let us take care that the inadvertence does not occur again. I do not know what inadvertence may not be concealed in this Bill. It seems to me that, in some of its doubtful and ambiguous phrases, and in some of the obvious tendencies of its provisions, Her Majesty's Government are preparing to commit an inadvertence. I entreat the House to take care that this capricious mode of conferring benefits on one class of subjects at the expense of the other does not receive any further extension. But, after all, the real argument of the noble Lord for this legislation is the necessity of restoring peace to Ireland. Her Majesty's Government tell us they are sending a message of peace to Ireland. I cannot help asking how messages of peace have hitherto fared when sent to that country by the Liberal Party? We are told that Ireland has increased in prosperity, and it is true; but it is true because she has had a large extension of communication by railway and steam such as other countries have had. But if the object of messages of peace which we have been perpetually occupied for some time past in sending is to make the Irish more reconciled to English rule, I appeal to notorious facts when I say that these messages of peace have most lamentably failed. Ireland is more hostile—there is a greater area of hostility—and the hostility is more bitter to English rule than at any time during the last century. And how is this message of peace to work? What you want, surely, is the “precious gift”—as, I think, the noble Lord called it—of security. What you surely want is that there should be some prospect of the two classes that have been at issue agreeing to make up their differences. But that depends upon what you mean by the message of peace. If it is like the message of peace occasionally sent by a decaying Empire to its invaders—a message conveying spoil and tribute, and exhorting the invaders to retire or a time in consideration of what is offered, it is possible this message of the Government may have some of the success which such messages of peace ordinarily obtain. It is possible it may procure a respite, while the gains that have been obtained are being realized and distributed, with the certainty that in the future—and in a very early and immediate future—the invaders will return with larger and more formidable demands. But as a message of peace between the two interests, between landlords and tenants, how can you expect it to be successful? What will the state of the landlord's mind be after this legislation has passed? At least, he has no doubt of the effect, whatever you may have, that both by the Act of 1870, and still more by this Bill, he has been or will be stripped of many of the rights which he purchased or inherited. These rights have been taken from him, first by legislation at one time, then by legislation at another time, and he has observed that they have always come at moments of political exigency—after a particular verdict has been delivered by the electors at the poll. He has had many difficulties hitherto to struggle against. He has had all the difficulties of the climate, of the people, the difference of religion, and the historical difficulties in Ireland. But, up to 10 years ago—or rather, I might say, up to this present time—his one sure foundation was that the laws of property and the rights of property had been upheld by the Government under which he lived. Now, from this time forward, he will have to look upon the Imperial Parliament and the Government as one of his most formidable dangers. He will know that when the next electoral crisis arrives—when the next political exigency demands it—new requirements will be put forward by the Irish tenantry; and assuredly there is nothing in the past history of the English Governments, with whom they have had to deal, which would lead them to expect that those demands and requirements will be rejected. The landlord in Ireland seems to me from henceforth to be like a man living in a country ravaged by earthquakes. He never knows when an earthquake will come and destroy some portion of his property. All he knows is, that its advent is impossible to prophesy, and its power is impossible to resist. Or I might liken him to a man living in one of those countries; where the nature of the Government is arbitrary and severe—like a peasant, say, living in Armenia—who knows that when he has invested his money in the cultivation of his land, the Government itself can seize and take from him a part of the rights he possesses. He is unable to resist; but he knows it has happened in the past, and that it will happen in the future, and he is careful not to expose more of his property than he can help to such an untoward mischance. I do not rely merely upon my own opinion for what I say. I will read an extract from the letter of an Irish landlord, giving his view of the future; I will not give his name, for when talking of an Irish landlord you should not give his name, but he is well known to be a considerable authority. The letter is dated July 29, 1881. The extract says—

The Marquess of Salisbury

“It is certain after such treatment of those who have worked as I have done there is an end to all confidence. Instead of spending £800 a-year in permanent improvements, and much more in labour, on my farm, I have made up my mind to lay out no more money in any way, to put all the land I hold in grass, and draw all the money possible out of the country, and so to recoup for my children as far as possible the money of which I have been deprived.”

That is the feeling which is only natural to men who live by the land. Large proprietors may still afford to be philanthropic and to spend their money in Ireland; but those who deal with it as a matter of business will not expose more of their property than they can help to the risks of this predatory legislation. That is not the only evil. By this legislation you urge upon every landlord that he should take the utmost advantage of all the rights he possesses. The great object to be desired is that a landlord should not press his tenant too hardly. That is the condition on which they will live well together. Henceforth, however, you tell the landlord—“Your only chance of rescuing your property from these objectionable and humiliating restrictions is to obtain the pre-emption of it, and the sale of it by your tenant to you, so that you may enter into possession of it again.” The landlord will do this if he acts on principles of business, and it is only on motives of business you can calculate in legislation. He will watch his tenant for every default which may bring him within the cognizance of the law, and he will insist on his rent to the hour and the last shilling in order to be able to enter into possession of his property again. Of course, I am not saying that those landlords who can afford to act otherwise will not act otherwise—and I heartily hope there may be many who will; but as to those who will be guided by business principles alone, this is inevitably the course they must pursue. What will be the attitude of the tenant all this time? He, like the landlord, will be looking to the future, but in a very different temper. He knows perfectly well that all he has hitherto got he has not got because he has moved your convictions, but because he has moved your fears. He knows that he has obtained it by agitation. He is told in eloquent perorations that it is the result of the Divine light of justice; but he sees that justice is always on the side of those who can produce the numerical majority at the poll. Depend upon it, the Irish tenant will learn that lesson. You have not given him anything near all he demands. There is much more in the background; and the weapon which has obtained him satisfaction before will be used to obtain it again. He will resort to the agitation which has benefited him hitherto, with a sound conviction that it will not fail. On these grounds I cannot help feeling very great doubt as to this Bill being a message of peace, even for a short time—I am certain it will not for any considerable period. Then the question arises, What course are we to take with reference to this Bill? My Lords, if I were responsible for the legislation for Ireland—if I had to frame and carry through a Bill for the purpose of settling these troubles, assuredly I should not choose such a Bill as this. It seems to me that in the holding of landed property there is no middle term between actual ownership as freeholder or copyholder and true tenancy, of course with proper protection for improvements. Any attempt to institute a tenancy which will be intermediate between these two conditions, and which, practically, results in a double ownership of the land, and, therefore, requires the supervision of the Court—any such contrivance seems to me to be condemned beforehand, because it has never yet occurred to any man or race, in any age or country, and by the nature of things it is foredoomed to failure. I confess I deeply regret that those parts of the Bill which refer to the purchase of land for the purpose of installing the peasantry as owners in some parts of Ireland have not received a greater development. I have regretted to see that as this Bill went on those parts have shrunk and shrunk in the importance and emphasis given them, till they are nothing but a tribute to the personal position of Mr. Bright. In that system there was far greater hope of the return of peace and prosperity to Ireland than in this strange plan of cultivating Ireland under the supervision of the Court. But, my Lords, we must consider the precise effect which the vote of this House of Parliament would have on the proceedings in and the state of Ireland. In discussing this matter, I am not advertising, even for a moment, to those foolish threats to which a Minister of the Crown did not think it beneath him to give vent last year in Parliament. As long as the House of Lords possesses prerogatives it must exercise them to the best of its conscience. The moment it ceases to do so it has practically ceased to exist. But there are things stronger than either the House of Lords or the House of Commons. The state of Ireland, the condition into which her population has been allowed to drift by the culpable laches of the Executive Government, is a consideration which must greatly govern us in deciding on the course we shall take. It is evident that, even if we rejected the Bill, we should have little or no influence on the dangers to which I recently adverted—namely, the apprehension which would continue to haunt the landowner, or the undoubtedly unjust hopes which would continue to animate the tenant. Knowing, as he does, that he has been able by his agitation to force the Government and the House of Commons on his side, he will not abstain from that agitation, because the House of Lords is not on his side also. But there is a more serious consideration still. If this Bill is rejected on the second reading we must, of course, remember that we have not in our hands the Executive Government. We have no hold over the principles, or the policy, or the methods by which they will enforce the reign of law and order in Ireland; and, judging from the spirit and the success with which they did it last winter, the prospects for next winter, especially if it be the interest, not of themselves—they are incapable of such a thing—but of their partizans, to represent the anarchy as the result of the action of the House of Lords—are gloomy indeed. It is impossible to exclude that circumstance altogether from consideration, or to forget how many of the landlord class, with all the industrious members of the community, now look anxiously to Parliament to find some solution which may bring about a respite, if only temporarily, to the sufferings and anarchy they are enduring. I confess, though with some reluctance, these considerations have led me to the belief that it may be wiser for us not to vote against the second reading of the Bill, but to see whether, in Committee, we cannot remove from it some of its most glaring acts of impolicy, some of its greatest injustices, and then leave the measure, thus divested of features and accretions which, perhaps, do not rightly belong to it, to the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. What I have not been able to conceal from myself during the passage of this Bill is that it corresponds little either with the promises made concerning it or the principles upon which it was supposed to be based. We are told that it is based on the difficulty of obtaining free contract in Ireland. Well, then, are you right in applying it to the richer tenantry? Still more, are you right in applying it to those leaseholders who would, of all persons in the world, have a perfect knowledge of the engagements they entered into in signing a deed, and who, if free contracts were ever to exist in Ireland, must be fit subjects for it? Again, we are told that this Bill is introduced because the tenant does all the improvements in Ireland. But, then, on the estates in which he does not do all the improvements is this Bill to apply? That is a subject your Lordships will do wisely to attend to in Committee. There is another, and a much larger, and a more vital question. Of course, I am not going now to dwell on all the improvements which I think it would be well to consider in Committee. But there is one vital subject which I hope the House will not forget, and which, unless it is solved in a reasonable manner, will taint this Bill with a stigma of injustice which nothing can remove. The noble Lord has told us, again and again, that none of the provisions of the Bill are to interfere with a fair rent. What security have we for that? What is there in the Bill to show that this Commission, which is invested with these unlimited powers, may not, if it thinks fit, take into consideration the amount given in the purchase of the holding when they are fixing a fair rent? There is no definition of fair rent given in the Bill. The noble Lord tells us that everybody knows nothing is easier than to fix it, that everybody knows what it is. I have no knowledge of Ireland; but I can say that that is not true of England. There is no subject on which neighbours in this country differ more keenly. Everybody connected with Quarter Sessions has constant experience of it. I had a case the other day at the Quarter Sessions with which I am connected. The witnesses who appeared gave the most violently opposite estimates of the value of the land and the amount of rent proper to be fixed on it. It was evident that the most honest difference of opinion was entertained by all in the neighbourhood of the holding. In this, as in other matters, people will be unconsciously guided by their own interest and that of their class. You are not, therefore, to suppose that this Land Commission will not feel, when settling a fair rent, this pressure of earth hunger which is supposed to overbear all the doctrines of political economy in some way or other. It seems to me a most serious danger indeed that the Court can be led, in considering the amount of a fair rent, to take into account the price—probably an exaggerated price—which the tenant has paid for his holding. When the tenant has paid that exaggerated price, and has got the fair rent reduced accordingly, at the next sale the price will rise because the rent is lower; and so, toties quoties, that process will go on until a considerable portion, if not the whole, of the landlord's interest disappears. If we had a Bill, perfect in all its parts, we might not be afraid of this result; but, knowing we have a Government before us which legislates by inadvertence, I exhort your Lordships to prevent any inadvertence by inflicting this great wrong on Irish landlords. These are some of the alterations which, I think, we may properly attempt when the Bill is in Committee. It will be time to judge of our future conduct with respect to the Bill when we have seen how far these alterations will be accepted when we shall be in Committee. In the meantime I, for one, shall give my vote for the second reading of the Bill, earnestly hoping that some of the anticipations of its authors may be realized, but not seeing myself, either in the provisions which it contains, or in the circumstances under which it has been introduced, any hope of that repose and that concord which Ireland so sorely needs.

[First Night.]

LORD O'HAGAN agreed with the noble Marquess that this Bill should be regarded as an important measure. He thought it was the most important measure that, since the time of the Union, had been conceded to Ireland. He thought it was a great measure in its conception, a measure complete in its details, and a measure which, if there was no great falling-off in the progress of it, would hereafter be for Ireland a blessing and benefit of a valuable character. He fully understood the difficulty the Government had in making a case for it, and the number of considerations which might actuate anyone in opposing it; but he had little hesitation in saying that when they came face to face with the objections that might be raised they would be easily disposed of. The noble Marquess had said that some of the clauses in reference to the purchase of land and the sale of it to peasant proprietors had shrunk in their progress through the House of Commons; but that was not correct, as they had, in his belief, been expanded.

[First Night.]

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY explained that he meant that the clauses in question had shrunk in comparison with the form in which they were foreshadowed.

LORD O'HAGAN retorted that if that was the meaning of the noble Marquess his own statement had shrunk wonderfully. He would ask the noble Marquess to consider whether he was justified in condemning this Bill when the greater part of it was based upon the Report of the Richmond Commission. What was the question which had been most in controversy? Why, the security of the tenant in his holding. Great stress had been laid upon the security of the tenant in his improvements, and it was for the good of agriculture and the produce of the country that those improvements should be secured to him. To do that it was necessary that there should be legislative interference to protect him from an arbitrary increase of rent. Such a proposition did not seem at all unnatural. The landlord now could raise the rent at any time as much as he pleased, and the Report of the Commission suggested that such an arbitrary power should be restrained by law, and the tenant be protected in that respect. Now, in the suggestions of the Report were involved those principles in the Bill which had been condemned by the noble Marquess. Then the noble Marquess complained of the composition of the Land Commission; but it was one worthy of commendation. He (Lord O'Hagan) did not know what Mr. Vernon was. He might be as good a Conservative as the noble Marquess. ["No, no!"] Well, he had not pronounced himself on either side. The question was—Were the Commissioners honest and capable men? He fully believed that they were. The Commission was a very good one, and should not be condemned. Passing from these matters, he would call attention to the great objects of the Bill. He had lived long in Ireland, and knew something of the feelings of the people, and he did not member any measure which had commanded such unanimity of support, without reference to Party and without reference to sect. The people supported the Bill because they saw it was being passed for their good. A great portion of the landed interest in Ireland supported the Bill. Indeed, the Conservative gentlemen of Ireland, long before this Bill was formulated, had come forward and asked that its principles should be the basis of legislation. The Bill had been accepted by the House of Commons and by the mass of the people of Ireland and he hoped it would become law. He admitted it was impossible that there should be judicial rents without a violation of the principles of political economy; but in reference to this they must remember that what suited one phase of society would not suit another. The people of Ireland almost exclusively depended upon the land for subsistence. The land was life with them; the work of its destruction. The Commission, maintained, was justified in saying that freedom of contract did not exist in Ireland; and, therefore, the ordinary principles of political economy could not be rightly applied to the present state of things in Ireland at the present time. Another objection entertained by the opponents of the Bill was that it would subject the landlords to certain losses. But he believed that, if it were administered conscientiously and honestly, material injury would be done to the landlords. If a fair rent was what a landlord exacted now he would lose nothing, for the tribunal by whom a judicial rent would be fixed would be with perfectly impartiality, and would not diminish that rent. He held that the restoration of content in Ireland would be a most beneficial change for the landlords; and if the effect of the Bill should be to regulate affairs in such a way to induce the payment of rent as determined by the Court, the landlords, instead of losing anything, would reap material profit. But the Bill undoubtedly did cause a loss. Landlords would no longer be able to do exactly what they pleased with their own. They would no longer be able to make advances, or to place one tenant here and displace another there. In fact, the amenities of landlordism would be lost to the landlords. But was not the p-sent condition of things already such as to limit the landlord's power? It was the landlords' boast that the power of eviction was exercised in a number of cases infinitesimally small, and that they had practically given up their power of eviction. Therefore, without the operation of the Bill, the landlords had of their own accord abandoned one of the amenities of their position. It was said that the landlord would have diminished power, though he might not have diminished wealth, and to most men the loss of power was not agreeable. But might it not be suggested that the course of events had already greatly shortened the landlord's aim, and limited the sphere of his old dominion? The Act of 1870 was undoubtedly inconsistent with the claims he would have made in former times, and those who were parties to that Act committed themselves to the principles by which the present Bill was justified. Then, might it not be asked whether, practically, the landlords of Ulster wielded less legitimate power because of the restraints of tenant right? He thought the answer must be in the negative, and so tend to diminish exaggerated fear of change. But might it not be said that Irish proprietors, and the vast majority of the Irish people, recognized an inevitable necessity for alteration in the territorial system of the country? That alteration would not be without its compensation if the new condition of things promoted peace and order. Establishing the supremacy of the law in the affection of the community, giving them a new sense of security, and a new impulse to industrial effort, would surely compensate for personal sacrifices of sentiment and pride. Another objection to the Bill, and one which prevailed to a great extent with society, was the supposition that if this Bill were passed for Ireland a similar measure must be passed for England. In fact, proximus ardet. It was forgotten by those who put forward this argument that the circumstances of the two countries were absolutely different; that they differed in history, traditions, and habits, and in the mode of living upon the land. In Ireland the alternative occupation was wanted which in England enabled men to deal fairly with their fellow-men upon a footing of perfect equality. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had stated in a pamphlet that the confiscations that had taken place in the past had no bearing on the present state of things. In this he differed from the noble Duke, for confiscations had produced a division of classes in Ireland, a dominant and servient class, and been a disturbing force in Irish affairs, which to this hour operated to the injury of the country. But confiscations should not alone be referred to in this connection. It was not merely confiscation, but the smothering of manufactures in Ireland which had produced the existing state of things. The noble Marquess had referred to that question in a touching speech which he delivered last Session. Manufactures in Ireland were destroyed. The commerce and trade of Ireland were destroyed. Thousands of families were thus at once deprived of their means of living. Ireland had never recovered from the effects of that black and dismal time. There was no fair reason for any English landed proprietor to fear that he would be subjected to any of the treatment to which Irish proprietors would be subjected under this Bill. But he wished to make this remark. When the Irish Church Disestablishment Act was passed the same kind of argument was used as their Lordships had heard that evening. It was said that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would lead to the disestablishment of the Church in England. But was there a man living who, in his conscience, believed that the Church established in England was a bit less strong for what had occurred in Ireland? Was there anyone who believed that the removal of that great abuse had not strengthened the Church of England? There were many in this country who, not agreeing in the doctrines of the Church of England, still regarded her as a serviceable breakwater against the infidelity which was now so widely prevalent. Those persons who held such opinions, if the question came to-morrow whether the Church of England should be disestablished or not, would strongly oppose her disestablishment. They might believe him that, to maintain wrong in Ireland, would not, in the least degree, prevent the doing wrong in England; neither would doing right in Ireland in the smallest degree affect the prosperity of England. Let them fear nothing except the unanswered cry for justice; let them fear only that neglected appeals for mercy would result in creating grievances which would operate largely to the evil of both countries. With respect to the actual proposals of the Bill, he would remark that it did not contain, as it was alleged to contain, the "three F's" pure and simple. It contained only two F's—fair rents and free sale. Fixity of tenure it did not confer; but it gave security of tenure. The Land Question was absolutely forced upon the attention of the Government. As to fair rents, it was all that the landlords themselves claimed, and the Bill could secure no less for the tenants. If the Party represented by the noble Marquess opposite had come into power, they could not have avoided legislation on the subject. There was a universal sentiment that the Land Act of 1870 had not fulfilled its office, and there was a feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction that in Ulster the rent was nibbled at, and then came the distress which culminated in the year 1880, making Ireland the centre of commiseration on the part of the civilized world. Of those sad circumstances the present measure was the outcome, and its authors should not be blamed for trying to make it adequate to the occasion, so comprehensive in its provisions and far-reaching in its efforts as to accomplish a permanent improvement, and, if possible, prevent further complaint and further agitation. He wished to quote the opinion on the subject of Mr. Kavanagh, a gentleman entitled to consideration, and who had proved his independence by refusing to join in the Report of the Bessborough Commission, and making a Report himself. In that Report he said—

Lord O'Hagan

[First Night.]

"The weight of evidence, however, has proved that the question of rent is at the bottom of every other, and is really, whether in the North or the South, the gist of the grievances which have caused much of the present dissatisfaction. I think the evidence suggests the conclusion that the Land Act as now in force does not afford sufficient protection to the tenants against the unjust exercise of the power to raise rents in unscrupulous hands; and although I admit that in adopting the suggestion of a system of arbitration for the settlement of disputes as to rents and other matters of valuation, I am endorsing an interference with rights of property and freedom of contract open to grave economical objections, and which to the great majority of landowners who have not abused their powers will, I have no doubt, appear unwarrantable, yet, having regard to the mischief which the unjust exercise of the power has occasioned, I can come to no other conclusion than that in any proposed alteration of present rents, whether at the instance of landlord or tenant, when the two parties cannot agree the question should be left to arbitration, with final reference, in the event of the arbitrators being unable to agree upon an umpire, to a Land Court or Commission which should be appointed for that and other purposes."

That was the opinion of a gentleman beyond all impeachment, a man thoroughly acquainted with Ireland, a man of large property, and who gave his entire attention to the ample evidence which was laid before the Commission. That Commission examined some 150 landlords and agents, and some 500 tenant farmers. He would also like to call attention to a Conservative meeting which was held in Armagh before the present Bill was formulated, at which Sir James Stronge presided, and at which Mr. Maxwell Close was present, where they actually passed resolutions proposing arbitration with regard to rents, and thus foreshadowing what was afterwards embodied in the Bill. Taking into consideration the recommendations of the two Commissions, he asked the House whether a stronger case was ever presented in support of legislation than had been made out now? The case of fair rents had been sustained by Mr. Kavanagh, by the Conservative gentry of Ulster, and the Liberal gentry of Ireland. If they admitted that a case for fair rents had been made out, free sale followed as a necessary consequence. There had existed at all times in Ireland an understanding which amounted to a practical rule that the tenant had a vested interest in his holding never claimed or conceded in England. At Common Law a tenant from year to year had a perfect right to sell, and unless that right was taken away by contract or custom, that right was as good as any other in the world. It was said that this right was injurious to the worth of a farm—that it took away the capital which a man ought to invest in his farm. The tenant farmers in Ulster understood their interests and their rights as well as any people in the world, and if there was anything they valued as the apple of their eye it was the possession of this tenant right of Ulster. It had been truly said by a gentleman who gave evidence before a Committee of their Lordships that if the tenant right of Ulster was assailed, all the force at the disposal of the Horse Guards would not suffice to keep Ulster down or to preserve the peace in that Province. Why, then, should the advantages of free sale not follow upon a fair rent? He rejoiced that in one matter they were agreed. He rejoiced to find that the noble Marquess desired to see created in Ireland a yeomanry fixed in the soil. Nothing was more desired by the people themselves. For many years he had longed to see the day when that might come, and that the chasm between wealth and poverty should be bridged over. It was desirable that they should have a yeomanry as England had, happy in their hearths and homes, and faithful to the Constitution. Whatever assaults might be made on other parts of the Bill, he hoped this would be left unassailed, as it was, he believed, unassailable. Then they might hope to see a body of people planted in the soil, giving hostages to fortune, and bound by interest as well as duty to maintain law and order, and promote the public peace. He looked upon this Bill as a great measure, vast in its conceptions, complete in its details, and certain to confer hereafter the greatest blessings on Ireland. The House would not reject, and he begged them not to emasculate it. He did not think that the Government could regard it as a mere measure of Land Reform; he thought it was an honest effort for the redemption of a people. Fortune had been wayward to Ireland for many dismal centuries; but if the Irish tenant were placed under just laws—under a law such as this measure would enact—he would play his part nobly in the battle of life. Ireland had already achieved many things—she had achieved religious equality, extended civil rights, and diffused education; and now, he was happy to see, it was proposed to give her an opportunity of securing for her sons a higher education. All these things were desirable; but the passing of this Bill would give Ireland great material advantages; it would remove a secret scourge, and make Irishmen loyal and happy.

Lord O'Hagan

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, it was impossible to listen to the speech of the noble and learned Lord who has just addressed the House without feeling that he was convinced of the necessity and of the justice of this measure. In the eloquent peroration with which he concluded he has told us that we have only to pass this Bill in order to make Irishmen loyal and happy. My Lords, if eloquent perorations could regenerate a nation, Ireland would be the most prosperous and the most contented part of the United Kingdom. Your Lordships will, however, excuse me if I pass from the peroration of the noble and learned Lord to the dry details of the Bill which we are about to discuss.

The first impression which that Bill produces on the mind of the reader is that it is one of the most composite measures ever submitted to Parliament. Now, I do not wish to complain of that. The circumstances of Irish land tenure are so various in their character that a certain amount of variety and elasticity are indispensable in any measure intended to deal with them. Elasticity, however, is one thing, and inconsistency is another; and it certainly appears to me that there is something approaching to inconsistency, if not to antagonism, between the earlier and the later provisions of this Bill. On the one hand, Her Majesty's Government propose to offer large inducements to the tenantry of Ireland to become proprietors of their holdings. That is a proposal which entirely commends itself to my judgment. I approve of it for many reasons: by conferring upon a large number of the peasantry of Ireland the position and the responsibilities of ownership, you will at once encourage them to thrift and industry, and you will besides accustom them to the idea that their success or failure in their vocation depends upon themselves, and that they must look to their own exertions rather than to the assistance of their landlords or of the State, if they intend to surmount the difficulties which they have to encounter. Nothing will add so much to the stability of the social system in Ireland as a large addition to the number of owners of land in that country; nothing will do so much to prevent recurrent demands for extreme legislation, and the expectation that those demands are to be satisfied by the introduction of a new Land Bill once in every ten years.

I will make one observation only with regard to this part of the Government measure. These new proprietors who will come into existence under the Purchase Clauses will, it may fairly be assumed, in some cases not care to occupy their holdings or to work their land themselves. In this event they will let their farms, and thus the relation of landlord and tenant will re-arise. Now, I observe that all tenancies created after the passing of this Act are to be "future" tenancies, and that the tenants of such future tenancies are not to enjoy the same privileges of access to the Court and protection from exorbitant rents which the Bill accords to tenancies already in existence. This being so, I should like to ask your Lordships whether it is quite clear that these new landlords will prove fit to be trusted with an amount of liberty which you altogether deny to the present race of landlords? I confess that our experience of the conduct of Irish tenants, when any accident places them in the position of landlords over sub-tenants of their own, does not inspire me with much confidence that they will use wisely the discretion which you are ready to intrust to them, but with which you will not intrust the persons who are at this moment owners of Irish estates.

[First Night.]

I must, however, admit that, in my opinion, this danger, if it exists, is not a very imminent one. I doubt extremely whether we are likely to be confronted with a very large number of these new proprietors, and for this reason—While you are, with one hand, offering to the Irish tenants these facilities for acquiring the fee simple of their farms, you are, with the other hand, strengthening their position as tenants to such an extent that there will be little, if any, inducement to them to give up that position for the position of proprietor. Why, I would ask the House, should one of these men submit, as he will probably have to do, to an addition to his rent for 35 years, why should he substitute for a landlord from whom he has a good deal to hope and very little to fear the stern and inexorable landlordism of the State, merely in order that at the end of those 35 years his successors may have a chance of becoming owners of the fee simple of the land? The two proposals, my Lords, appear to me to be in opposition to each other. Her Majesty's Government are running two horses, and cannot win with both. It would be interesting to know upon which of the two they really rely. I have observed lately that whenever any suggestion is made with the object of accelerating or simplifying the operation of the Purchase Clauses, a cry is raised that the public purse is in danger, and that we must be very careful what we are about. I draw my own conclusion from these facts; it is to the effect that the real proposals of the Government are to be found in those clauses which deal with the question of tenure, and that the scheme for creating small proprietors is likely to prove little more than a sterile expression of those uncharitable feelings towards large proprietors which some Members of the Ministry have never cared to conceal.

I will, therefore, my Lords, with the permission of the House, say a few words with regard to the proposals of the Government on the question of tenure. I confess that those proposals appear to me to be open to suspicion, both on account of the circumstances under which they are made, and on account of the arguments which have been used in their support. And, first of all, I desire to raise my protest against the argument that this Bill is a legitimate development of the Act of 1870. This Bill, my Lords, is no development of the Act of 1870. It is the repudiation of the Act of 1870 by the Ministers who were its authors. We are told that, in assenting to the 3rd section of that Act, we unconsciously committed ourselves to the principle of this Bill; we are told that that clause conferred upon the tenants of Ireland, if not a proprietary right in their holdings, at all events something which was undistinguishable from such a right. I own that I am filled with alarm when I contemplate these unconscious exercises of our predatory instincts. I venture, however, to submit to your Lordships that this theory is not one which will bear examination. We passed the 3rd clause of the Act of 1870 not inadvertently, but with a full knowledge of what we were about. Allow me to remind the House of the facts. Parliament, it is true, consented to confer upon the tenants a right to compensation for "disturbance" over and above anything which they could claim on account of improvements; but in doing so it imposed two limits, distinctly expressed, upon the concession. In the first place, we limited it to the smaller tenants, on whose behalf a special and, to my mind, irresistible appeal was made to us. They were the men of whom the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) spoke to us with so much feeling and sympathy a few nights ago—the men whom the neglect or mismanagement of our predecessors brought into their present position. To those men a mere payment for their scanty improvements, often valueless in fact, but perhaps representing the toil of years, would be no consolation for the loss of their homes, miserable though those homes might be, and for this reason their case was specially dealt with. That was the first limit; but there was a second and not less important one. These tenants were to be entitled to this compensation only in those cases where they were arbitrarily removed from their holdings by the landlord, so that the payment which was to be a solatium to the tenant was to be also a deterrent to the landlord, who would find that a capricious exercise of his rights would involve him in considerable expense. I believe there is no doubt as to the historical accuracy of this account. It is confirmed by the fact that the scale of compensation is to be explained on no other assumption. The sum which the tenant can claim under that scale varies inversely with the size of his holding; in other words, the landlord has to make the heaviest payment where the tenant's interest is presumably least valuable, but where the temptation to obliterate the holding is presumably greatest. That was the arrangement of 1870, and I believe we entered into it knowing perfectly what we were about. If, however, there is any doubt on this point, I will remind your Lordships of what was then said in "another place" by the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack, then Sir Roundell Palmer, who certainly appreciated very clearly the nature of the proposals which were then under discussion. Sir Roundell Palmer, my Lords, speaking on the 4th of April, 1870, of this 3rd clause, used these words—

"I must express my opinion that in giving this compensation the most extreme caution is required, because unless in its practical application you keep the principle within proper limits, and accompany it with all reasonable checks, it will become an invasion of all the rights of property."—[3 Hansard, cc. 1211.]

What were the limits, then, in the noble and learned Lord's contemplation? He proceeded to describe them—

"If," he said, "there is a tenant from year to year of 500 acres at £2 an acre, that tenant cannot receive notice to quit without being enabled to call upon his landlord to pay him a year's rent under this new scale. Well, Sir, that is perfectly extravagant."—[Ibid. 1214.]

And further on he continued—

"I am satisfied, from all I have heard of Ireland, that tenancies of land, valued at £50 a-year and upwards, are not tenancies of the class which requires this extraordinary legislation. I am convinced that we may safely except them altogether from the Bill."—[Ibid. 1215.]

That, my Lords, was the opinion of the noble and learned Lord in 1870. The two limits were clearly expressed then; both of them are swept away now. The proprietary rights conceded by this Bill are conferred indiscriminately upon all tenants large and small; the landlord is deprived of the power of capriciously removing his tenant, and as the tenant's right to claim compensation in a contingency which cannot arise will be valueless, that conditional and contingent claim is converted into a substantive right saleable by the tenant, and, as I shall show your Lordships, realized by him to the ultimate detriment of the landlord's interest in his estate.

There is another argument to which I would refer in this connection. We are told that the Land Act of 1870 has proved a failure, and that new legislation has been rendered necessary, owing to the alterations to which that Act was subjected at the instance of the landlord party, and notably owing to the mutilations which it underwent at your Lordships' hands. Now, I should like to say a few words as to these alterations and mutilations. I cannot, of course, enter upon an examination of every Amendment which was made in the Bill during its passage, but I will take three of the points upon which most stress is laid by those who insist upon this theory. In the first place, it was, no doubt, the original intention of Her Majesty's Government, as expressed in the Prime Minister's speech in moving the first reading of the Bill, that the limit below which no tenant should be allowed to contract himself out of its benefit should stand at £100. That limit was, we are told, lowered to £50. This change was, it is true, not made in your Lordships' House; but it is represented as having been the work of what is spoken of as the landlord party elsewhere. Now, what are the facts? I observe, on reference to the Reports of what took place in the other House, that £50 was the limit which the Government, through the mouth of the Lord Privy Seal, then Mr. Chichester Fortescue, themselves suggested as that above which "perfect freedom of contract" ought as a matter of justice to be allowed to the parties. There was no discussion and no resistance. The change of the limit affected no more than 24,000 out of the 600,000 occupiers of land in Ireland, and those 24,000 were the very men whom the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack described in the debates from which I have already quoted as being men of a "Superior class who had no moral claim to be relieved from the contracts which they might make," and whose inclusion in the Bill would constitute an "invasion of all the rights of property."

[First Night.]

The second "mutilation" was one which occurred in your Lordships' House. It had reference to the tenant's right of assignment. Every tenant had, as we are all aware, at Common Law, a right of assigning his interest in his holding. As, however, the landlord had also the right of refusing to accept the assignee, it is evident that the tenant's right was merely technical and of no practical value to him. Your Lordships finding that, under the provisions of the Bill, the assignee might put forward a claim to be compensated if the landlord refused to accept him, inserted an Amendment to the effect that he should not be entitled to compensation, or, in other words, that he should not be regarded as having been capriciously disturbed by the landlord, unless the landlord had first agreed to accept him as tenant. Now, it was objected to this Amendment that in some cases, where, for instance, assignment without the landlords' consent had been usual, the assignee might have some cause for complaint if he were absolutely precluded from compensation, and accordingly a suggestion was made that the operation of the Amendment should be limited to estates upon which it was the clearly established custom not to permit assignment without the concurrence of the landlord. From the manner in which the action of your Lordships in regard to this provision has been criticized, I own that I was under the impression that the suggestion which I have described had proceeded from some ingeniously minded Peer on the opposite side of the House. On reference, however, to the records, I find that the suggestion came from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), who made the proposal without a word of protest, and apparently as affording, in his opinion, a perfectly just and equitable solution of the difficulty.

I will refer to one more case of alleged mutilation. When the Bill came up to your Lordships it contained a clause under which the Court was empowered to allow the tenant compensation for disturbance upon "special grounds," even though he might be evicted for non-payment of rent, and, therefore, prima facie, not entitled to such compensation. This clause your Lordships undoubtedly amended: you struck out the reference to "special grounds," and you inserted words to the effect that compensation, where the eviction was for non-payment, should be given only where the landlord had allowed arrears of rent to accumulate over the tenant's head for more than three years, or where the Court should be of opinion that the rent itself was an exorbitant one. Now, your Lordships, perhaps, imagine that this alteration was imposed upon the Government, and accepted by them reluctantly, and under protest. Nothing of the sort. When the matter was under discussion the noble and learned Lord who was then and is now Chancellor for Ireland rose in his place, and explained that these cases were not only the sort of cases, but that they were the only cases for which the Government had intended to provide, and thereupon, at the instance of the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns), and with the full concurrence of the Government, the clause was amended so as to make it point directly at these two cases. These, my Lords, are the moleheaps out of which mountains of argument are constructed. The statement is repeated until it obtains belief, and the public is persuaded that your Lordships deliberately spoiled a great measure which would have worked well if it had passed in the shape in which you received it. I trust it will not be forgotten that these three acts of mutilation, which are the stock-in-trade of those who have adopted this theory, were carried out with the full and expressed approval of a Triumvirate consisting of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, the noble

Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. It is also not unworthy of remark that very little was heard of those mutilations until after the outbreak of the agitation now prevailing in Ireland, and after the Government had determined to abandon their old lines and to make a new departure in legislating as to Irish land. A few months ago the country was described by the Prime Minister as being in a condition of unexampled prosperity: the Peace Preservation Acts were not renewed—not a word was said as to the necessity of a revolution in the Land Laws. It is only when the disorder of the country, after being allowed to run on unchecked, becomes intolerable, that we make this opportune discovery, and find out that whatever goes wrong on the other side of St. George's Channel is due to half-a-dozen insignificant Amendments made ten years ago in the Irish Land Bill. Arguments of this kind, my Lords, are used for the purpose of bolstering up a weak case. Ministers arrive at a hasty conclusion; they allow their hand to be forced, and then, desiring to justify their action, they catch at any pretext, at any plausible theory, in their endeavour to justify the position into which they have allowed themselves to drift.

My Lords, I am certainly not one of those who believe that the settlement of 1870 was a perfect settlement. It was, I believe, imperfect in many respects. With regard to one point, I entirely share the opinion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Bessborough) and his Colleagues. It seems to me that where landlord and tenant are unable to agree upon a mere question of rent it should be possible for either to appeal to the Court for its arbitration, without first compelling the landlord, as he is now compelled, to put an end to the tenancy, so as to bring the question before the Court as a question of compensation to the tenant for his loss on quitting his holding. That is a point which requires consideration, and there are, no doubt, many others; but remember this—we are not asked to remove blots and imperfections in the existing system, but to substitute for it an entirely new one; and I own that I am wholly unable to see why, because a few such blots have been discovered, why, because the Bessborough Commission have brought to light a few more or less apocryphal cases of misconduct on the part of the landlords, whom the Prime Minister has acquitted as a whole, we are to concede to the tenants of Ireland those "three F's," which, until a few weeks ago, every Minister sitting on the Bench below me regarded as outside the possibilities of Irish legislation.

The fact is, my Lords, that this is not an attempt to remove imperfections from the existing law. It is an attempt to quell an agrarian rebellion by the wholesale concession of proprietary rights to the peasantry of Ireland—a concession which has been extorted by violence and agitation. These rights you are asked to create: do not let us be deluded into the belief that we are merely going to recognize and legalize something which exists already. The Lord Privy Seal says that the concession is called for, because the Irish tenants have executed improvements on their holdings; but you are asked to concede the same privileges even if the tenant has never expended 6d. upon the permanent improvement of his farm. The Lord Privy Seal, unintentionally, no doubt, took us into his confidence as to these improvements, upon which he rests his case. He told us, in the speech to which we have just listened, that the improvements in Ireland "had almost all to be done," and the buildings "almost all to be built." What, then, becomes of the argument founded on the tenant's improvements? But the Lord Privy Seal referred, also, to the general prevalence of local customs as favouring the contention that the tenant had a quasi-proprietary right. I was under the impression that those local customs were adequately protected under the existing law; but, be that as it may, this Bill gives free sale to every tenant in Ireland, whether a local custom does or does not prevail in the district, and, which is the hardest case of all, even where the tenant's interest under such a custom has been bought and extinguished by the landlord at the express invitation of the Legislature, as declared in the 1st section of the Act of 1870.

I should like your Lordships to consider for a moment what are the factors in this saleable right which we are about to confer upon the tenants. They are obviously two—the rent at which he will hold his farm, and the term during which it is red to him. The rent is, I observe, "a fair rent;" and I presume no one objects to that. I must admit that this part of the Bill has been greatly improved by the omission of some of the words which it originally contained. The general direction given to the Court to consider all the circumstances of the case, holding, district, is, I think, a sufficient one; I regret that to that direction should have been added another to the effect that the Court is also to "have regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." These are plausible words; but, in my opinion, they have no meaning, full of ambiguity. Take, in the first place, the reference to the landlord's interest. The Lords, I am sure, will be grateful for the admission that they have an interest; but I should like to know how the Court could possibly determine the value of a holding without reference to the landlord's interest? The reference to the landlord's interest is mischievous surplusage; but it is mischievous surplusage, for the words are made an excuse for directing the Court to have no reference in fixing the rent to the tenant's interest; and, unless I am much mistaken, this direction will be regarded as mandatory on the Court to reduce a rent which may originally have been a perfectly reasonable one—in order to protect and keep alive the newly created interest which this Bill gives to the tenant and which, judging from past experience, will, in many instances, be inflated to a very extravagant amount.

[First Night.]

I will not, however, press this point further, and I will pass to the term which the tenant is to be secured in his holding. I heard with great pleasure the frank admission of the Lord Privy Seal that he "was not ashamed of the 'three F's.'" I wish that frankness had been used throughout by his Colleagues, and that we had had a little less of those ingenious distinctions between fixity of tenure and the very little f" of which the Prime Minister admitted the existence, and of the difference between perpetuity of tenure on the one hand, and continuity and durability of tenure on the other. The extenuations are ominous for the future, when we consider that they are uttered by the statesman who may be regarded as the inventor of the germ theory in politics, and whose colossal ingenuity was able to discover in the moderate legislation of 1870 the principles of the Bill now before the House. The motives, however, of those who talk of "little f's," and who otherwise extenuate the concessions of the Bill, are obvious enough. The extenuations serve a double object—they serve to vindicate the consistency of the Ministry, most of whom have, at one time or another, demonstrated the injustice and the impracticability of these very concessions; and they serve, also, this purpose—that in whatever proportion Ministers are able to minimize the concessions which they are making to the tenants, in the same proportion they are able to minimize the claims which may be put forward by the landlords, at whose expense those concessions are to be made, to be compensated for the loss which they will sustain. My Lords, that which this Bill gives to the tenant is perpetuity of tenure, subject to revision of rent at intervals of 15 years; we are told that the landlord is to have the power of resumption, and that resumption is inconsistent with perpetuity. What is the landlord's power of resumption under this Bill? It arises when the tenant wishes to sell, or when he has violated the statutory conditions, or when, after 15 years, the landlord can satisfy the Court that it is for the interest of the holding or estate that he should resume upon full payment to the tenant of any compensation which the Court may consider to be due. As far as I am aware, none of the advocates of fixity of tenure ever proposed that the tenant should retain his holding, whether he paid his rent or not, whether he burned his land or not, whether he wished to sell his interest or not. Those who deny the existence of fixity of tenure in this Bill first attach to that expression a sense which no one ever attached to it, and then, having shown that the provisions of the Bill do not give fixity in their sense of the word, they proceed to argue that there is no fixity in the measure. These refinements upon the meaning of words may be an agreeable intellectual exercise to those who indulge in them; but no one is deceived by them. The landlords are not quite so foolish as to be misled by them; the tenants are quick witted enough to take them for what they are worth.

The English public will, at any rate, have no one but itself to blame if it misapprehends what is taking place, for on the day after the Prime Minister had delivered his elaborate disquisition upon the difference between durability and perpetuity of tenure, two of the leading organs of Liberal opinion took him to task—the first congratulating him on the “exquisite felicity of his language,” but pointing out to its readers that it was “nothing much higher than a play upon words without any very practical issue;” the second mildly reproving him for what it termed his “needlessly candid deterioration of the measure.”

And now, my Lords, I will, with your permission, say a few words as to the position in which this Bill will leave the two parties whom it affects. Let us, in the first place, consider the position of the tenants: it may, I think, be disposed of in a few words. The advantages which this Bill confers will be limited to the tenants already upon the land, who will be liberally endowed and given the power of selling that which they never bought. The future race, who will in process of time replace these, will gain no such advantage. They will pay two rents, one to the landlord and another to their predecessors; and they will, in too many cases, be driven into the arms of the local usurers and money lenders, whose authority will, to a large extent, replace that of the landlords. These seem to me to be the obvious consequences of the Bill. That it will be to the advantage of the existing tenants only is admitted by a high authority on these matters, the Colleague of the noble Earl, Baron Dowse, the agricultural Commissioner. “The people,” says Baron Dowse—the remark is one which he interpolated during the examination of a witness before the Bessborough Commission—“who require protection are those that are in, not those that are out.” Everything, in other words, is to give way to present convenience. We have all heard the saying, “Posterity never did anything for me, why should I do anything for posterity;” and we have always understood that the words were those of a distinguished but unknown Irishman. Is it possible that the author of the aphorism is at last revealed to us in the person of the learned Member of the Bessborough Commission? Such will be the position in which this Bill will leave the tenants of Ireland—a position which those who are fortunate enough to be in occupation of land when this Bill passes will, no doubt, find extremely advantageous to their pockets. I leave it to your Lordships to judge how far, if we look to the ulterior effects of the measure, the tenants are likely to be benefited by it.

And now, my Lords, let us pass from the tenant to the landlord, and consider how he will be affected by the change. By this Bill, in the first place you deprive the landlord of two of the principal attributes of ownership—the right of determining whether he will or will not let his own land, and the right of selecting the person to whom he wishes to let it. The owner of a farm may in past years have let the land for 30s. an acre. He may be willing and glad to let it at that rate; under this Bill he is liable to be told that, whether he likes it or not, he is to let it at 20s., even though he may much prefer to retain it in his own hands rather than part with it upon such terms. When this Bill has become law, any tenant who happens to be in occupation of a farm may dispose of it for the best price which he can obtain to some person in whose selection the landlord has neither voice nor part. Even the stony hearts of the Bessborough Commissioners are a little touched at the hardship of the step. The Commissioners say—

“The right of free sale, even more than fixity of tenure, interferes with the landlord’s right of control over his property, in respect of his power to choose the tenants by whom he is surrounded, and to surround himself with those whom he prefers. It renders him liable to the intrusion of a tenant to whom he may have a strong personal objection, unless that objection should fall within the definition, as interpreted by the tribunal, of a reasonable veto.”—[Report of Bessborough Commission, par. 77.]

The Commissioners conclude by the observation—a somewhat wonderful one—that the right in question “is not calculated to lessen the value of the landlord’s property.”

We shall, perhaps, hear that the landlord has his remedy either in the exercise of the veto accorded to him, or in that of his right of pre-emption. The exercise of the right of pre-emption means that he will have to pay 20 or 30 years’ purchase of the rent for the sake of buying back his own estate, probably making enemies of half the country side into the bargain. As for the veto, that, in a large number of cases, will be absolutely valueless. The purchaser may be a person unknown to the landlord; he may come from a district notoriously disaffected; he may be a returned American, with ideas of his own as to the use and abuse of revolvers. How is the landlord to discover his antecedents, or to produce proof of them in Court, unless he is prepared to attach to the estate a sort of private inquiry office for the investigation of the character and circumstances of every intending purchaser? My Lords, it is a singular circumstance that this proposal to substitute for the selection of the landlord selection according to the length of the incoming tenant's purse comes to us from Ministers who, 10 years ago, abolished purchase in the Army, in order to substitute selection in its place; who, 10 years hence, will very likely abolish purchase in the Church; and who are the ardent advocates of promotion by merit in every Profession and every branch of the Public Service. Perhaps I shall be told that there is a wide difference between the case of the officer and the case of the farmer. I admit it; but that difference appears to me to be this—that the officer did not require the capital which he paid for his commission in order to serve the Queen efficiently, whereas the Irish farmer unquestionably does require his capital—which he will henceforward have to pay away for the goodwill of the farm—in order to cultivate it with success.

I say, then, that the change which we are about to make will deprive the landlords of two valuable incidents which have hitherto belonged to the ownership of land; and, if this be so, it must lead to a large diminution in the value of every estate in Ireland. I should like to notice, at this point, a statement that has been made—one, I think, of the most extraordinary of the many extraordinary statements made in support of this measure—that the Land Act of 1870 raised the selling value of property in Ireland, and that this Bill, which goes much further than the Act of 1870, is likely to lead to a further increase in the price of land in that country. My Lords, it might well have been the case that the price of land had risen after the year 1870. We had immediately afterwards more than one very prosperous season. Again, several of the estates sold in the following years were let at very low rents, and, consequently, fetched a large number of years' purchase of the rental. Nor must we forget that the settlement of 1870 was accepted at the time as final, and that a sense of security likely to be reflected in the land mart was thereby created. Under such circumstances, even if the prices fetched by land in the years which succeeded 1870 had been higher than the prices of the preceding years, I should have been slow to admit that the legislation of that year was the cause of the rise. I should have questioned the conclusion; but, unluckily, not only is the conclusion questionable, but the premisses themselves are defective. It is not the fact that after the passing of the Act of 1870 there was a general increase in the price fetched by the estates sold in the Landed Estates Court. I hold in my hand Returns which are on the Table of the House, and which bear out my statements. They have reference to three periods—the first includes the three years, 1867, 1868, 1869; the second the years 1872, 1873, 1874; the third the years 1875 and 1876. There is, therefore, one period prior to the passing of the Land Act, and two periods subsequent to that date. Now, what is the conclusion to be drawn from these Returns? Taking the four Provinces separately, I find that in Ulster the price of land remained stationary during the three periods. In Munster it rose slightly during the second period, and fell in the third below the level at which it stood in the first. In Leinster it fell in the second and third periods considerably below the level of the first; and in Connaught alone it rose both in the second and in the third periods. If we take individual years we find that in Ulster the lowest year of the whole eight was 1872, and in the three other Provinces 1873; both years being subsequent to the passing of the Act. Whatever conclusion these figures may justify, they do not justify the conclusion that the effect of the Act of 1870 was to increase the selling value of land in Ireland.

The Land Act of 1870, my Lords, diminished the value of land in Ireland; and this Bill, if it becomes law, will diminish it still further. How can it do otherwise? We are going to divide that which until now has been the property of a single person between that person and another, and having divided it we are going to say to the one—"The value of your share shall be closely restricted and confined by a tribunal to which we are going to hand you over," and to the other—"You shall be free to dispose of your share to the highest bidder in the open market." Is it conceivable that under such conditions the share of the former will not diminish and the share of the latter increase in value? Upon this point there is a complete concurrence of testimony. We may question the evidence collected by the Bessborough Commission, but as to this at least it is conclusive, that in the tenant right districts every rise of rent, no matter how moderate, is regarded as an infringement of the tenant's interest. Wherever you have tenant right there you will find that, on the one hand, the right of the landlord to profit by a rise of prices is denied; while, on the other, if the prices fall it is expected that the loss should be met out of the landlord's rent, and not out of the tenant's share in the enterprize. Nor is this a new discovery—it was clearly asserted by the Devon Commissioners. They saw that the existence of these customs must lead to the absorption of a large part of the landlord's interest in their estates, and these are the words in which they warned the landlords of the danger with which they were threatened—

"It is difficult," they said, "to deny that the effect of this system is a practical assumption by the tenant of a joint proprietorship in the land, although those landlords who acquiesce in it do not acknowledge to themselves this broad fact, and that the tendency is gradually to convert the proprietor into a mere rent-charger having an indefinite and declining annuity on the lord of a copyhold."—[Digest, Vol. I, p. 2.]

That, my Lords, is a fair description of the system which we are asked to create all over Ireland, even upon the estates of those proprietors who have submitted to every sacrifice sooner than tolerate such a system; and I say that the introduction of such a system, followed by the consequences which are inseparable from it, must tend to deprive the ownership of land of the incidents which have hitherto rendered it attractive, and must, therefore, diminish the number of persons who will hereafter desire to acquire that ownership. If that is the result, as I believe it must be, of the passing of the Bill, it will follow that the saleable value of every acre of land in Ireland will be largely reduced.

This is, however, not the only consequence of the Bill in so far as it will affect the landlord's position. There remains the important question of improvements. I do not wish to delay the House by a discussion of the extent to which Irish landlords have improved their estates. The point is, I know, a much controverted one. I am ready to admit that in many parts of the country the number and small size of the holdings renders it impossible that the improvements should be generally carried out by the landlord. On the other hand, if it is true, as has been stated by some persons, that it is only upon one-tenth of the area of Ireland that the landlords have been in the habit of making improvements, we must guard ourselves against assuming that upon the other nine-tenths the tenants have done what was necessary for the proper maintenance and cultivation of the farms. My own impression is that in many places the improvements are either executed by the landlord or not executed at all; and certainly if you exclude the badly executed works and improvements scarcely worthy of the name, and confine your consideration to properly executed works of an exemplary character, you will find that the abstention of the landlords would have been in the past a very serious misfortune. That abstention is, however, what, in the opinion of the Bessborough Commission, we have to look forward to in the future. The result, they say, will be—

"To discourage still further if not to extinguish their (the landlords') expenditure upon the soil of land not in their own occupation. Evidence has been tendered us showing that sums have been and still are being expended by landlords in works on their estate. The cessation to any extent of this expenditure will be an evil."—[Report of Bessborough Commission, par. 57.]

The extent of that evil we are able to appreciate when we read in the evidence of Professor Baldwin and in the Report of the minority of the Bessborough Commissioners a description of the miserable condition into which Irish agriculture has fallen in the remoter districts—a condition from which I believe it can be raised only by the efforts and the example of those improving landlords whose existence is denied, but who have done so much for the advancement of their country. I own, my Lords, that I am filled with concern when I contemplate in anticipation the position of helplessness and uselessness into which the landlords are likely to be reduced by this Bill. I read the other day in the report of the proceedings of a society of entomologists that there is a species of wasp which is in the habit of feeding its young upon the bodies of other insects, generally those of a large grasshopper. These wasps have discovered that their victims, if killed outright, are apt to decay and to become worthless. They have accordingly, by a marvellous effort of instinct, hit upon the expedient of stinging them in such a manner as, without actually killing them, to deprive them of all power of movement. In this miserable condition they languish until they are required for consumption. That, my Lords, is the condition into which the Irish landlords will, I fear, be driven by their persecutors. It will, I am sure, be a consolation to your Lordships to know that the distinguished naturalist who conducted these researches found that, even after the treatment I have described, the victims retained some power of digestion, and that he was able to prolong their lives considerably by feeding them on syrup. Let us hope that in their last days the landlords will be equally fortunate in the treatment which they will experience.

It is not, however, possible to appreciate the effects of this measure merely by an examination of the manner in which it will affect one or other of the classes engaged in agriculture. The subject has, perhaps, been too often discussed from the exclusive standpoint of either landlord or tenant. I admit freely that Parliament would be justified in sacrificing the interests of every landlord in Ireland if it was demonstrable that the sacrifice would be for the general advantage of the community. The landlords are, perhaps, not culpable if, persuaded as they are of the wrong which you are about to do them, they place their case before the public. Within these walls, however, it is our duty to take a wider view, and, endeavouring to take such a view; I would ask the House to consider the consequences of this legislation, as they will affect the peace and contentment of Ireland, and the well-being and prosperity of Irish society. What, my Lords, will be the position in which this Bill will leave that country? From one end of it to the other there will not be a sod of land—with the exception of a few demesnes and grazing farms—of which any human being will be able to say, "That land is mine." You bequeath to the future a legacy of confusion more inextricable than any which has yet distracted that unfortunate country. No landlord will be able to say what is the value of his estate; no tenant will be able to determine beforehand the value of his interest in his farm. You throw down as an apple of discord the whole of the soil of Ireland to be struggled for by rivals who are already too ready to fly at each other's throats. You say to the landlord, "Keep what you can;" and to the tenant, "Take what you can get." How will your new system work? On the one hand is the tenant ready, as we are aware, to pay an extravagant price for the possession of a farm; on the other is the landlord, knowing that in the long run the payment of that price will diminish the value of his estate. Between the two will be the Court endeavouring to hold the balance. One of two things will happen—the extravagant price will be paid, the landlord will be saddled with an insolvent tenant, and the holding with a charge which will dominate and ultimately eat into the landlord's rent, or the Court will, at the landlord's instance, intervene and frustrate the transaction. It can do so by allowing the landlord to raise the rent, or by empowering him to exercise his right of pre-emption. In the one case he will commit the very action for the commission of which the landlords have been over and over again held up to public obloquy. To demand an increased rent at the moment of a sale of the tenant right is, in the eyes of an Irish farmer, the most heinous offence which an Irish landlord can commit. In the other he will be placed in the position of saying to the outgoing tenant who is the vendor—"It is quite true that you have an offer of £500 for your interest, but I, to suit my own convenience, require you to part for £300 with that for which you are able to obtain the larger sum." How will the outgoing tenant and his friends and neighbours receive such a decision on the part of the Court? And yet, my Lords, that is the sedative which Her Majesty's Government are going to apply to a country on the verge of rebellion, that is the panacea with which they expect to quell the turbulence of Limerick and Tipperary, and to relieve the chronic discontent of Galway and Mayo.

The Marquess of Lansdowne

My Lords, whenever these arguments are used, we are referred to the case of Ulster, and we are told triumphantly, as the Lord Privy Seal has told us to-night, that none of these things happen in Ulster, and that in that Province all is prosperity and contentment. I never listen to the Ulster argument without admiring the manner in which those who use it are able to look with one eye at all the facts which fit in with their own theory, and shut out from the vision of the other every circumstance which does not. Portions of Ulster are, no doubt, in remarkable contrast to the rest of Ireland in regard to the prosperity and loyalty of the population. But are there no differences between the circumstances of Ulster and those of the other Provinces? Are there no differences of race, of religion, of climate? Does not Ulster stand almost alone in the exercise of industries other than that of agriculture? Is not her civilization a couple of centuries older than of the remoter districts in the West? Again, when you point to tenant right as the sole cause of the superiority of Ulster, ought you not to bear in mind that in her case the tenant right custom is one having its origin in the first plantation of the Province where it has been gradually developed and intimately mixed up with the habits and social institutions of the people? Can we predict with confidence that the attempt to create such a custom by artificial means, in the midst of a population hitherto unused to it, will be followed with equal success in other parts of Ireland? For, my Lords, is it indeed the case that tenant right and prosperity always go hand in hand? Nothing of the kind. There are parts of Ireland in which prosperity is to be found without tenant right; there are others in which tenant right is to be found without prosperity. In no part of Ulster does tenant right prevail more than it does in Donegal, and yet the area scheduled in that county under the Relief Act of last year was no less than 1,169,000 acres; an area larger than that scheduled in almost any other county. Take, again, the case of evictions. Last year the Province of Ulster stood second in the list in point of the number of evictions; this year it stands first. Try another test. Of all the causes which have contributed to Irish distress and discontent none has contributed more than the minute sub-division of the holdings. How does Ulster stand in respect of sub-division? It is at the head of the list. In Leinster there are 86,000, in Munster 93,000, in Connaught 123,000, and in Ulster 188,000 holdings below £15 valuation. Before we recommend free sale as the remedy of all the ills to which Ireland is heir we should satisfy ourselves that it has worked well and stood the strain of adverse circumstances where it exists already. How has free sale stood the test of adversity in Ulster. I will read to your Lordships part of a letter addressed in September, 1879, to Mr. Thaddeus O'Brien, of Shanballymore, by a well-known authority—

“Speaking from an Ulster standpoint,” says the writer, “I am sorry to say that the tenant right custom has not stood the test of hard times. It is vanishing at the first touch of adversity. The value of tenant right has been reduced 30 per cent at least, and, in many instances, farms cannot be sold at all. A tenure which is so easily affected by temporary circumstances is unsatisfactory, and hence students of the Land Question here are looking forward to the extension of peasant proprietorship as the only adequate remedy for all agricultural ills.”

It did not, by the way, occur to the writer that the peasant proprietor would fare no better than the tenant farmer under the circumstances described. Now, who do your Lordships suppose was the student of the Land Question who expressed these views? It was Mr. M'Elroy, the oracle of the Ulster farmers, the witness quoted again and again by the Bessborough Commissioners as an ardent defender and apostle of that very Ulster tenant right whose collapse he so forcibly describes. That was Mr. M'Elroy's description in 1879; what has been the state of things in Ulster ever since? It is impossible to read the Evidence on the Table without perceiving that in Ulster, as in the rest of Ireland, a deeply-rooted agrarian movement is proceeding. A movement of resistance to every attempt on the part of the landlord to assert the rights which even this

[First Night.]

Bill is by way of retaining for him, of opposition to all increases of rent, no matter how reasonable, to all restrictions on the tenant's right of sale, to all limitations on the choice of a successor by the outgoing tenant. The statutory conditions of this Bill will be bitterly resisted just as the so-called office rules have been resisted hitherto. Her Majesty's Ministers will be credulous indeed if they suppose that after they have once called into existence this custom over the whole of Ireland, they will, through any tribunals which they may constitute, be able to keep it within the limits which they would prescribe. Free sale is a reality, the restrictions and reservations are scarcely worth the paper upon which they are written. I say, then, that the case of Ulster does not establish the conclusion which you draw from it; but that, on the contrary, the effects of the confusion of interests which the Bill will create all over Ireland are already manifesting themselves, and producing dangerous results in that Province. Depend upon it that confusion will be worse confounded in districts where the tenant right system has been hitherto unknown and is to be violently created in the midst of a people who are unfamiliar with its operation, and who have not even the advantage of an established custom to guide them.

Is there, I would ask the House, any other industry, any other profession in which such a confusion of interests exists? Partnership I understand, co-operation I understand; but this is neither co-operation nor partnership. We are going, with our eyes open, to create a system of tenure barbarous in its incidents, and opposed to the enlightened opinion of civilized communities. I have heard it said that in the legislation of Prussia is to be found a precedent for the law which you are going to apply to Ireland. Nothing could be further from the truth. The statesmen of Prussia found at the commencement of this century a land system under which the great lords were the nominal owners of vast estates, into the actual possession of which they were unable to re-enter. The land was occupied by tenants who enjoyed a species of fixity, and who paid to the lord feudal services in consideration of their occupancy rights. Neither party was the owner in the full acceptation of the term; but the two interests were confused and entangled together. It was under these circumstances that the Legislature intervened, in order to extricate and disentangle those interests. The absolute ownership of a portion of their land was given to the lords, and the services of the tenants were commuted for a fixed rent, which, by subsequent legislation, the tenants were allowed to extinguish so as to effect the complete enfranchisement of their holdings. This is not the moment to inflict upon your Lordships a lecture upon the systems of land tenure to be found in different European countries; but I believe I am not wrong in saying that if you turn to France, to Spain and Portugal, to the Low Countries, you will find that everywhere the efforts of statesmen have been directed to the disentanglement of interests before confused and competing with each other, and to the establishment of full and undivided ownership. In this country, of all others, it has been the object of statesmen, particularly of Liberal statesmen, to give every facility for the creation of unrestricted ownership, and to simplify and expedite all transactions relating to land. It is in Ireland alone that we are asked to take a step backwards in the direction of that chaos from which, in other countries, the civilized communities of the world have emerged. We seem, in dealing with that country, to have taken leave altogether of the patience which makes allowance for human infirmities, of the consistency which rises superior to pressure and to excitement, of the statesmanship which is able to discern progress even when it is tardy and interrupted. With the passage of this Bill we shall complete another cycle of agitation and concession. I will venture to say that before the ink is dry upon the final print of the measure a new cycle will commence. This Bill cannot be a settlement of the Irish Land Question, in no single clause of it is finality written: it is the reward of past agitation, it will be the vantage ground of the agitation of the future. I may be asked why, holding these views, I do not move the rejection of the Bill. I am not one of those who believe that this House should, on all occasions, content itself with registering decisions arrived at "elsewhere." Only last year we rejected a measure dealing with this very question, and I believe that the public opinion of the country supported us. The circumstances, however, with which we are now confronted differ widely from those under which we declined to give a second reading to the Compensation for Disturbance Bill. The Compensation for Disturbance Bill was, in name, a temporary measure, though it admitted principles of permanent application. It came to us backed by diminishing majorities, supported by arguments which had been demolished, and statistics which had been discredited and disproved. This measure comes to us, after a discussion which has extended over several months, supported, so far as its main provisions are concerned, by the whole weight of a powerful Party. It is presented to us as a permanent settlement without which the Executive Government decline the responsibility of administering the affairs of Ireland. Its rejection would be the signal for a recrudescence of the conflict already raging there: during the coming autumn and winter we should have to deal with anarchy and terrorism worse than those which have already made Ireland a byword, and we should have the spectacle of a Government reluctantly and half-heartedly enforcing a law which it has itself declared to be unjust. These conditions could have only one result—they would lead to a renewal of the proposals now made to us in a probably more extreme and violent shape. The Bill indicates a legislative low water mark above which the next tide may rise, below which it certainly will not fall. Under these circumstances, our duty, I conceive, lies in the direction to which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has pointed. We must pass the Bill, we must amend it in Committee, so far as it may be possible to amend it consistently with its general scope and principle; but in doing this we must place upon record that Her Majesty's Ministers, and they alone, are responsible for the injustice of the measure which we have exposed, and that they, and they alone, will be accountable for its failure, which we are clearly able to foresee.

LORD INCHIUIN, in protesting against the Bill, said, surely the landlords in Ireland were entitled to ask for the same justice and liberty over their own property as their brethren in England and Scotland. It could not be denied that in Ireland there was a disaffected class who were anxious to possess the property of others, and whose doctrines were Communism, pure and simple. Their ultimate object was to bring about dissension and rupture between the two countries; and it appeared to him, in adopting that Bill, the Government were endeavouring to buy up these men to discontinue agitation. They would never, however, be satisfied by any reasonable promises, and the proper course to pursue was to take a firm stand, and say—"We will insist upon law and order being respected." He contended that many of the provisions of the Bill were at variance with the principles expressed in 1870 by Mr. Gladstone, Judge Longfield, and Mr. Bonamy Price. From the landlord valuable proprietary rights would be taken, and yet no compensation would be given him. In the case of the West Indian slaveowners, and on the occasions of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church and the Abolition of Purchase in the Army, compensation had been awarded; but now the landlords of Ireland, though dispossessed of many of their powers, were to have no such justice meted out to them. The 1st clause in the Bill—that which related to free sale—would be productive of great injustice. He would have no objection to indemnify tenants for their own improvements; but he strongly objected to their being allowed to sell what did not really belong to them. Purchasers of holdings would often, he contended, have to pay an extravagant sum for the tenant right; and thus, though the rents might be greatly lowered by the Court, the position of the incoming tenants would be no better than that of tenants at the present time. He thought the result of the measure would be that, before long, a large amount of money would be taken out of the country by tenants who had sold their interest in their holdings. The incoming tenants would really have to pay a larger rent than ever they had paid and than the land would bear. There was great difficulty in fixing a fair rent, and it was almost impossible to make all proper allowances for differences in the character of the land, and the other circumstances of the holdings. He was of opinion that in the altered circumstances in which landlords would find themselves they ought to be empowered to compel the State to buy. He was exceedingly sorry that the Amendments to the Emigration Clause had rendered it a practical nullity, as he regarded that clause as the most important in the Bill; and he believed its purpose had been defeated in some measure by the machinations of the Roman Catholic priests, who were afraid to lose the fees they derived from the overcrowded districts of Ireland. He objected also to the clause relating to leases. There might be cases of hardship; but the tenants had entered into those contracts with their eyes open, and it was inequitable to re-open questions thus settled. He regarded the Bill as a whole as most unsatisfactory; it was not a final settlement of the question, and he fully expected that in six or seven years they would have another Land Bill. He regretted that the Bill had ever been introduced, and he hoped that their Lordships would be able to modify in Committee some of its most objectionable features.

[First Night.]

LORD MONTEAGLE said, they could all understand with what great pain the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) separated himself from the Party with which he usually acted. It was frequently as difficult, however, to act in opposition to one's class as to one's Party. No complaint could be made with regard to the references to the Emigration Clause; and he was quite convinced that the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland had been actuated in this matter by pure motives. With regard to the general question, they must ask themselves whether there was a grievance to be dealt with in Ireland? One was ashamed seriously to discuss this question after all that had come and gone. One might almost, after the speeches which had been made, begin to fancy that the Irish land system was the most perfect possible. The evidence collected by the Bessborough Commission could not be all swept away by a derisive cheer. But there was, besides, the Richmond Commission, to which the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) had referred. The recommendation of that Commission was most significant. It could scarcely be maintained that before 1870 there was freedom of contract or undivided ownership. The latter implied that the landlord had the right to deal with the soil as he liked; but that was far from being the case. The freedom of contract which existed before 1870 reminded him of a passage in one of Goldsmith's plays. The old father wished his son to marry an heiress who was the father's ward. The son was reluctant, being engaged to another lady, and he was addressed by the father in this wise—

“You are both of you perfectly free; she is free to marry you or lose half her fortune; and you are free to marry her or pack out of the house without any fortune at all.”

Consolidation was responsible for much of the difficulty in which they found themselves; and it was out of the question that the right of consolidation could be exercised freely. A right which remained, but which he feared would be somewhat damaged by the Bill, was that of making tenants combine to effect improvements. The rent question was left open in 1870. The Government were then under the impression they could adequately secure the interest of the tenant by protecting him against arbitrary eviction. It must be admitted that there were many cases in poorer parts of the country in which rents had been raised in virtue of the improvements made by the tenants, and this had imported a sense of insecurity into the rent system. In illustration, he quoted the particulars of a case in which a tenant had paid an increased rent for 10 years on his own improvements, and a case which would not have been brought to light if the landlord had not at last turned the tenant out. The great majority of landlords were as honourable in Ireland as in England, and treated their tenants with great consideration. But it was hardly necessary to remind their Lordships that a small amount of injustice might create a widespread feeling of insecurity. The noble Lord read an extract from the Report of the Devon Commission, in proof of that statement. Their Lordships had heard but little from the opponents of the Bill as to the remedies which ought to be applied to the present state of affairs in Ireland. In his opinion the only solution for present difficulties was to be found in increasing the interest of the tenant in his holding, and augmenting the number of the owners of the soil. The noble Marquess opposite was in favour of the latter. But anything done in that way must be voluntary, and if it were voluntary, many districts would be untouched. If they could not convert tenants generally into owners, he saw no other alternative than to develop the interest of the tenant, and leave him then to work out his own salvation. If rents were to be considered by a Court, no doubt, in cases where they were reduced, the landlords might think their interests damaged. But it was admitted on all sides that the enormous majority of the landlords of Ireland were prepared for that. If they did not want to extract more than a fair rent, what reason was there for fear on that head? The part of the Bill to which most objection was taken by noble Lords was the clause relating to free sale. But if a fair rent was fixed, he did not see how the landlords would be damaged by free sale. He had heard of various cases in which the rent had been largely increased on account of improvements made by the tenant himself; but he had never heard of a single case in which a landlord had suffered from tenant right. He did not see that any of those provisions were calculated to damage the landlord's pecuniary interests, though, no doubt, it would interfere with his rights in some respects. It had been said that this measure was a concession to agitation, and it was, no doubt, a great misfortune that legislation of this kind should just follow on agitation. He might, however, remind their Lordships that the same thing had happened more than once in England, and that several important measures, notably Catholic Emancipation, had been passed deliberately as concessions to agitation. He would only add that it was his firm belief that the Bill would confer great benefit on the tenants, and would prove such a settlement of the present difficulties, as would render it acceptable to the landlords also.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I rise, as an Irish landlord, to address you upon one of the most important measures that have ever come before your Lordships' House, and I say this advisedly, as, although I am aware that this measure only affects the Land Tenure of Ireland, yet I am satisfied that any change which may be made in the Land Laws of that country will eventually find an echo in legislation—in Radical legislation—with regard to the Land Laws of Great Britain. Up to the present time, the rights of property have rarely been interfered with by Parliament; and, when it has been found necessary to interfere with the vested rights of individuals for the public good, it has been invariably the custom to give full compensation for the value taken away. But this is a measure of confiscation pure and simple, without 1s. of compensation being given. It takes away the just rights, whether purchased or inherited, of a class who—as the Prime Minister himself has stated—have been tried and honourably acquitted, and who, although so acquitted, are to be heavily fined in the future for their conduct in the past. I appeal to your Lordships to be informed whether that is in accordance with your views of English justice? It has been argued by the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) that there is no confiscation in this measure, and that the landlords will not be injured, but will absolutely gain by it, as it will put down agitation, and also that there are certain clauses in the Bill which will render their rents more secure. I entirely deny both of those statements. No one will attempt to argue that enormous advantages, which represent many millions in value, are conferred on the Irish tenant. Where do those advantages come from? There is no intermediate property in land; the Act of 1870 drew a hard-and-fast line where the landlord's rights ended and the tenant's rights began. If advantages representing many millions are to be conferred upon the Irish tenant, they must have been taken from the landlords, who had previously enjoyed them, because there is no other place from whence they can have come. How, then, can it be argued that this is not a measure of confiscation? Then there is the statement that this Bill will stop agitation; that it will settle the Land Question and render Ireland contented. I wish from my heart I believed that was the case; for, if I believed that, much as I dislike this measure and almost everything in it, I would receive it with open arms. But I am afraid it will be but the starting point for a fresh agitation, which will gather force by the strengthened position of the tenants, who will then have a much firmer basis of operations than they had before. Then, as regards certain clauses in this Bill rendering the rents more secure, I think that is a ridiculous suggestion, because every such clause could have been conceded by the landlord of his own free will, if he wished to secure his rents by doing so. What is the history of this measure? Has it been produced by feelings of right and justice in the minds of Her Majesty's Government, or is it an answer to an agitation which has been a disgrace to the Empire and has destroyed all progress and prosperity in Ireland? I think the whole history of the measure points to the conclusion that it is an answer to agitation, and if we needed any further proof the changes that have been introduced since the Bill first appeared would supply it. There was no mention of it when the Ministry came into power; we heard then of nothing but the "comfort and satisfaction" at the state of Ireland; but since the Bill has been before the House of Commons addition after addition, all tending to make it much worse, have been made at the instigation of the Land League. But what are the aims of the agitation which is being pandered to by the Government? It goes far beyond any agrarian question, and aims at nothing less than the dismemberment of the Empire; and giving way to it will lead the Irish people to believe that they have only to agitate in the future to get anything they may require. This agitation is led by men who know well that if they can destroy the landlords of Ireland and eliminate from the soil of that country those men who up to this time have been the most loyal and true to the British connection, they will have gone far to bring about their real object, which is separation from England altogether. Mr. Parnell himself stated that he would not have taken off his coat to this work if he had not something far greater and grander to bring about in the future. It would not have been easy to believe, after the statements made by the Liberal Party in 1870, that an Act including the "three F's" would be brought forward by that Government within 11 years, and yet this is the case. Is it more difficult to believe now that a measure granting Home Rule will be laid on the Table of this House in a limited period? For my part, I believe such a measure will be brought forward before many years are passed, and when that takes place separation will not be far distant. But I am not one of those who consider no change necessary. I know the country too well and the terrible state to which it is now reduced to believe we could go on without a measure of Land Reform, which has been rendered necessary by the promises made by Her Majesty's Government that have excited such lively hopes in Ireland, which hopes it would be impossible now to blight and destroy; also by the weakness of the present Government in having allowed Ireland to drift into such a fearful state; and, in addition to this, by the fact that the Act of 1870 has been a failure. I have never believed that the Act of 1870 could be a final settlement of the question, because it unsettled the basis upon which the Land Laws rested—a basis that had grown up by the usage of centuries. But I have never objected to that measure as regards the interests of the landlords, except in so far as the unsettlement it produced, which rendered it necessary that other Acts should be passed to attempt to find the foundation that was lost, just as I believe this Bill, which again thoroughly unsettles the question, will be repudiated in its turn by the very Government who pressed it upon Parliament as a final settlement of the question. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), whom I do not see in his place, has stated that the Act of 1870 carried out all that was intended by its framers, and therefore I suppose he believes that it has not been a failure; but I would say that, in certain instances, it carried out more than was intended, because it was distinctly stated by the Prime Minister, and the Government to which the noble Duke then belonged, that there was no intention of giving an interest in a holding by granting compensation for disturbance. But now it is stated that, unintentionally, that measure created a valuable interest, which it is now necessary to pass this measure to protect. If such unintentional advantages were granted under an Act so clear as the Act of 1870, we must almost shudder at the idea of the unintentional advantages which may be conferred in an Act so complicated as this. But, although I have never objected to the Act of 1870, except for the unsettlement it produced, I think it has been a failure. I shall not now go into the points where that Act has failed; but, as it has been a failure, and for the other reasons I have stated, I consider it an absolute necessity in the interests of both landlords and tenants that a change should be made and a measure of Land Reform introduced. But, though I consider a measure necessary, I think the Bill before your Lordships' House the very worst means that could possibly have been devised for making such a change. It is so complicated that no one can understand it, and it will produce an amount of litigation perfectly fearful to contemplate; but it is perfectly clear in this—that it gives no compensation to the landlords for the rights taken away, and it will demoralize Ireland and ruin the future race of tenants. What was required was a simple measure anyone could understand, granting large advantages to the Irish tenants—which any measure to have a chance of success must grant—and giving full compensation to the landlords for those advantages which I have shown must have been taken from them. But, my Lords, we have no other measure before us, and therefore I regard it as a necessity, having regard to the interests of all classes in Ireland, that we should give this Bill a second reading, bad as it is and worse as it has become, and attempt to introduce some moderate Amendments in Committee to clear up some of its ambiguities, because what the Prime Minister has stated is the object of certain clauses is not always clear, and also to correct some of the mistakes, unfairnesses, and anomalies which appear upon the surface of it. My Lords, if we are to accept this Bill, it is necessary we should look the matter boldly in the face, and see what the effect of it really will be, and what will be the future position of the landlords and tenants of Ireland. I will divide the Bill into two parts—the first part dealing with the “three F’s”—fixity of tenure, fair rents, and free sale; the second part dealing with the “ornamental clauses”—peasant proprietary, reclamation of waste lands, and emigration. The reason why I call them the ornamental clauses is, because it is impossible they can be made use of under the Bill as it stands, and I do not believe it is intended they should be, as the first part renders them almost entirely inoperative; and I believe they have been put in to meet the wishes and catch the votes of certain of the Government supporters who have hobbies on one or other of them. It is not easy, my Lords, to reconcile the speeches which have been made by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Bill. For instance, the Prime Minister has stated that the “three F’s” are not given in this Bill. Now, no noble Lord has said the same, and the only way that I can explain that statement is, that he has inveighed so strongly against the “three F’s” that it would be impossible, even with the enormous powers of rhetoric at his command, to explain away the unanswerable arguments which he used during the passing of the Act of 1870 against the “three F’s,” taken individually and collectively, which, I maintain, are the fundamental principles of this Bill. The first thing we have to consider is the right of free sale. There is nothing that the landlords, who, up to this time, have not allowed this right upon their properties, and have paid large sums to keep it away, or, in some instances, acting on the suggestion and guarantee contained in the Act of 1870, who have purchased that right, believing by so doing they were extinguishing a most injurious custom for ever, though at a large cost—there is nothing, I say, which they look upon in this Bill with greater dislike or apprehension than the system of free sale, founded as it is on the Ulster Custom, but upon perfectly different grounds, because in Ulster the tenants have paid for their tenant right, therefore there is no reason they should not have the power of selling it again; but in the rest of Ireland, where this right does not exist, nothing has been paid to gain a right which represents an immense money value, and which will be enjoyed directly this Bill becomes law. My Lords, it has been stated that the prosperity of Ulster is due to the tenant right custom. I have had some experience of a property under tenant right, and I am quite satisfied that tenant right would have ruined the population of that Province if it had not been for the manufactories that exist there. Again, the tenant right was constantly limited by office rules; but for the future there will be no limit of any sort, and everyone will be able to sell his tenant right for the best price it will command in the market. They will be able to sell what they have enjoyed through the kindness and consideration of their landlords in allowing the rents to remain below the value; and the more considerate the landlord has been, the higher will be the tenant right. No one would object to their being allowed to sell the improvements that had been made by themselves or their predecessors in title; but the Prime Minister has stated they are permitted to sell a something more, and this something I believe to be the capitalized difference between their present rent and a full rent. My Lords, the landlord of the future will not be able to make his tenants contented and happy, and his rents secure by having them low, because the lower the rent the higher will be the tenant right, and he will be obliged to have his tenants rack-rented and his rents insecure whether he likes it or not. Then, again, all improvements will be stopped, because the landlords will not consider improvements sufficiently protected under this Bill, and it is possible his own improvements may be made a still greater fine upon his future tenants; and, again, he will have no power of selection. His greatest enemy may buy a farm upon his own property at his gate, and may insult him whenever he goes in or out of it. How can it be expected, under these circumstances, that landlords will still lay out their money in improvements? My Lords, I believe this Bill is intended to stop eviction and to prevent cruelties being perpetrated on the Irish tenants—of which the Prime Minister states the landlords as a class have been acquitted—but I believe it will enormously increase evictions, which will take place in the future in a much more cruel form than hitherto. Up to this present time the landlord, and the landlord alone, has had the power to evict a tenant or make the sale of a holding, because he could refuse to take any tenant who purchased under a sheriff's sale. Now several other classes are brought in, who will have for the future almost the same powers of eviction with the landlord. You will bring in the money lender or "gombeen" man, the shopkeeper, the banks, and other creditors. Will they be as considerate as the landlord of the past? Do you not think that eviction will become much more frequent under sales for debt, created by the powers of mortgage which the Bill will give? The landlords have allowed men to run into three or four years' arrears, and then have tried to help them over their difficulties. Will the "gombeen" man be as considerate? I myself have protected many tenants who have fallen into difficulties, through no fault of their own, by having become security for friends, who have left them to pay, and I have no doubt other landlords have done the same thing; but now we shall be prevented from giving any protection whatever. In 10 years' time will the Prime Minister be able to acquit the new classes to whom he has given the power of eviction, which he calls a "sentence of death," as he has acquitted the landlords of the past? We have heard lately how money lenders in some places on the Continent have fastened like vampires on the population, and are sucking the life's blood out of them. Does the Prime Minister wish to institute the same state of things in Ireland and give the Irish people another and graver cause for misery? Why are the class to which the money lenders belong so anxious for free sale? Because they know that it will create a power of mortgage, which will be taken advantage of, as it was under the Act of 1870, and that the monies lent on it will be more secure. My Lords, I believe the clause will be injurious to the interests of both landlord and tenant; but the Bill hinges on it, and if it were taken out, as some people have proposed it should be, it would utterly destroy the measure and render it unworkable. Then there is another view which I do not think has struck Gentlemen who wish this clause eliminated, and it surprises me it has not been mentioned before. If you take away the right of free sale as it stands in the Bill, with certain conditions for the protection of the landlords, you leave the right of sale under Common Law behind, without any conditions whatever. That right has always existed, but it has been rendered useless by the power of eviction; but directly you grant a judicial lease, and take away power of eviction, Common Law sale, without restriction, comes in; and, in my belief, the landlord under this Bill would be in a worse position if the 1st clause were cut out than he is at present, because free sale would still exist, only in a far more injurious form; and if, to protect the improvements of landlords who manage their properties on the English system, such properties were cut out from the action of the 1st clause, and not cut out entirely from the action of the Bill, the tenants on those properties would have far more power of selling the landlord's improvements than they had before. And, therefore, though I consider the clause most injurious to the best interests of the people of Ireland, I consider it a necessity that if the Bill becomes law the clause should become law with it. But I hope Amendments may be introduced in Committee to protect in some manner men who, under the guarantee of the Act of 1870, have purchased their tenants' right and paid their tenants for it in full—which, as the Bill now stands, the tenant can sell over again—and also more fully to protect the improvements made by the landlord upon all estates, and more especially on those managed on the English system. There is another point which I shall refer to under the head of peasant proprietary, which I think is the most useful proposition made in the Bill, and which the clause, as it stands, will go far to prevent. The next question we have to consider is fair rents. No one will deny that it is of the utmost importance that fair rents, and fair rents alone, should be levied from the tenant farmers of Ireland. But the reason the 7th clause created so much discussion is, because it is not clear that the rents of the future will be fair rents. Under the enormous powers granted to the Commission, and the wording of this clause, it is provided that the tenant's interest may mean his interest in his tenant right. The Prime Minister states that this is not to be taken into consideration in fixing a fair rent; but, if this is so, why not make it clear? If the tenant right should be taken into consideration—which I believe it will, as the clause is now worded—it is only a matter of time when the rents of Ireland will become a minus quantity, because the lower the rent the higher the tenant right; and when the rent comes to be fixed, if the tenant right is high, the rent will be lowered, and if a sale takes place during the next 15 years the tenant right will again be increased; so that in time the tenant right must eat away the rents altogether. I cannot see why, if the Prime Minister does not wish this to happen, we should not adopt the wording of Mr. Butt's Bill—that a fair rent is such a rent as a solvent tenant would undertake to pay one year with another, deducting from it any increase due to the tenant's improvements or his predecessors in title, for which he would be entitled to compensation under the Act of 1870. If this is adopted instead of the present words—which I hope it will be, and that your Lordships will adhere to the Amendment—it will make it clear that tenant right is not to be taken into consideration, and will carry out the intentions of the Prime Minister that a fair rent should be fixed without taking that right into consideration. I am quite sure Her Majesty's Government would not wish the rents of Ireland to be rendered a minus quantity by a right conferred on the tenants against the expressed wish of the landlords; but you must remember an unintentional advantage was conferred by the Act of 1870, and it is just possible there might be another unintentional advantage conferred by mistake under the Act of 1881. My Lords, the Prime Minister states that if the landlords can prove loss under the Bill they have a fair right to claim compensation from Parliament; but if they were to lose their whole rents, as they might do under the wording of this clause, they might, no doubt, claim compensation; but do your Lordships think they would have any chance whatever of getting it? My Lords, I believe this is not merely an Irish question—it is an Imperial question, because, if an irresponsible Court can be constituted that could have this effect upon the rents paid for the lands of Ireland, and it brought about such a result, it would naturally be the means of setting on foot an agitation to bring about the same results in England, and a strong Radical Government, backed by such a majority as is at present supporting the Prime Minister, might pass an Act which would do away in time with all rent from the land of Great Britain as well without any compensation. Well, my Lords, I now come to the "fixity of tenure" clause, or "durability of tenure," as the Prime Minister calls it, though I must own I cannot see a difference in the effect of the two words, the only difference being that they are spelt in a different manner. The best proof I can give that this is fixity of tenure is, that I believe the clause to be drawn on the lines of the old Irish lease, which was called "a lease of lives renewable for ever." This lease, like the clause before your Lordships, was really a lease for ever, or a durable tenure. In that lease there were conditions very similar to those contained in this clause; but, my Lords, it was found so inconvenient that it was necessary to pass an Act, forcing upon the owners who held leases of this description the necessity of giving durable tenure by what is called a "fee-farm grant," which is a "lease for ever;" and the arguments used to prove that there was no injustice in turning a "lease of lives renewable for ever" into a fee-farm grant or a lease for ever were, that the original lease was really a lease for ever, and, therefore, there could be no injustice in making it so by law. My Lords, if a "lease of lives renewable for ever" was turned without injustice into a lease for ever, and if this clause is, as I have shown, almost the same as that lease, is it not a proof that the lease for 15 years renewable for ever is really fixity of tenure or a lease for ever? The Prime Minister says that this clause is not fixity of tenure, because of the right of pre-emption reserved to the landlord; but that right can only come into existence when the tenant wishes to sell, and there is nothing to prevent him holding on for ever, unless he wishes to dispose of his holding, which he can then do, to the landlord at the full value. Under a "lease of lives renewable for ever" there was nothing to prevent the landlord buying at the full market value if his tenant wished to sell, which is all that is conceded at present; and, therefore, I maintain that this "fixity," "durability," or "perpetuity of tenure" is identical with the lease I have referred to, which is now turned by Act of Parliament into a "lease for ever." There is yet another point that calls for notice. If, before the passing of this Act, a landlord had offered his tenants a lease for ever at fair rents, they would have been prepared to pay a large fee or submit to a large fine in order to become possessed of it; but now a lease for ever is conferred on them without requiring any fine at all, and then it is said that this Bill is not a measure of confiscation. Well, my Lords, if this is a lease for ever, which I have shown it is, it is a monstrous proposition that, unlike the clauses contained in such leases, the landlord has not the right to re-enter upon a holding that belongs to him upon the deliberate breach of a statutory condition, with being liable to the full penalty for turbance which he would have to consequent on a notice to quit; and will be in exactly the same position if he had capriciously evicted his tenant although the tenant, holding a lease for ever, has broken one of the conditions upon which he holds that lease. I ap-to your Lordships whether this is and just, and whether an alteration of this clause ought not to be made in Committee. Well, my Lords, I now come to the ornamental clauses, and I do not detain you long, because I consider them almost entirely inoperative. The first we come to is the scheme for giving a peasant proprietary, which I believe is the best proposition made in the Bill, because I have long thought it is the only possible manner of settling the Irish Land Question, and bringing back peace, contentment, and prosperity to that country; but this scheme will, I believe, be inoperative, because I do not see any arrangement made to provide funds sufficient to carry it out, and there are none existing in Ireland for the purpose; and also because I believe "the sale" will act directly against it. If your Lordships considered that if a tenant has purchased his tenant right, he will be paying twice over the fee simple for his holding, if he wishes to purchase the freehold in addition to what he now has in present possession? For instance, a tenant whose rent is £20 a-year, put on a tenant right at 20 years' purchase, would pay a very moderate sum in the North—would equal £400; if he buys the freehold at, say 25 years' purchase, that will be £500 more, or, taking them together, £900 for 45 years' purchase. Do your Lordships believe that any land in Ireland will be worth 45 years' purchase, or £900 for a farm rented at £20 a-year, after the passing of this Act? What will happen if he wishes to realize? Do you think he will be able to sell both rights at the same time? I think that is impossible to suppose; but, if he should wish to do so, I doubt very much whether he will get more than the fee, or 25 years' purchase, for what he had paid 45 years' purchase to become possessed of. I think for this reason that free sale is enormously against the possibility of tenants taking advantage of the Free Sale Clauses of the Bill; and I think this is a great pity, because I have considered that to make property secure in Ireland it is necessary largely to increase the number of peasant proprietors, and it is the only means of escape for those landlords who do not wish to submit to the penalties contained in this measure, for their position under it could be intolerable. Their property could be rendered unsaleable, as the purchaser would only give such a price for it as the Land League would allow him to. I have several times mentioned the necessity for compensation; but I believe it would be most difficult to arrive at the absolute value of rights taken away under this Bill, some of which represent a large money value, but others, equally valuable, are matters of sentiment. The only possible way of arriving at compensation would be purchase by the State at a given number of years' purchase where the landlords could show they had had loss. This might have been arrived at without costing the British taxpayer one shilling, because the estates bought could have been mortgaged, and the money borrowed at a very low rate of interest. It has been said that if the landlords cannot collect their rents, how could the State collect them, and that it would not do for the State to become the landlords of Ireland. But, my Lords, the State would not become the landlords of Ireland, it would be merely the holder of a mortgage on the lands purchased, which mortgage was being paid off, principal and interest, each year during 35 years; the farmers would not look upon it as rent, because the rent goes on for ever, and this would cease at a given time, and by every payment they would be reducing their debt to the State. Therefore they would not repudiate it, because by so doing they would lose the money they had already paid—just like a man who had insured his life will go through any privation rather than, by giving up paying his premium for one year, lose all he has paid before. But, my Lords, if the Government are so blind to the facts as to say there is no confiscation, they can hardly deny that for the future there is only one possible buyer of Irish land. The whole British and Irish public are swept from the market; the occupier will be the only buyer, and he will be prevented from buying by what I have pointed out. My Lords, if there are no other losses to the Irish landlord under this Bill, I cannot see how it can be denied that his property is rendered unsaleable, and the value of it enormously deteriorated. As it is, I believe the intention of this measure is to fetter the landlords to their properties, so that in the future, when the next agitation takes place, the British Government will be able to confiscate the only thing then left to them—namely, the head-rent of the estates which they once called their own. Now, my Lords, with regard to emigration, which always finds such great advocates on this side of the Channel, for wherever the English people find Ireland difficult to govern, they always propose a wholesale depopulation of that country. My Lords, I think it a poor thing that this great, this rich Empire, should only be able to find two remedies for the constantly recurring distress in Ireland, and that one of those remedies should be the confiscation of the landlords' properties, and the other the still greater removal of a population which, in many places, is already too small. I will not deny that in certain poor districts in the West of Ireland the population is much greater than the produce of the land can support; but that is not the case over by far the greater area of that country. I believe that every emigrant who is likely to succeed in foreign lands is an enormous loss to the land of his birth. I ventured to point out on a former occasion that State-aided manufactories were the only true way of relieving distress in the West of Ireland, and I was met by the answer that it would be against the principles of political economy. But I have noticed since the Liberal Party introduced the Compensation for Disturbance Bill of last year and the present measure that they have given up talking about political economy altogether; and I cannot see the great difference between advancing money to Companies for the establishment of manufactories, and advancing money for the reclamation of waste lands, of which there is a proposal under this Bill. But, my Lords, I need not deal with either the questions of reclamation or emigration, because neither of these clauses can possibly be made the least use of as they are at present worded. Who would suppose that any Company would lay out money on reclamation, when they know that the moment the lands were let to a tenant, he would have perfect power to sell all their improvements for his own advantage? Well, my Lords, I shall not detain your Lordships by dealing with the questions of leases, or of arrears, or of that much-to-be-pitied class, the farm labourers, and I shall leave these most important subjects to be dealt with by other noble Lords, who, I have no doubt, will discuss them; but this I must say, that the way leases and arrears are dealt with seems to me the most demoralizing feature in this demoralizing Bill. My Lords, I have confined my remarks to the main features of this Bill, which I have said is a measure of confiscation, partly rendered necessary by the present deplorable state of Ireland, and that I believe full compensation ought to be given, more especially as the present state of Ireland has been mainly brought about by the weakness of the present Government. The Irish Executive reminds me of an indifferent rider on an impetuous horse, who, instead of riding him with a steady seat and firm, but gentle hand, throws the reins upon his neck and holds on by the spurs, thereby irritating him into a state far beyond control. My Lords, I believe the policy of the Irish Government has been a policy of weakness and irritation. I am not one of those who blame the Government for not having renewed the Peace Preservation Act last year; because it would have been impossible, in my opinion, having regard to the state of Ireland when they succeeded to power, having regard to the statements made on the hustings that Ireland was in a state of comfort and satisfaction, that the first measure of a Government, pledged up to the eyes to give everybody everything they wanted, could have been the renewal of an Act suspending the liberties of the Irish people. But, my Lords, I find the greatest fault with every action of the Government since that time. Every measure taken to preserve law and order in Ireland has invariably been taken two months after it would have been effective, and has merely acted as an irritant upon the people. My Lords, I believe that the Act which was passed last winter, and which no one can deplore the necessity of more than I do, would have been perfectly unnecessary if the ordinary law—as stated in a Circular sent round to the magistrates of Ireland—had been properly enforced. But, my Lords, the Chief Secretary for Ireland has at last thrown off the mask, and the mist that has hung over the extraordinary proceedings of the Irish Executive during the past year is now cleared away. The intention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland throughout must have been the ruin of the Irish landlords, because no man in the United Kingdom can be so well aware of what the effect would be of the addition to the Bill which he allowed to be made at the end of last week, and for which he thanked Mr. Parnell. He waited until the measure was nearly passed to show his real intentions, for fear of frightening his followers, and then, when he considered it safe, he threw off the mask and appeared in his true colours. My Lords, I sincerely wish that I could believe that this measure will really be a “message of peace” to Ireland, and that by the sacrifice of the landlords’ rights a lasting settlement of this much-vexed question will be brought about; but my belief is that when the measure becomes law, things will become even worse in Ireland than they are at present, and that, acting up to the apparent wishes of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, tenants will refuse to pay any rent at all until a judicial rent has been fixed. If this takes place—and I already see signs that it will—it will prove that right cannot come out of wrong, and that laws framed contrary to all principles of political economy, and against all theories upon which nations have been governed in the past, can lead to nothing but dire and desperate disaster in the future.

[First Night.]

The Marquess of Waterford

[First Night.]

[First Night.]

The Marquess of Waterford

[First Night.]

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that before attempting to unravel the mysteries of this Bill he would say one word in protest about the way in which it was introduced. The Bill was under discussion in the other House late on Friday evening, and was read a first time the same night at a special Sitting of this House, and the second reading fixed for this evening. The Bill was not printed until Saturday afternoon, and their Lordships’ House had, therefore, practically speaking, one day, and that a Sunday, for the consideration of a measure of vast importance to the country. He was not a strict Sabbatarian, and had even advocated in that House the desirability of enjoying reasonable recreation on the Sunday; but it was impossible to say that racking one's brains over the tangled intricacies of that Bill could be considered wholesome recreation for anyone. If they were not to consider a measure carefully and critically then they might as well abstain from the empty semblance of doing so; and if a measure of that kind was to receive proper consideration, it ought not to be taken for second reading on Monday when it was only printed on the preceding Saturday afternoon. Such indecent haste was not complimentary to their Lordships. He had no desire that the passage of the Bill should be retarded in any way. On the contrary, he hoped that the House would sit on Wednesdays and Saturdays, as far as convenient; but it was asking too much to propose that a Bill of that nature should be read a second time after it had been in their Lordships' hands only a few hours. If it were a simple measure, the time would be short enough; but the first thing that struck one in contemplating a measure which, in order to carry out its intentions, should be comprehensible to all those to whom it applied, was its complicated nature and the number and intricacies of the checks and balances which it contained, and the ambiguous nature of its language. A measure which ought to be clear, simple, and precise was about the most complicated measure that ever had been introduced into Parliament; and if any Amendment were made in it, one provision should be that a properly qualified interpreter should be employed on every townland to explain the Bill to the tenants. When, after some difficulty, a conclusion was arrived at as to what was meant by the terms of the Bill, the nature of it became pretty clear, and it was possible to form an estimate as to what the result of the Bill would be, and how far that result would bring about the ends and objects which it was intended to gain. What did the Bill do? He contended that it changed the whole system of land tenure in Ireland. The rights of ownership were taken away from landlords and given partly to tenants and partly to a Land Commission. Landlord and tenant were for the future to have certain rights and properties in the soil subject to the authority and direction of a Commission, which was practically the landlord—the lord of all the land in Ireland in all respects, except in the enjoyment of the money value of the land. Tenants were given new and valuable rights, or, to put it another way, which, however, involved an entire fallacy, ancient, nominal, and valueless rights were revived and made valuable, and the value was taken, and must be taken, from the landlord. The landlord lost this value in his estate, and he lost also whatever value might be attached to rights of real ownership. He was no longer a free man and an absolute owner of his property; he became a partial owner only, subject to the scrutiny and interference of an authority superior to him. His position was as different from what it was as was that of a man under control from that of a free man. The Bill took away all liberty of contract on the part of the landlord; but it left almost complete liberty of contract between tenant and tenant, who, for the future, would have the disposition of the land of Ireland in his hands. The Bill granted, to all intents and purposes, the “three F’s;” and fixity of tenure, free sale, and fair rent constituted, if taken together, a tenure as different to the present tenure founded on free contract as any two systems could possibly be. He trusted the House would take the view that the Bill revolutionized the system of land tenure; that it instituted a new system which, if it were better than the existing system, could prove its superiority only by being largely applied, a system which certainly offered great advantages to tenants for the present, advantages worth money to them, and which deprived landlords of rights and privileges of great value to them. If the Bill was much restricted it could do little good to Ireland. If it passed Parliament without the principle of compensation being recognized, he believed an Act would have obtained the sanction of the British Parliament more unjust than any measure that had ever been approved by any Legislative Assembly in a civilized community. He was not particularly hopeful of the general and permanent results which this Bill was likely to have in Ireland. He was very doubtful as to the future effects which the change of tenure would produce. But that was a question which experience alone could settle. The change would chime in with the feelings of the people. They were taking a new departure in Irish politics. It was an experiment—a leap in the dark—and it was hard to form a sound opinion as to how far the “three F’s” were likely to prove beneficial. Judging by the former opinions of very able men, the change was not unlikely to be injurious, and certainly involved injustice to the present owners of property in land. Baron Dowse, when Solicitor General for Ireland in 1870, spoke of such an interference by a Court as was contemplated in that Bill as being “completely subversive of all the relations between landlord and tenant.” In the course of the second reading of the Bill of 1870, Mr. Gladstone deprecated “Any provision by which men shall be told that there shall be an authority always existing ready to release them from the contracts they have deliberately entered into,”

and he could not then conceive

“A plan more calculated for throwing into confusion the whole economical arrangements of the country, and carrying widespread demoralization throughout the whole mass of the Irish people.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1845.]

It was true that the Prime Minister denied that fixity of tenure was granted by this Bill, though he formerly stated that valuing rents, which that Bill certainly did, would be tantamount to granting perpetuity of tenure. He said that perpetuity of tenure was not given, only security and durability. Practically speaking, perpetuity of tenure was granted, and they had the high authority mentioned for saying that such perpetuity was not likely to be beneficial to the country, and, moreover, that it could not be given to the tenant without taking away something valuable from the landlord. On that point, Mr. Gladstone said—

“Perpetuity of tenure on the part of the occupier is virtually expropriation of the landlord, and in such cases compensation would have to be paid to the landlord for the rights of which he would be deprived.”

He appealed to any unprejudiced man to say whether the new tenure, 15 years’ leases renewable for ever, was not practically perpetuity of tenure; and he appealed to the words of the Prime Minister to prove that perpetuity of tenure was practically expropriation, and that expropriation should be paid for. On the second reading of the Bill of 1870 the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack said that “Fixity of tenure in plain English amounted to the taking away of the property of one man and giving it to another. . . . No doubt we may take a man’s property, but, in that case, we must compensate him for it.”—[Ibid. 1866.]

The Earl of Dunraven

The noble and learned Lord spoke of fixity of tenure, and said that “fixity required compensation.” But now that “durability” and “security” were given, there was no mention of compensation. It would require the ingenuity and casuistry of the whole Jesuit College to show any practical difference between perpetuity or fixity and such durability and security as were provided by this Bill. This Bill did grant, practically speaking, perpetuity of tenure subject to periodical valuations. The same conditions as to rent, payment, waste, and sub-division which the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) said in 1870 would be ineffectual were contained in this Bill. Why were they to suppose that sub-division was better guarded against now than then? But sub-division had been one of the chief causes of Irish distress. He did not see why public men should not change their opinions. If a man might not change his opinions there was no sense in urging anything before Parliament. But in this matter of Irish legislation the opinions of the most prominent men had been changed to a very remarkable extent. The Prime Minister denied, over and over again, that joint proprietorship between landlord and tenant was a good thing. But in introducing this Bill he said that “he did not admit that joint partnership was a bad thing.” As for free sale, the Prime Minister stated, in the debate on the Bill of 1870, that he and his Colleagues

“Distinctly declined to admit that they were going to provide the same legislation and the same compensation for men who had paid nothing at all when they took their holdings as they would provide for those who had invested large sums of money.”—[Ibid. 1840.]

But that was precisely what this present Bill did. On that point the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack spoke of extending the Ulster Custom to the rest of Ireland as a “manifest violation of the principles of justice.” But, as far as free sale was concerned, the present

Bill did, to all intents and purposes, extend the Ulster Custom over the whole of Ireland. In contradistinction to all the assertions made 10 years ago by the Prime Minister to the effect that free sale over the whole of Ireland was not allowable and could not be granted without great injustice to the landlord, the same Prime Minister now said that it was

"Distinctly and decidedly the least open to objection of any part of the Bill," and that "it was almost absolutely ingrained in the necessities of the case and in the circumstances with which we have to deal."

These were marvellous changes of opinion. He could understand men changing their opinions as to the expediency of a measure; but he could not comprehend how they could change their views as to any hardship or injustice accruing to individuals under it. The right of assignment might have existed in law 200 or 300 years ago; but it was valueless, because there was nothing to assign. The present Bill made very valuable that which was previously valueless, and pretended that that value was created out of nothing at all. According to that Bill, the only way in which Ireland could return to freedom of contract was by present tenancies becoming future tenancies; and, as far as he could see, the only way in which that could be done was by a breach of the statutory conditions. It was only, therefore, by a breach of the statutory conditions of this Act that Irishmen could arrive at the freedom of contract which was to be some day so beneficial to them. In other words, Ireland's social relations would permit of freedom of contract whenever Irish farmers were prepared to break the conditions on which they held their land. That was a somewhat curious view to take of the social relations of a country. At one time the attention of the Irish people was called to the fact that outrages led to the consideration of the Disestablishment of the Church. At another they were told that a notice of eviction was tantamount to a sentence of death. Last Session a Bill was introduced which would have enabled tenants to avoid payment of rent if they only chose to swear hard enough that they could not pay. And now the people of Ireland were told that freedom of contract was the best thing that they could have if they were fit for it, but that they were not fit for it yet, and could only be made fit for it by breaking the statutory conditions of this Bill. The only wonder was that there was any morality at all left among the people. ["Oh!"] Ministers had stated the objections to this measure, in language much better and stronger and clearer than any at his command. This did not prove that the "three F's," or the terms in which they were granted by this Bill, must of necessity be injurious to Ireland. As they were considered by these great authorities to be both unjust and injurious a very few years ago, they should not build their hopes too high on such a very rickety foundation as the opinions now expressed by the same authorities. The Bill was satisfactory in one respect. It protected the undoubted rights of the tenant in his improvements. He had a perfect right in equity to the enjoyment of, or the value of, any improvements he had made, and to nothing else, and in this respect the law should be made to conform to equity. The fatal error in the Act of 1870, and perpetuated in this Bill, was the principle of compensation for disturbance. That principle once admitted, tenants would not rest until it was developed to the fullest extent, and would claim that they had a right to their holdings under all and any circumstances. That the tenants' improvements only ought to be considered was borne out by that clause in the Bill which exempted estates on which the landlords had made all the improvements from the Rent Clauses of the Bill. If in such cases the owner might raise rent to such an extent as to preclude any tenant right, it was proved that tenant right consisted in the value of the tenants' improvements. If the Commission had been instituted to assess the full value of tenants' improvements in all cases, and if it had been authorized to act as an arbitrator in all disputed cases of rent voluntarily submitted to it by both parties, under those circumstances a fair settlement would have been arrived at. The whole circumstances of the case would have to have been taken into consideration in determining the value of the improvements, and if the interest of the tenant was confined to that they would be able to arrive at a standpoint; but if they gave any further rights to the tenant, they might depend upon it that he would carry them out to the fullest extent and great confusion would ensue. The Bill endeavoured to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds—to guard the people against all the evils which might possibly arise from landlordism, and, at the same time, to keep for the people all the good results of landlordism. It strove to do too much, and in that respect might fail. The people could not be both independent of landlords and also reap the benefit of wise and improving landlords. The existence of land hunger and of a few bad landlords were some of the reasons given by the Prime Minister for legislating. The latter was a bad reason. It would be madness to legislate to counteract the evil effect of a few Irish landlords if by doing so they also counteracted the good effect produced by many prudent and improving landlords. “Land hunger” was only another term for scarcity of land, and that was only another way of stating that there were too many people bidding for land. Scarcely anything was done by this Bill either to diminish the demand for land by helping the people to find the means of subsistence elsewhere, or by providing them with some other means of subsistence here. The evil had been counteracted by the action of the landlords. They were content to take less than they could get for their land, and, at the same time, would not allow tenants to give more for a farm than it was worth in the way of premium. As it was now, land would be subjected to almost unbridled competition. A check was provided by the provision giving landlords the right of pre-emption at a fair price; but the action of the landlord would be greatly hampered by the fact that the principle of free sale, the right of selling in the open market, was conceded in the Bill. It was hard upon the landlord that, in order to check competition, he should be forced to place himself in direct opposition to a privilege granted by this Bill. Competition would be increased instead of checked on the whole. The real difference would be that the advantages to be gained by competition would be transferred from the landlord to the tenant; that was, transferred from the man who used it with moderation to men who were not likely to be moderate in the use of it. What other reasons were there for legislating? He put on aside the Report of the Bessborough Commission. That Report was not worth a row of pins. The noble Duke (Duke of Argyll) the other day conclusively showed up the value of the evidence; and although the conclusions arrived at might be perfectly correct, they must be considered merely as opinions of certain individuals, founded on their personal observations or evolved out of their moral consciousness, and not as opinions founded upon evidence. Practically, the case was this—A state of things existed in Ireland requiring some remedy, and, in order to meet the views of those who, having heard some one say “Force is no remedy,” thought it rather a nice-sounding phrase and a pretty catch-word to repeat, “some legislation must be tried.” Only a few months ago the Prime Minister declared that Ireland was enjoying a state of comfort and prosperity hitherto unknown in its history; and they now knew the authority of a former Cabinet Minister that an Irish Land Bill did not form part of the original programme of the Government. Nothing had occurred since then to make legislation necessary. Harvests had been exceptionally good. Landlords had not been acting in an unusual way, except that, instead of being paid their just debts, they had been buying their own rents. Nothing had occurred in Ireland except an agitation and a reign of terror; and they were forced, however reluctantly, to the inevitable conclusion that this Bill was a sop to that agitation. In Russia, when travellers were pursued by a pack of wolves, something was chucked on board to keep off the hungry wolves, and so in Ireland, whenever there was any outcry, some landlord’s property was chucked out. Whatever the motives for the introduction of the Bill, he allowed that they ought to look at the Bill and judge of it on its merits, and consider it with reference to the state of things in Ireland at the present moment. The one thing they had to consider was whether the system would be more suited to the Irish ideas than the present system, and he did think that the Bill would be more suitable to the Irish character in that respect. Irish tenants had always looked upon their holdings as to a certain extent their own property; and an Act legalizing that custom, and turning

The Earl of Dunraven

ing their idea into reality, would be quite in accordance with their sentiments. It might be for the benefit of the country to transfer certain rights from the landlord to the tenant. If so, by all means let it be done. Only it should be done with due regard to the principle that the State was bound in such cases to make good any loss accruing to individuals. Compensation for loss of property taken by the State from individuals for the benefit of the community was the great principle upon which all civilized society rested, and it was most dangerous to invade it. There were many things which had occurred in Ireland for which no compensation could be given. They could not compensate the people of Ireland for having allowed them to be so evilly-entreated by agitators. They could not compensate the law-abiding people of that country for allowing them to be outraged by a lawless agitation, and for the distrust of law and the Executive power which they had learned, through the failure to afford them proper protection. They could not compensate landlords for the fact that the feelings of their tenants had been estranged from them. They could never compensate him for the fact that men among whom he was born, and with whom he had lived on terms of intimacy and friendship, had been forced to put themselves into antagonism to him. These were matters for which no compensation could be made. The effect and the recollection of them would die out in time, but perhaps not during the lives of the present generation. In some ways, however, the landowner might have been compensated. Compensation could have been given without costing the State anything, by authorizing the Commission to take over existing mortgages at the present rate of interest, which was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and allowing $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of that interest to go to form a sinking fund, whereby the capital of the mortgage debt would be paid off in a certain number of years. As the State could borrow at 3 per cent, this transaction would not cost the State a penny. Compensation was denied on the ground that there was no confiscation; and confiscation was denied on two grounds—first, that landed property would increase in value; and, secondly, that the rights of which landlords were deprived were not founded in equity. As far as the first contention was concerned, it was quite impossible to prove that land would increase in value. Even if the selling price of land did increase, that was no reason for refusing compensation. If they took away certain rights from owners of land, they could not refuse in justice to compensate them for the loss by proving, even if it were possible to do so, that the value of their property would be improved. If the rights were legal, that was sufficient to found a claim. It was no argument to say that the landlord should never have been given the rights he had enjoyed, or that certain rights should never have been taken away from the tenants. They could not remedy one injustice by committing another. The opinions of people as to the equity of any law or system of tenure or usage of any kind might vary from generation to generation or from year to year; but if there was to be any social stability, if individuals were to devote their capital and energies to those pursuits and in those directions which caused a people to progress in civilization, individuals must be guaranteed against fear of those changes and from their effects by knowing that they would receive an equivalent for any loss of property involved in such change. On most estates in Ireland landlords had contributed half the costs of maintenance and improvement, and had charged nothing in the way of additional rent. Was the landlord to be deprived of his share in those improvements? If the custom of an estate had been for the landlord to find half the cost of maintenance and improvement up to the present, would he be able to obtain compensation on the occasion of a sale that might take place 25 or 50 years hence? They forbade the proprietor, who had contributed a portion of the maintenance and improvement and had charged no interest whatever, to raise his rents sufficiently to cover his expenditure. If that were to be done, rents would be almost universally raised throughout Ireland, and the whole object of the Bill would be frustrated; for, if the result was to raise rents, the Bill would be perfectly useless. It was hoped that the Bill would not be universal in its application—that portion of it which enabled the tenant to apply to the Court to have his rent fixed. It was obvious that if every tenant were to do so the

[First Night.]

Commission and the Courts would never get through the work. If, therefore, the Bill was to work at all, such cases must be comparatively rare. He did not think himself that the amount of litigation would be so great as was supposed. One or two tenants on an estate or townland would try the rent question, and the result would be looked upon as a test affecting the whole townland or property. It was hoped also that on many estates the tenants would prefer to remain as they were, and would prefer the amenities of a good landlord to the stern justice of the Courts. But, in such cases, the landlord should surely be safeguarded against any change of mind on the part of his tenants, otherwise he would scarcely venture to lay out much money for fear of being suddenly called upon to fulfil the disagreeable and, perhaps, very difficult task of proving every penny to the Court. To the other provisions of the Bill he would only briefly allude. He trusted that the attempt to create a peasant proprietary would prove successful; but probably no very great number of Irish tenants would avail themselves of that provision from the fact that they would prefer to remain statutory tenants. He had little faith in peasant proprietors in Ireland, as neither the soil nor the climate of the country was suitable to the existence of a prosperous and numerous body of very small freeholders. The result would be that they would get into debt, and their properties would fall into the hands of money-lenders and shopkeepers in small towns and villages; so that the creation of a body of peasant proprietors would be followed by the creation of a number of small landlords, who would deal very hardly with their tenants. The Emigration Clause was too restricted. It would do good, no doubt, to a certain extent; but the amount of money was too small for permanently affecting the prosperity of the country. It was a mistake to suppose that assisting emigration was unpopular in the country. He did not believe that to be the case, though it was unpopular with those agitators whose stock-in-trade consisted of a starving and discontented people. In no way could public money be better employed than in assisting the people to emigrate at the least possible inconvenience and pain to themselves; and nobody would deny that the rent difficulty in Ireland would be settled satisfactorily if the people of the country showed so little disinclination to leave Ireland that sooner than pay more than they ought for a farm at home they would seek for a farm in some other portion of the British Empire. He hoped that Irish landlords would do their duty to the best of their ability under an altered condition of things; but they could scarcely be expected to take the same pride or pleasure in their properties, or to occupy themselves, as they had hitherto done, in regarding the welfare of the labourers and the poorer classes upon their estates. Whether the Bill worked well or not would depend upon the moderation of the tenants in the exercise of their new rights, and upon the landlords doing the best they could under the new circumstances. He hoped the action of the Bill would not be restricted or modified in any material respect, and that leases would not be excluded from its operation, nor ought those tenancies to be excluded where the present rent had been paid for a certain length of time; that would be merely punishing the honest men for their honesty. He should prefer to see the application of the Bill as extensive as possible. Its only chance of being beneficial lay in its action being as widespread as possible. If the country did not settle down quietly under it, it could not have fair play, and the country would not settle down quietly under it if great districts were excluded from it. The new system of land tenure should have a fair field and a fair trial; but the landowner ought to be compensated for the loss which he sustained under it. If he were not, a great injustice would be done. No one could pretend to say that the new tenure was as valuable to the landlord as the old tenure, of which he was to be deprived; and even if the debt were not paid it should be acknowledged. He hoped the Bill would pass; first, because under the condition, the lamentable condition, to which Ireland had been allowed to fall it would be most disastrous to that country if this measure should not become law. He trusted that this Bill might be read a second time, and that its scope and sphere of action would not be materially curtailed in Committee. The happiness and welfare of his countrymen in Ireland were very dear to his heart, and he should be much pleased if the Session of 1881 should be marked by giving to his country peace and contentment.

THE EARL OF LYTTON: There are so many of your Lordships whose personal interests are immediately and materially affected by the Bill before us that I must apologize for attempting to occupy any portion of the time that has at last arrived for the discussion of it; and if I could look upon it as a purely local measure, raising questions exclusively Irish, I would not have taken part in this debate. But no one who has watched the origin and progress of the Bill can doubt for an instant that we are now dealing with a measure of momentous consequence to all parts, all classes, and all interests of the United Kingdom. I believe this measure is, in the highest degree, mischievous and dangerous; but, in the peculiar circumstances of the case, there are reasons why your Lordships may hesitate to reject it. I wish, however, for my own part, to take the earliest opportunity of disclaiming any acquiescence in the principles and objects of this Bill, and to record the strongest protest in my power against this sort of legislation, which may hereafter be cited as a precedent. I make this protest on a threefold ground. In the first place, I think it is a revolutionary concession to the threats of rebellion, and it is a concession which never would have been required if timely steps had been taken to protect the unity of the Kingdom and the rights of property and of person. In the next place, I am sure this Bill will fail to secure the only result which could possibly justify its introduction—namely, the pacification of Ireland. And, in the third place, it is a step, and it is a long step, to a course which cannot lead to any other issue than the disruption of the nation on the one hand or a civil war on the other. These are the three grounds on which I join issue with the Bill. Allow me to explain them as shortly as I can. I have said that the Bill is a revolutionary concession to threats of rebellion; and I say this because no other view of the case can possibly account, and because this view of it does completely account, for the peculiar character of the measure which now lies upon the Table of your Lordships' House. For what does this measure propose, and what are the only principles upon which its proposals can be based? My Lords, I am not going to enter at any length into the details of this Bill, which is very intricate in its arrangement, and very obscure in its language. But this I think I may say of it in general terms, without fear of going far wrong, or doing it any injustice. It proposes to take from the landlords and tenants of Ireland the power of making their own bargains with each other about the land in which they are mutually interested; it proposes to institute a Court of Justice for the regulation of their business transactions and relations, on a basis giving to the tenant an interest in the land at once more permanent and more valuable than any to which he is at present entitled; and it cannot be denied that it is entirely at the landlord's expense that the tenant will acquire this new and considerable interest. Broadly, and apart from all questions of detail, this is a Bill for diminishing the proprietary rights of Irish landlords; it is a Bill for enlarging, at their expense, the interest of the tenants in the land they occupy; it is a Bill for destroying all freedom of contract in respect of the occupation of such land; and for regulating the relations between landlords and tenants by the decrees of a Court of Justice. I do not stop to dispute whether it is an abuse of language to apply the word "confiscation" to such a measure. I do not specially insist on the proposition, though it appears to me unanswerable, that the Bill is revolutionary. Whatever name may be given to the Bill its main features speak for themselves. It deprives of proprietary rights, and without compensation, a whole class and a most important class of the community. This is commonly called confiscation. It forcibly introduces a sudden and a sweeping change into the social position and the habits of life of the greater part of the population of Ireland; and this is commonly called revolution. To me, therefore, the terms seem perfectly appropriate; but I do not care to insist upon them. Confiscations are not always bad; they are sometimes necessary, they are sometimes salutary. Revolution may, under certain circumstances, be largely beneficial; and if I regard this particular measure with misgiving and dismay it is not because it involves confiscation, but because the confiscation it involves appears to me to be unnecessary, unjust, and injurious. I recoil from it, not because it is revolutionary, but because the revolution is certain, I think, to inflict upon the whole body of the nation a wound which must be serious, and may be fatal. But now, my Lords, to pass from words and come to things. I suppose it will not be denied that those who propose changes of this nature ought to be prepared to justify them. The burden of proof is upon them. How do they sustain it? What foundation do they lay for their Bill? I have carefully followed what has been said upon this subject both here and in the other House of Parliament, and by the Ministerial organs in the Press, and, substantially, I think it all amounts to this. We are told in every variety of tone and form that something must be done—as though it were of no practical importance whether the thing done were a right thing or a wrong thing, so long as it is done and done quickly. It is said that matters have come to such a pass in Ireland that they can no longer be left as they are; that whether this Bill or another be adopted, legislation of a radical fundamental kind has become indispensable for the re-settlement of relations between the landlords and tenants of Ireland. Nothing else, it is said, and nothing less, can now satisfy the expectations that have been raised or allay the agitation that has been brought within a measurable distance of civil war; and, this being so, it is best to take the remedy provided by those who are at present responsible for the treatment of the disorder lest a worse thing happen to us. I am by no means prepared to dispute the probable truth of all this. Here, I think, and now, the truth of it may be unreservedly assumed. It is quite possible that, as matters now stand, the rejection of this Bill might be the signal for insurrection in Ireland; and I fear it is more than probable that, in that case, the authors and abettors of the Bill would endeavour to throw the whole responsibility for the result upon your Lordships' House, while, at the same time, the protection afforded by Government to the lives and properties thus endangered would be timid, scanty, and ineffectual. All this I acknowledge; at least, I do not contest it. To your Lordships it may, as I have said, suggest many reasons for not summarily rejecting the Bill which is now before us. But between submission and approval there is a difference. To my own mind it does not constitute a conclusive argument in favour of the Bill; and for the simple reason that I cannot recognize in the Bill a final settlement of any of the serious questions it raises and disturbs. I do not believe that the Bill will pacify Ireland. I do not believe it can long postpone the dangers it is professedly designed to prevent; and I am persuaded that, sooner or later, we shall be placed by it in a position which will oblige us either to see the independence of Ireland established by the menace of civil war, or else firmly and unflinchingly to accept the challenge thrown out to such a war. I must confess I look upon acquiescence in revolutionary legislation as a greater national evil than resolute resistance to open insurrection. But I admit the plea of necessity in the limited sense of the considerations which I have mentioned. What I do not acknowledge or admit is that any sort of necessity, or even justification, can be shown for the present measure in a wider, a worthier, or a higher sense. Fear, my Lords, is a perfectly intelligible argument in favour of anything. But, if you put aside the argument of fear, what justification remains for the Bill now before us? Is it desirable on the broad ground of general expediency? Several reasons make such a contention absolutely impossible. They are so obvious, so conclusive, so little disputed even by those against whom they press most strongly, that it would be a waste of time to enlarge upon them. There are, however, some essential features of the Bill which, in relation to the question of general expediency, we cannot afford to lose sight of. In the first place, this Bill introduces, or, if you will, confirms and establishes, a system of divided ownership. Henceforth the land of Ireland will not, in the full sense of the word, belong to anyone. The landlord will have no motive to invest capital in it, but every motive to avoid any outlay at all upon it. He will have just enough interest in it to prevent the tenant from feeling himself the owner of the land, and no more. You thus drive from the land of Ireland the very thing of which it stands most in need. You deprive it of the judicious application of capital; and you deprive it of the master's eye, which is just as necessary for the good management of the field as for the good management of the household. And this bad state of things will be made worse by another part of the measure, which is even more efficacious for mischief. You do away with freedom of contract. The land is capable of being improved in a thousand ways. The obvious and usual way of effecting such improvements is by contracts, the terms of which enable the landlord on the one hand, and the tenant on the other, to protect his interests. These are the means by which, in Ireland as elsewhere, the land must be improved, if it is to be improved at all, by those who are interested in it. No, says the Bill, you shall do no such thing. The landlord and tenant are not to be trusted to look after their own interests, or make their own bargains, except, perhaps, through the intervention of a lawsuit. But, on more general grounds of expediency, the Bill is open to most serious objection. A large part of Ireland is hardly fit for the habitation of human creatures, to say nothing of a dense population, even if the land were given to its occupiers in fee-simple. There are parts of Connemara, Donegal, and Mayo where the land is so poor that the population, if large, can live on it only at the risk, as sad experience has taught us, of famines and sufferings which have no parallel out of India. But this Bill will root to the soil a pauper population, and will thus lay the foundation for more famines, more discontent, more agitation. It will organize pauperism at one end of the social scale, it will paralyze capital at the other, and throughout the intervening grades of the whole agricultural community of Ireland it will place the peasant and proprietary classes of the country in a condition of inevitable and interminable antagonism to each other. It will convert every tenant into a potential lawsuit, every landlord into a ruthless creditor. The landlords of Ireland would be more than human if, after this Bill has passed into law, they did not exercise whatever legal rights and remedies it leaves them in the sternest commercial spirit. Henceforth, I presume, the landlords will have no inducement to tolerate bad debts; and every tenant who again falls into arrears must expect to be summarily sold up. How all this can improve the relations between the landlords and tenants, or conduce to the contentment and well-being of Ireland, I am quite unable to understand. But it would be superfluous to multiply proof of the absolute impossibility of defending or accepting this Bill on the broad ground of general expediency. To understand or discuss such a Bill as this we must quit that ground. We must altogether abandon the only ground hitherto regarded by statesmen as a sound basis for legislation, and we must try to find some other. Well, then, what are the arguments we are to accept in favour of this Bill, not on the ground of general expediency, but with special reference to the exceptional condition of Ireland? We have lately heard a great deal about justice to Ireland. Let me say at once that I look upon justice to Ireland as a national duty which cannot be evaded; but I presume that justice to Ireland requires, as its first condition, a just appreciation of the practical difference between Irish facts and Irish fictions. Much vague talk we have heard of the wrongs of Ireland, of governing Ireland by Irish ideas, of the passionate craving of the Irish peasant for the land he occupies, of the wickedness of Irish landlords, and other such topics; but it has passed my powers to condense all this vaporous language into any clear, definite, and intelligible statement of reasons for the present Bill. The justice to Ireland argument, as I understand it in reference to the present Bill, rests on two propositions. The first is this—the Irish peasantry, it is said, hate the Irish landlords, because most of the landlords are Protestants, whereas most of the peasantry are Catholics; because many of the landlords are, or because their predecessors were, absentees; because the landlords represent and are supported by the English Government, which for a length of time treated the Irish in an oppressive manner as regards both their creed and their commerce; and because the title of the Irish landlords to their land rests more or less upon confiscations, the latest of which took place about 200 years since, when, the peasantry believe, the rights of their progenitors were sacrificed. Besides this, the peasantry would exceedingly like to have the land, apart from their hatred of the landlords; and this hatred of the landlord, coupled with the love for the landlords' land, constitute, it is suggested, a justification for the present Bill so far as it aims at taking from the one class and giving to the other a portion of the proprietary rights in the soil. The second argument is that the landlords have neglected their duties as landlords, and have thus become morally, though not legally, liable to have the consequences of their default repaired at their expense. My Lords, unless all that has been spoken and written on this subject and in this sense was meant to support one or other of these two propositions, I do not see what it can have had to do with the matter. As for the first proposition, I have tried to do it justice, and if I have not stated it fairly I should feel deeply indebted to any noble Lord who will point out to me the manner in which the so-called wrongs of Ireland can be brought into any sort of logical relation to the present Bill; but, if it is fairly stated, it rests on an argument which obviously requires no answer at all. "We are Irish, you are English; or we are Catholics, you are Protestants. Therefore we hate you; and therefore, to appease our hatred, you must give us your land or your money." My Lords, in reason, in justice, in common sense, in everything except intimidation, that is no argument at all, unless this also is an argument—"I am poor and you are rich, therefore stand and deliver." That is the argument used by highwaymen in all ages. It was the argument addressed to the Jews in the Middle Ages, often with great effect; and, my Lords, I am ashamed to add that, if you put aside all phraseology and mystification, it is in truth and in fact the only intelligible argument in favour of this Bill. In my own mind there is no doubt how such an argument ought to be answered; but if it is to be accepted or entertained for a moment, allow me, at least, to remind the House of the extent to which such an argument may be carried. I do hope that the people of this country, and especially everyone who has anything to lose, will take it carefully to heart. What is to-day the fate of the landlord may be to-morrow the fate of the capitalist. If the history of 200 years is to be re-opened, mills and machinery, and money in the funds, will not be found any safer from the operation of this sort of historical justice than houses and land. I am unable to perceive any moral or material difference between the two cases. What sort of Statute of Limitation can that be which bars the one claim and treats the other as open to discussion? Either we must take the existing state of facts as we find it, and regard established rights of property as sacred, making these the basis of our legislation, or else we must open up interminable social controversies, which cannot be brought by peaceable means to anything like a satisfactory conclusion, and which may rapidly be brought far within your measurable distance of civil war. My Lords, you cannot indulge in the luxury of class legislation for Ireland, which subverts universally-established principles, without eventually raising class questions in England. You cannot invalidate the rights of property in land without weakening the security of property in other things. My Lords, for my part, I deprecate historical discussions, and the revival of ancient subjects of dispute in the practical treatment of economic questions; but when they are introduced, I think it necessary to remark that I can by no means admit that all the merits of the discussion are upon one side. By all means I would say let bygones be bygones. But if the past is to be re-opened and discussed in defence of such principles as those on which you are now legislating, the discussion will not turn entirely to the advantage of the Irish peasant and his friends. Wrongs may have been inflicted on the Irish by the English; but wrongs, and grievous ones, were inflicted on the English by the Irish. I have no wish to attempt the balancing of an account which has, no doubt, heavy items on both sides of it; but this I say with confidence—if Ireland had been allowed to become an independent nation, governed according to Irish ideas, under James II., the most glorious events in modern English history would never have happened, the greatest services rendered by England to the whole human race would never have been performed. Ireland, throughout the 18th century and downwards, would have been ruled by a race of Kings in close alliance with the most despotic and bigoted Powers on the Continent, and bitterly hostile to all that Englishmen still, I hope, recall with pride and cherish with affection. Had England thus been placed between France and Spain on the one side, and on the other, would she ever conquered Canada, or founded her and Colonial Empires? I cannot regretting that England's assent in Ireland has been so compelled Protestant ascendancy; for the position involved in it is not a theoretical but a political, one. The establishment and maintenance of that ascendancy is essential to the growth, and the well-being of this country. England has sought to establish it, and she will continue to maintain it. Much of the error on which she formerly sought to justify it was, no doubt, oppressive and unjust. I rejoice that it has been removed. But, my Lords, I maintain in what is still the great and central question at issue between English and Irish ideas, as regards the government of Ireland, English ascendancy as represented, however clumsily and harshly, the cause of reason, good sense, and general improvement; and I maintain that Irish disaffection has never been cured, and never can be represented, as which is not irreconcilably incompatible with all these. My Lords, I believe this as deeply, and believing it as I can feel any national interest in, I believe in any national principle. I implore your Lordships not to entertain the dangerous suggestion that certain laws, long since repealed, were undoubtedly unjust in one direction; therefore we ought now to violate, in the opposite direction, the very first principle of justice; or that, because several generations of Englishmen were harsh and heavy-handed in their dealings with the Irish people, we, their descendants, must now be abject, and cowardly. Our fathers, my Lords, have eaten sour grapes, and their children are set on edge. Be it so. But I will pull out our teeth merely to please persons who have set up a false standard for the vines. What position can be more irrational or more humiliating, or even say more despicable, than that of a person who allows himself, or, worse, his friend, to be plundered and treated by a little man not half his size or strength, because he is under the impression that many years ago his father did not treat the little man quite fairly about a transaction in which, after all, the little man was substantially in the wrong? I shall say no more upon the first branch of the "Justice to Ireland" argument. I now pass to the other. It is said that the present measure may be justified as a penal one, brought upon the landlords of Ireland by their own demerits. This argument has been so much discredited that I need say little about it. Indeed, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who brought this subject of the Bessborough Commission before the House a short time ago, so effectually disposed of the evidence on which it was supposed to be founded that his arguments are hardly strengthened by the Prime Minister's admission that the landlords of Ireland have been tried and acquitted. It must have been satisfactory to all your Lordships, and I hope it was satisfactory to the Irish landlords themselves, to learn from so high an authority that they have been tried and acquitted. It would, perhaps, have been more satisfactory to all of us could we have been equally assured that, in these circumstances, they are not about to be executed. We cannot, however, conceal from ourselves that, although this reckless and cruel myth about the intolerable misdeeds of Irish landlords is now practically abandoned, it had produced all the popular effects it was designed to produce before it was discredited. For years and years the alleged abominations of Irish landlords have been the favourite theme of English Radicals. Eleven years ago, Mr. Bright declared that if Ireland were 1,000 miles away from England, justice would be done, or the landlords would be exterminated by the vengeance of the people. No one can say what outrageous wrong has been done by the Irish landlords. Yet these unaltered views have prevailed in the conception of the Bill. I acknowledge that the moral duties of landowners go beyond their legal duties. It may even be right to impose upon them penalties for the neglect of duties, or to supply by law the terms omitted from contracts. If the Government had said the landlords had grossly neglected their duties, I should have been prepared to discuss such a measure on its merits. We should then have been dealing with a bond fide penal law. But to such a law this Bill bears no resemblance. It resembles no legislation ever sanctioned in cold blood by a civilized community. I have heard it said that it bears some analogy to the land legislation of Prussia during the first half of the present century. But surely this is a delusion. The entire land legislation of Prussia is one long series of emphatic protests against divided ownership, and the first result of this Bill will be to establish divided ownership. It does not openly proclaim the State's approval of that mischievous principle; but the most repulsive feature of this Bill is what I cannot help calling its dishonesty. It professes one object, and it aims at another. It persuades with the voice of Jacob, while it betrays with the hand of Esau. Its most ardent supporters are encouraged to look to it for results which its official authors do not frankly avow. Commenting on the hope expressed by an eminent social critic, that the persons who avail themselves of the Purchase Clauses of this Bill will soon find divided ownership intolerable, and contrive, in some way or other, to get rid of it altogether, a writer let the revolutionary cat out of the official bag. "For this," he exclaimed, "is just what the authors of the Bill hope also. Only it can't be done at once. There is an interval to be bridged over." My Lords, you may call this a modus vivendi. Applied to existing proprietary rights it is, of course, a modus moriendi. It may be clever management, it may be adroit policy; but I must take leave to call it insincere and dishonest legislation. And when you have bridged over your interval, when you have built your bridge, when you have crossed your bridge, when you have got to the other side of it, what will you have arrived at? The transfer of the soil of Ireland from comparative capitalists, for no better or other assignable reason than that their ancestors were Saxons or Scandinavians, to comparative paupers, only because their ancestors are supposed to have been Spaniards or Phoenicians. If the authors of this Bill suppose they can establish throughout Ireland a system of divided ownership which will not eventually result in a complete change of ownership altogether, I must say their expectation is exceedingly sanguine, and it has no warrant in experience and common sense. But if, on the other hand, they foresee and accept this consequence of their present legislation, then, considering the novelty and importance of such a purpose, surely they were bound under every obligation of fair dealing and plain speaking to write that purpose large into the title of their Bill. My Lords, I repeat, if this Bill were a bona fide penal Bill, it would, at least, be an honest one. But it is not a penal Bill. It cannot be a penal Bill, for the obvious reason that you have no evidence on which to found or to defend a penal Bill. There is nothing penal about it beyond the undoubted fact that it imposes penalties. It defines no offence, it provides no test or trial, it merely inflicts promiscuous punishment. From the familiar line in which Virgil has described the procedure of Rhadamanthus this Bill strikes out every word except the word "castigate." And Her Majesty's Ministers are virtually dealing with the landlords of Ireland just as a Judge would deal with a batch of prisoners in the dock, if he solemnly said to them—"Gentlemen, I am delighted to have the pleasure of making your acquaintance and informing you that your past lives having been carefully examined, no fault is to be found with them. A mass of evidence which was supposed to reflect on your character in some unascertained way (for I am happy to say you were never accused of anything in particular) turns out to be mostly irrelevant hearsay, and I hasten to assure you that in sentencing you to seven years' penal servitude I do not intend to say anything offensive. You leave that dock for the punishment which now awaits you without a stain on your characters." Such, in my opinion, are the only grounds on which the Bill can be justified. If all parties had loyally combined to tell the Irish people that no fundamental alteration of the Land Laws would be tolerated, our position would have been different from what it is now, and less humiliating. I well know that in 1870 the Government had no intention of taking from the Irish landlord what legally belonged to him, or of giving to the Irish tenant what he could not fairly claim. And yet, without knowing or intending it, the thing was done. You found in Ulster a custom which you rightly believed congenial to the tenants and conducive to their contentment, and you, not unnaturally, decided to legalize and extend it. But, my Lords, the legalization of custom is always a hazardous experiment. Whenever you legalize a custom you change it, and you cannot quite foresee or foretell the practical operation of the change. Your object in 1870 was to limit freedom of contract and to strengthen the hands of those who did not possess legal rights and remedies. Then, as now, you were legislating in the dark. What has been the practical result? You have not contented the tenantry in other parts of Ireland. And, for the first time in the history of Irish land agitation, you have added Ulster to the ranks of the discontented. My Lords, in connection with the fresh and more far-reaching experiment we are now asked to undertake, I cannot help recalling a somewhat remarkable speech delivered in 1869 by a gentleman, of whom we have lately heard a good deal, and who was then Mr. Serjeant Dowse. In reviewing Mr. Gladstone's great series of remedial measures for Ireland, Mr. Serjeant Dowse was so transported by his enthusiasm that his language, like that of Old Experience,

[First Night.]

[First Night.]

[First Night.]

" did attain

" To something of prophetic strain."

After observing that the Church Bill would give religious freedom, and the Land Bill agricultural security, to Ireland—

" These things accomplished," he said, " they would then have a happy, a prosperous, and a united people—happy, because no sense of injustice rankled in their breasts; prosperous, because they enjoyed the fruits of their own industry; and united, because the fell spirit of ascendancy would be banished for ever."—[3 Hansard, cxciv. 1864.]

My Lords, how have these glowing predictions been fulfilled? Where is the happiness, where the prosperity of Ireland? In harvests which cannot be reaped, rents which cannot be collected, and wares which cannot be sold? What are the trophies of your great remedial legislation? Menaced homes; mangled herds and flocks; murdered men; the more and more openly and violently expressed impatience of the majority of the Irish population to be altogether rid of English rule; and the shamefully ineffectual administration of a very severe Coercion Bill. Where, too, is the unity of the Irish people? In the files of a League openly organized for resistance to law. And there also I think we shall find, in all its force, the fell spirit of ascendancy. Meanwhile, the authors of a legislation, which has resulted in this wretched state of things, sit there unabashed on their Ministerial Benches, and apparently comfort themselves with the reflection that force is no remedy. But, my Lords, your remedies have had no force, and you are now, after all your abortive messages of peace, strengthening, to an extent unprecedented in time of peace, the military garrison of Ireland. My Lords, what confidence can we possibly repose in the capacity of physicians whose drugs we know to be compounded of the most nauseous and suspicious ingredients unused by the faculty, when we thus find that their diagnosis has been wrong from beginning to end, and that all their previous prescriptions have only aggravated by a series of inflammatory palliatives the disorder intrusted to their treatment? Really, in these circumstances, the cheerful confidence of Her Majesty's Ministers appears to me appalling. Another Bill or two of this kind will put an end to the present class of Irish landlords. When they are gone, what will be left in Ireland? A mass of peasant proprietors who for generations have been hating you intensely, and who will then regard England as a foreign country whose power and whose purpose they have already foiled, defeated, and humiliated. By what messages of peace, or what measures of coercion will you exercise any control over their passions or their proceedings? I cannot too strongly protest against the only principle which has consistently pervaded the course of Irish legislation since 1869. The present Prime Minister then told us that all Irish questions are to be regarded as grievances, growing, like so many branches, out of the trunk of a single poisonous tree.

" That tree," he said, " is Protestant ascendancy, and against Protestant ascendancy we are banded together to make war."

Is it too late to ask what you mean by the Protestant ascendancy you have resolved to destroy? Is it not an ascendancy derived from causes which give legitimate pre-eminence to any class of men in any community? Are not those the causes in which every enlightened Commonwealth rejoices to find sources of influence and power—superior property, superior probity, superior habits of intellectual discipline and social conduct, insuring greater immunity from crime and a profounder reverence for law? My Lords, I had hitherto supposed it was the boast and pride of England to represent in Europe what our Protestant kinsmen represent in Ireland—the ascendancy of a Protestant few in the midst of a Roman Catholic many—an ascendancy derived from that energetic independence of character which it is the tendency of your present legislation to destroy. My Lords, you may call this Protestant ascendancy, and think you are giving it a bad name. But history identifies it with English ascendancy. You cannot destroy the one and preserve the other. And it is against this English ascendancy that you, an English Cabinet, are banded together to make war. My Lords, in such a war I, for one, will never enlist. I am convinced that the principle on which you wage it will prove fatal for Ireland, as it has already proved calamitous and humiliating for England. But behind and beyond this miserable policy I recognize disasters worse than civil war—worse even than separation. The power of England has survived, and may again survive, many an Irish rebellion. But let England once prove false to that traditional integrity of national character which refuses to bully or to bubble a man out of what is honestly and legally his own, and England will deservedly perish, under the scorn of a civilization whose paramount interest she has betrayed.

[First Night.]

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that before being asked to vote for the Bill their Lordships ought to be told whether the Government would, for the future, discountenance the continuance of those outrages which Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright had directly encouraged.

EARL SPENCER: I regret to have to rise at so late a period of the evening, and if I trespass some short time upon your Lordships' attention, you will feel, I am sure, that I do so only on account of the vast importance of the question before us. I do not propose to follow the noble Earl who has just addressed us into the variety of subjects upon which he has touched. I will not say anything about ascendancy in Ireland, the restoration of the Protestant Church there, or the confiscations of past times. All those subjects have left their mark in Ireland. They have left, I am afraid, a great deal of ill-feeling and soreness, from which a great many of the difficulties with which we have now to deal spring. I should like to refer without further delay to the speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne). My noble Friend referred in rather a sneering way to the Purchase Clause in the Bill which is now before us, saying that it was intended to mark the dislike felt by the Government for large proprietors in Ireland. Now, I wish to say distinctly that Her Majesty's Government do not look with indifference upon this part of the Bill, or, to use the phrase of another noble Marquess, do they look upon it as merely ornamentation. They conceive that it is one of the most important means of restoring peace, quiet, and contentment to Ireland. If the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act of 1870 can be carried out in a more perfect and general manner, and if we can turn a large number of occupiers of land into proprietors, we shall be much more likely to gain recruits in the cause of law and order than by pouring into Ireland countless soldiery and constabulary. It was in the Act of 1870 that the principle contained in the Purchase Clause of this Bill was first introduced; but the clauses in that Act were not efficacious. But Her Majesty's Government hope to improve very much the working of this clause. One of the defects of the Act of 1870 was that there was no especial provision for a body of men to carry out this important work. In the Bill now before your Lordships the Land Commission are especially directed to carry out this measure. It was found in practice that the purchase of their holdings by tenants was exceedingly difficult, because it was conducted in the Landed Estates Court, and also for this reason—that it constantly happened that part of the tenants were able to pay and another part unable, so that the estate was left in a disjointed state. But the Commission will be empowered to buy estates themselves, provided a sufficient number of tenants can be found ready to purchase. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) said, with regard to this part of the Bill, that the Government did not lay great stress on it. Certainly the measure has not been in any way diminished since it was introduced into the other House with respect to those clauses. We have had to-night reference to the different systems of management of estates in England and Ireland respectively. I will dwell for a very few minutes on that part of the subject, because these differences are, to a great extent, the cause of the difficulties which have led to the necessity of dealing with the Land Question in Ireland. I do not mean to cast any blame upon the landlords of Ireland. The difference arises from the very necessity of the case. In England we have a system of large farms, where the owner finds almost all the capital necessary to work the farm. In Ireland we have a system of small farms, where it would be perfectly impossible for the landlord to do this work. Why, in Ireland there are 274,000 tenants holding under 15 acres. In Galway, Kerry, and the adjoining counties 113,000 out of 139,000 holdings are under £10 valuation. How would it be possible for the landlords dealing with these small holdings to find all the capital necessary for the equipment of these farms? My noble Friend the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Argyll), in a short debate which took place a few nights ago on cottier tenants, quoted the case of an estate where there were nearly 4,000 tenants paying £4 rent and under. Well, my Lords, how would it be possible for the landlord to make the permanent improvement on holdings? In the case quoted by my noble Friend the landlord would be ruined if he attempted such a thing without charging interest on his outlay, and the tenant would be totally unable to pay such a large addition to his rental. The fact is, that rent represents different things in the two countries. Speaking roughly, in England it represents the value of the land and the interest of the landlord's capital spent on the land. In Ireland it only represents the letting value of the land. My noble Friend opposite speaks of the landlords' improvements as being considerable. But I can quote a very high authority—that of Mr. Kavanagh—to support what I am now saying. But I will more particularly refer to the Report of an influential body of men in Dublin—the Landlords' Committee—who have circulated a statement on this subject. What do we find in the Report of this Committee? They made a survey over a great part of Ireland—over more than half that country; but that half may be taken as typical of the whole. From that Report we find that during 40 years the landlords have spent, on an average, 6½d. per acre per annum in improvements. In some cases—about one-seventh of the whole—the whole of the improvements have been effected by the landlord; in others by the tenant alone; and in the rest, partly by the landlord and partly by the tenant. I may say that the rent per acre of this large territory is about 11s. 4d., so that the average cost of the landlord's improvements is about 4½ per cent on the rental; whereas in England, on well-managed estates, the annual expenditure of the landlord on improvements varies from 10 to 25 per cent on the annual rental. It may be true that the Irish tenants have not improved their holdings as much as they might have done; but what improvements have been made have been done, at least to a large extent, by the tenants. This constitutes and creates that intense love of his holding which is the peculiar characteristic of the Irish people. It also creates that confusion between the interests of the landlord and the tenant which very often leave matters in such a tangled skein that it is almost impossible to unravel it, and to separate the interests of the landlord from those of the tenant. This is one of the reasons why it is so necessary to deal with this subject of rent. There has arisen in Ireland a peculiar custom, to which frequent reference has been made. I refer to the Ulster tenant right. Now, my Lords, I need not dwell upon all the principles of that custom, such as the power of the landlord to raise the rent, the veto which he has upon the incoming tenant, or the security of the tenant provided that he pays his rent. These highly important matters will, no doubt, be discussed in Committee. They are more or less incidents common to English tenancies; but I wish to notice an incident which specially marks the Ulster Custom—namely, the right of the tenant to sell the goodwill of his holding. Now, as far as this part of the custom goes, when exercised for the purpose of compensation for improvements made by the tenant himself, I can conceive that there can be no objection whatever to it; but when the price given goes beyond the improvements, I admit that in theory I have always seen great objection and faults in the system. The price of the tenant right beyond actual just compensation for work done and money expended seems to be money unnecessarily laid out by the tenant and money which would be useful to him for improvements or other investments. So far, my Lords, in theory I agree with those who are against the Ulster Custom; but I am bound to say that in practice the custom has worked well and is agreeable to Irish ideas. The origin of the custom is matter of dispute: but, in my opinion, it is probable that it arose in consequence of the difficulties there were in settling about the improvements made by the tenant on the farm. The tenant made improvements, and this custom in the outset sprang up from an endeavour to compensate him. I am sure the noble Duke behind me would not object to that. In practice, the Ulster Custom has worked exceedingly well. Ulster is the only part of Ireland in which anything like prosperity prevails among the people. Although there have been more evictions in Ulster than elsewhere, it has been comparatively free from the agrarian crime which usually accompanies them in other parts of Ireland. This is evidence of the smooth working of tenant right in Ulster. Changes of tenancy take place, owing to the existence of tenant right, quietly and without the violence which accompanies such changes elsewhere. Last year the proportion of crimes to convictions was two to one in Ulster, and out of Ulster, three to one. The changes the Bill introduces are founded on strict analogy to the Ulster Custom, which will be reproduced more or less in other parts of the country. It is said that certain consequences will follow; but do they exist in Ulster? Are the amenities of ownership fewer in Ulster than elsewhere? No evidence of that is to be found. The proportions of resident to non-resident proprietors are in Ulster as five to one, in Leinster three and a-half to one, in Munster three to one, and in Connaught four to one; so that in Ulster there are more resident proprietors than in other parts. These facts are worthy of our consideration, when we are told so much against the extension of tenant right to the rest of Ireland. We have heard a good deal about the confiscation of the landlord's property. It has been said that rent will be diminished, and the landlord deprived of what he ought to receive. But in Ulster, notwithstanding tenant right, the price of land has been higher than in any other parts of the country. This is proved by the evidence of Mr. Stewart Trench, before the Lords' Committee in 1867. He says—

The Earl of Lytton

[First Night.]

Earl Spencer

“I think the land in the North of Ireland with which I am acquainted is let higher in proportion to its intrinsic value, notwithstanding the tenant right which exists there, than the land in other counties which I have to deal with.”

Mr. Filgate, also Lord Downshire's agent, states—

“If there was no tenant right upon the estate he would not place a higher rent upon the farms. When putting a value upon the farm, the fact of the existence of tenant right would not induce him to impose a lower rent upon the land than he would impose supposing there was no tenant right.”

This evidence showed that the Ulster tenant right has not lowered the value of estates in that part of the country. I could quote Returns as to the sales of property throughout Ireland since 1870 to prove this. These Returns show that the prices of land sold in the Landed Estates Court during three years ending October 31, 1874, were higher in Ulster than in any other part of Ireland. I am quite aware that there may be considerable difference of opinion as to whether the Ulster tenant right custom is the outcome of the prosperity of Ulster, or the prosperity of Ulster the outcome of the Ulster tenant right. I will not give any dogmatic opinion on the subject; but I am justified in saying that there is no evidence that the landlords are driven away, that crime is greater, or land less valuable where the Ulster tenant right has existed for so many years past. Therefore, I think that all the fears with regard to this Ulster Custom in practice are not well founded. The noble Marquess opposite used some very strong expressions to-night, and told us that the Bill was the result of fear. But the noble Marquess himself answered that accusation against Her Majesty's Government, for he immediately afterwards admitted that he thought there was reason for legislation, as it had been always expected. I would like to quote an opinion which the opposite Benches will treat with considerable respect, the opinion of Master Fitzgibbon, who took the greatest interest in the Land Question, was connected through his official position with many large estates, and wrote several works on the subject. He said this—the corroding social disease of Ireland from which all others radiate is the mutual distrust of landlords and tenants. I am really afraid that this distrust is at the bottom of the necessity for all the legislation that has taken place at various times. We find it dwelt upon by the Devon Commission. I need not quote again what has been already quoted to-night, the passage where the Devon Commission points out the grave position of affairs in Ireland, owing to the great distrust which existed between landlord and tenant. That cannot be illustrated more forcibly than was done by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) the other night, when he referred to the conflicting evidence given before the Bessborough Commission. There we have landlord and tenant directly contradicting each other. Is not that a sign how much this mutual distrust exists in Ireland? Then we have the evidence of the unhappy agitation that has been going on for the last year or so. Would any of your Lordships believe that the Land League could exercise its baneful influence if there had been no sympathy among the tenants and no want of confidence in the landlords? I think it is childish to suppose that such an agitation could be carried on successfully without some grave cause of discontent. We have heard repeatedly of the various Acts to remedy this discontent; we had the Act of 1860, and the more recent legislation in 1870, which last attempt, as most persons admit, has conferred great benefits on the Irish tenantry. It legalized the Ulster tenant right, it checked capricious evictions, and gave the tenants compensation in certain cases; but its principles were not carried out to their logical conclusions. There was the famous clause by which the tenant obtained compensation whenever he was evicted, except for non-payment of rent; and what happened? It was not foreseen or intended, but a quasi-proprietary right was given to the tenant by that Act. The tenant, however, found that he lost all the benefits of the Act when the season was so bad that by no fault of his own he was unable to pay his rent, and he naturally thought himself hardly treated. It has been said that there are always quoted the cases of about half-a-dozen apocryphal landlords who unjustly raised their rent; but I think the Reports prove that the unjust raising of rent is much more common. The Bill itself has been described so often to-night that I need not dwell upon its provisions at any length. In some quarters too much stress has been laid on the power of the Court; but it should be remembered that application to the Court can only be made in the case of present tenancies, and that in many instances the tenants on well-managed estates will not wish to go to the Court. As for the right of free sale, which is taken from the Ulster Custom, it is in conformity with the wishes and habits of the Irish people, and is, in fact, the only mode in which they understand a payment for the improvements they have made in their holdings. The Court about to be established will be a court of conciliation between the tenant and the landlord. It is for the purpose of bringing about a peaceful and satisfactory solution of the question that we have for a time to resort to this exceptional mode of proceeding. I need not dwell at any length on other portions of the Bill. Some noble Lords have spoken as if the Emigration Clause was a mere farce, and not intended to have any effect. I believe the clause, which is a voluntary clause, may be of vast importance in relieving the overpopulated and poverty-stricken parts of the country. The tenant's right of selling his interest will also contribute to the same result. From Ulster, where the right already exists, there is often more emigration than from elsewhere. With regard to the clause relating to waste lands, I cannot say that I look very hopefully upon its provisions, for I believe that capital will always flow to the channel in which it is wanted; and if there had been any possibility of reclaiming waste land in Ireland to any large extent, I believe some of the surplus capital of this country would already have found an outlet in that direction. Others, however, held different views, and, consequently, we have introduced into the Bill a clause facilitating loans to public bodies for purposes of reclamation. Before I conclude I wish to say one word on a point about which we have heard a great deal. It is constantly said that compensation ought to be given to the landlords. But the Government deny that there will be any confiscation of the landlords' property, and therefore they cannot assent to the principle of compensation. When we are told of the serious responsibilities which we have undertaken in introducing this measure, it would sometimes seem as if noble Lords had forgotten the condition in which various parts of Ireland are. I will only call your Lordships' attention to one very painful sign of the sad state of that country. I allude to the sympathy that is shown with lawlessness and the prevailing antipathy to law. In many parts of the country the people have a law of their own, which they prefer to the law of the country. What is the result? That odium justly due to crime is thus perverted into sympathy with the criminal, and duty to society is overborne by what is considered as a sacred obligation to screen a fellow-sufferer from a law which they neither value nor respect. I have shown that there is need for a reform of the landlord. There is, therefore, some justice in the views of these farmers. If these views are not just, no Government ought to give way to them. If they are, I think we ought to do our utmost to reconcile the people of Ireland to the laws and excite their sympathy instead of their antipathy. My Lords, this Bill is exceptional in its character, but it is not more exceptional than the condition of Ireland. The measure is a strong one; if it were weaker it would have no effect in Ireland. It is necessary to reconcile landlord and tenant in Ireland; it is necessary to create a permanent, sound, and cordial good will between the Irish and the English nations; it is necessary if we are to maintain the Union between the two countries by peaceable means, and not by armed force. I sincerely trust that your Lordships will not only give a second reading to the Bill, but send it to the other House of Parliament without any material alteration.

Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(The Duke of Argyll.)

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

SHOP HOURS REGULATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to regulate the hours of labour in shops and warehouses—Was presented by The Earl STANHOPE; read 1st. (No. 191.)

House adjourned at half past One o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

Earl Spencer

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 1st August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [July 29] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Savings Banks and Post Office Savings Banks, and Securities in Chancery Division; East Indian Loans, Annuities, &c. *.

Ordered—First Reading—Irish Church Act Amendment * [235].

First Reading—Universities (Scotland) Registration of Parliamentary Voters, &c. * [232]; British Honduras (Court of Appeal) * [233]; Pedlars (Certificates) * [234].

Select Committee—Report—Conveyancing and Law of Property [No. 96].

Committee—Report—Regulation of the Forces [193]; Wild Birds Protection Act (1880) Amendment [226]; Superannuation (Post Office and Works) * [228].

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Amendment * [216], and passed.

Third Reading—Public Works Loans * [211], and passed.

Withdrawn—Augmentation of Benefices Act Amendment * [68]; Educational Endowments (Scotland) * [65]; Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention (re-comm.) * [120]; Entailed Estates Conversion (Scotland) * [203]; Imprisonment for Debt Abolition * [170]; Boiler Explosions * [39].

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND POLICE—FLOWER SELLERS IN ISLINGTON.

MR. CARINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of two poor women who were charged by the police at Islington Police Court on the 20th of July 1881 and fined sixpence and four shillings costs for causing an obstruction by selling flowers in High Street, Islington; whether it is true that women have been in the habit of selling flowers at that same spot for the last twenty-five years, and that the women did not occupy any part of the pavement, but only stood in the gutter; whether he will inform the House why, if any obstruction really exists, the tradesmen of that locality whose goods are displayed on the pavement, thereby causing a great obstruction to foot passengers and also temptation to theft, were not summoned also; and, whether he will issue orders to the police not to interfere with these poor women in the future and thereby prevent them from earning an honest living, and, in the case of one of them, from supporting her aged parent and her family?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that since the hon. Member had given Notice of the Question he had had an opportunity of inquiring into it, and he found that summonses were issued as stated in the Question; but that it was on the application of the shopkeepers in the neighbourhood, which, in the particular spot mentioned, was very crowded, and it was complained that the baskets that were put there interfered with the narrow footway. There had been proposals made to the women who sold flowers there to take a station at a spot not very far distant. That, however, they did not seem disposed to adopt; other summonses had consequently been issued. He had communicated with the police on the subject, and they, as well as himself, were averse to persons engaged in these harmless occupations being interfered with. The Chief Superintendent of Police had communicated with the President of the London Flower Brigade Mission, and it was hoped that, with the co-operation of the Mission, the flower girls would be induced to remove to new stations selected for them. In the meantime the summonses had been withdrawn.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (IRELAND) LEGISLATION.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is his intention, during the coming Recess, to prepare a Bill dealing with the Endowed Schools of Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Report of the Commissioners would be considered; but as he could not tell what would be the General Business or the Irish Business of next Session, he could not say at what time a Bill would be introduced.

INDIA — PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES IN CALCUTTA.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that six Protestant missionaries have been or are about to be put upon their trial for open air preaching in Calcutta; and, whether he and Lord Ripon approve the action of the Government of Bengal in endeavouring to suppress this form of work by Protestant missionaries which has hitherto been unmolested?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that no official information on the subject referred to had been received at the India Office; but on reference to the Indian newspapers he found that three Protestant missionaries had been prosecuted in the Magistrate's Court at Calcutta for disobeying an order of the Commissioner of Police prohibiting the holding of open air preaching in the enclosed squares of Calcutta, except by permission in writing. The magistrate, on July 3, decided that the Commissioner of Police was not legally empowered to make such an order, and that in doing so he had acted ultra vires. Other missionaries were summoned on a similar charge; but the cases against them had not been brought forward. Since the judgment of the magistrate was delivered, the Calcutta Missionary Conference had communicated with the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, who had replied in a conciliatory spirit, proposing an amicable discussion of the subject with a view, if possible, of reconciling all conflicting interests and securing the maintenance of peace and order during preaching in the enclosed squares of Calcutta. Although he had received no official information, he had heard very fully in an unofficial manner from the Viceroy in reference to those proceedings. The action taken by the police and municipal authorities was in no way instigated by the Viceroy or the Indian Government. The Viceroy, in fact, knew nothing of the proceedings until he read an account of them in the newspapers, and he had done all in his power to promote a friendly settlement of the matter, which he hoped would now be arrived at.

ARMY—HEAVY RIFLED ORDNANCE—CASE OF MR. LYNALL THOMAS.

MR. LEAKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has read a Petition presented to the House by Mr. Lynall Thomas begging that his claims in connection with the invention and introduction into the services of large rifled guns may be referred to a Select Committee of the House; and, whether he will, in consideration of all the circumstances of the case, accede to an investigation, as prayed for by Mr. Thomas, and thereby terminate a litigation which appears to have impoverished that gentleman without securing for him the compensation awarded by a special jury in the suit of Thomas v. the Queen tried before the Chief Baron in February 1877, and amounting in full to £8,790 11s. 6d.?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I asked my hon. Friend to postpone until to-day this Question, which he originally put down at short Notice for the 25th of July, and I have thus been able to read carefully the shorthand-writer's notes of the trial before the late Lord Chief Baron in February, 1877, and the arguments and judgment of the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench in June, 1877. The facts are, shortly, these. Mr. Lynall Thomas claimed to have originated certain improvements in heavy ordnance, and he sought to have certain expenses, incurred in 1854 and subsequent years, reimbursed to him, together with a payment for the value of his invention. After repeated refusals on the part of successive Secretaries of State, he commenced proceedings at law against the War Department, and in March, 1877, obtained a verdict for £6,500, a portion of the expenses which he stated he had incurred, and was entitled to recover, under a contract with the War Office. In June, 1877, the War Office applied to the Full Court to set aside the verdict on the ground that no such contract existed, and that the verdict was against the evidence, and the Full Court unanimously decided that no contract existed so as to entitle Mr. Thomas to prefer any claim against the Crown, and they let it to Mr. Thomas to appeal. He has not appealed, and the judgment is, therefore, final. My hon. Friend now asks me whether I will accede to an investigation of the subject by a Select Committee of the House of Commons. I regret that I cannot consent to this course. Mr. Thomas has, in my opinion, no claim, legal or equitable, on the Exchequer; and if, out of compassion for him, a Committee were appointed to review the decisions of the responsible Ministers of the Crown, commencing in 1860, and of the High Court of Justice four years ago, the House would be called upon by the shoals of speculative inventors who have made claims on the War Office and Admiralty to extend the same compassion to them, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, to refuse them what was granted to Mr. Thomas.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT, 1878— THE DECIMAL SYSTEM.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware that, although many of the principal jewellers and silversmiths have complied with the provisions of "The Weights and Measures Act, 1878," whereby the adoption of a decimal system of weights, with the ounce troy and grain as bases, was made compulsory on jewellers and silversmiths, no effort has been made to enforce this provision generally; and, whether he will direct measures to be taken either to repeal the section, or compel its uniform observance?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had been requested by his right hon. Friend to reply to this Question. The adoption of the troy system of weights for certain articles was made permissive, not compulsory, by the 20th section of the Act referred to in the Question of the hon. and learned Member. He had no power to enforce the uniform adoption of the principle, nor did he think it desirable.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS— REPORTED MAGISTRATES.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Attorney General, If all the justices of the peace whom the Lord Chancellor recently called upon to show cause why they should not be removed from the Bench in consequence of corrupt practices in connection with Parliamentary Elections, have now either resigned or been struck off the roll; and, if so, if he will lay upon the Table a complete list of them?

MR. T. COLLINS asked whether it was the intention to publish a list of these magistrates?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, it had been decided that 28 Justices of the Peace had been guilty of corrupt practices in connection with Parliamentary Elections, and one death reduced the number to 27. Of that number, 25 had been directed by the Lord Chancellor that their names should be removed from the Commission of the Peace, and of these 14 had resigned. Several of the other cases, for good and sufficient reasons, were under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor. In answer to the Question whether he would lay on the Table a complete list of those Justices who had resigned or been struck off the rolls, he would say that complete lists of the names of those Justices had already been published in the districts in which they exercised jurisdiction, and it was known in those localities that they had received this practical censure from the Lord Chancellor; and, as there might be very different degrees in the breaches of the law which they had committed—many of them being of a purely technical character—he must say that he did not think it would be fair to lay on the Table a full list, inasmuch as to do so would be to presumably include in the same category all the offending Justices, without reference to the relative gravity of the offences which they had committed. He thought they had already received sufficient punishment without the additional disgrace of being thus placed together. If, however, the hon. Member wished to move for a Return of the names, he was in a position to do so, and then it would be for the House to take upon itself a responsibility which he (the Attorney General) did not see his way to assuming.

MR. HEALY wished to ask whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that 200 persons were now incarcerated in Ireland without any trial, and that no distinction was made between John Dillon or any of the remainder?

MR. J. COWEN asked if all the prosecutions contemplated had been instituted, and if the Attorney General could state how many had resulted in a conviction?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that all the prosecutions had been proceeded with that it was intended to take, except two cases of poor persons at Sandwich, who were stated to have emigrated, or, at least, there seemed no way of making them amenable. He would not enter into a complicated account of what had taken place at Boston; but there had been one conviction, in two cases the jury had been discharged without a verdict, and in one instance no service of summons could be effected, and although a warrant had been issued, this had so far been unsuccessful in arresting the party. There had been nine charges in connection with the Sandwich Election, and in all cases verdicts of guilty had been returned. In Macclesfield there were two, and verdicts of guilty in each case.

INDIA—(FINANCE, &c.)—ANNUITIES AND FURLOUGH PAY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact, as stated in the "Statesman" of 1st July, 1881, that, during the year 1878-9, more than three millions sterling were paid from the Revenues of India to persons not resident in India as annuities and furlough pay; and, whether the Government will take any steps to diminish this annual drain on the Indian taxpayers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the sum mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member was accurate; but he must point out that, in the case of covenanted servants, a large portion of the pensions had been paid by the persons who received them in the shape of a percentage of 4 per cent upon their incomes during the whole period of their service. The whole question of these charges had been referred to a Committee of Council for investigation and report, and it was found that it was not possible materially to reduce "this annual drain" on the Revenues of India. The only way in which this charge could be hereafter reduced would be the further employment in important positions of Natives of India. Several suggestions on that subject had been made from time to time by the Home Government to the Government of India; and no opportunity would be lost of impressing the importance of this upon them.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether any appreciable progress had been made in the direction of employing Natives of India in important positions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that undoubtedly progress was being made in that direction.

INDIA—OUTBREAK OF PRISONERS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that an outbreak has occurred in the gaol of Gulburga, in which a large number of native prisoners and Sepoys have been killed and wounded ; and, whether he can state the exact number of casualties, and what steps are being taken to ascertain the causes of the outbreak ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that Gulburga Gaol was in the Native State of Hyderabad, and belonged to the Nizam, and that no official Report had been received on the subject.

EGYPT—THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What measures have been proposed by the Government of France for improving the judicial system in Egypt ; and, whether these proposals have been made in concert with England and the other Powers now represented upon the judicial tribunals in Egypt ?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE : No, Sir ; no such measures have as yet been proposed ; but Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the Government of France, are engaged at the present time in examining the result of the labours of the International Commission with a view to offer any observations that they may have to submit thereupon before the re-assembling of the Commission in November.

AFGHANISTAN—BRITISH ASSISTANCE TO THE AMEER OF CABUL.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for India, To be good enough to state to the House in general terms the total amount of assistance—in money, guns, military stores, or otherwise,—that has been afforded, out of British and Indian resources, up to the present time, to Abdurrahman, Ameer of Cabul ; and, whether it is intended, now that his army has been so completely defeated in the neighbourhood of Candahar, to afford the Ameer any further assistance of the same description, or to employ Anglo-Indian forces in Afghanistan ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had no objection to repeat the information which he gave to the House on the 27th of June. The money given to the Ameer was 39½ lakhs of rupees, which included 9½ lakhs found in the Treasury at Cabul in October, 1879. A further sum of 50,000 rupees a month was paid to the Ameer as Governor of Candahar for six months after the evacuation. In addition to this, war materials had on various occasions been given to the Ameer—first, four 18-pounder smooth-bore guns, two 8-inch howitzers, 12 9-pounder breech-loading field guns, and 22 mountain guns, all of Afghan manufacture, and forming part of the war material taken from the Afghans at Cabul. They were given to Abdurrahman on our evacuation of Cabul. We also gave him, in March, 1881, 100 cartridges per gun for 9,182 muskets and rifles already in the Ameer's possession, and 3,000 Enfield rifles, and three smooth-bore batteries of 18 guns, were given to the representatives of the Ameer on the evacuation of Candahar by the British troops in April last. As far as the last part of the Question was concerned, he had no reason to believe that the Government of India had any intention to afford to the Ameer any further assistance of the same description, nor had he any reason to suppose that there was any intention—at all events, no proposition had been made by the Government of India to the Home Government—to employ an Anglo-Indian force in Afghanistan.

CHANNEL ISLANDS—THE ISLAND OF GUERNSEY AND THE BURIAL ACT.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps have been taken to bring the Burial Act of 1880 into operation in the Island of Guernsey ; and, when it is likely the inhabitants will have the benefit of the measure, of which they have been deprived for nearly twelve months, by the refusal of the local authorities to obey the Order in Council requiring them to register the Act ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he was sure the hon. Member would feel that the peculiar constitution of the Channel Islands, and their loyal inhabitants, was one which required to be treated with great consideration, and he hoped in Guernsey to overcome the difficulties which had arisen in regard to this measure as they had been overcome in Jersey, by the good feeling of all parties concerned.

THE HISTORICAL MSS. COMMISSION.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What progress is being made by the Historical MSS. Commission; why there was no Report last year; and, when the next Report will be presented?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, since the issuing of the first Commission in 1869, about 500 collections of manuscripts of historical interest have been examined and reported upon by the Commissioners. Accounts of the contents of most of these collections have been published in seven Reports. An eighth Report is now in type, and will, I am told, be presented before the end of the Session. It will contain more, and more varied, historical information than any of its predecessors; also an alphabetical list of all the collections examined since the issuing of the Commission. No Report was issued last year, because the terms of the Commission do not require one to be issued annually.

INDIA—CHARGES AGAINST HYAT KHAN.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that Hyat Khan, a member of the Indian Civil Service, is about to be tried on charges of selling his protection to natives of Afghanistan during the occupation of Kabul by General Roberts; whether there has been already a private investigation into the charges against Hyat Khan; whether the trial will be public; and, what steps, if any, the Indian Government have taken to obtain evidence in connection with the case?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the Government have already instituted a confidential inquiry into certain charges of extortion and corruption which have been brought against Hyat Khan, who was in our political employment at Cabul, and they have now decided that the whole matter shall be subjected to a formal and public investigation, which will be conducted by Mr. Smith, Judge of the Chief Court of the Punjab. We have no information as to the steps likely to be taken to secure the presence of witnesses from Cabul. It is not a matter with which the Home Government of India could properly interfere.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether it was true that the charges of corruption and extortion against Hyat Khan were founded on the fact that he had sold his protection as Political Agent to the Natives while Cabul was in a state of siege?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The charges of corruption and extortion brought against Hyat Khan were various in their character, and I cannot say, without reference to Papers, whether they include the exact point mentioned by the hon. Member. They were, however, no doubt, of a very serious character. No doubt, it is of great importance that witnesses should be brought from Cabul; but as the Indian Government have determined to have a public inquiry into the matter, I have no doubt that they will take the necessary steps to secure that the inquiry shall be full and satisfactory. It would be obviously improper for me to say anything further on the matter at the present moment.

POST-OFFICE PILLAR BOXES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Postmaster General, Whether the regulations as to posting newspapers are different for town and for suburban pillar-boxes; and, if so, whether he will cause the necessary information as to the facilities afforded to be printed on the latter?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that the restrictions upon posting newspapers in town pillar-boxes had been imposed to prevent the boxes being blocked with newspapers and book parcels. An intimation, however, that newspapers could be posted had been placed on some suburban pillar-boxes, but not on others; but he would inquire whether any harm would result from an extension of that practice.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE 79TH REGIMENT.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Is it in contemplation to add the 79th Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders to the Scots Guards as a third battalion?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir, it is not.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—ARTICLES 106, 107.

MAJOR-GENERAL FEILDEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether general officers retired under Article 107 (of New Warrant) for non-employment, should not, equally with those retired under Article 106 for age, be eligible for the appointment of Honorary Colonelcies of Regiments?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; this will be made quite clear in the corrigenda warrant.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether persons now imprisoned on suspicion in Ireland under warrants of the Lord Lieutenant will be allowed to be present, either personally or by counsel, at the investigations into the causes of imprisonment which the Lord Lieutenant is directed by the statute to hold, in every case, at the end of three months from the arrest; and, whether, if the persons imprisoned are not allowed to appear, either personally or by counsel, what guarantee, if any, will be afforded that these investigations will be adequate to the occasion, and not mere official formalities?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he believed that Mr. Boyton, one of the prisoners in Kilmainham Gaol, was in a bad state of health, and that he had ordered a careful inquiry to be made, especially with regard to his eyesight. He could not undertake that the prisoners or their counsel should be present while their cases were being reconsidered. The hon. Member would remember that this question was discussed by the House while the Act was passing, and that it had been decided by a large majority not to allow such a privilege. The cases would all be carefully considered, but to do more would be contrary to the spirit of the Act.

BRITISH COMMERCIAL TREATY ENGAGEMENTS.

MR. JACKSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If there are any Commercial Treaty engagements with this Country which are not terminable on twelve months' notice; and, if so, if he will specify them?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the only Commercial Treaties concluded by this country which are not terminable on 12 months' notice are those with Salvador, Roumania, and Servia, the first of which terminates in 1883 and the two latter in 1890. The Treaties concluded by this country with Turkey and Tunis may be revised in 1882. The Tariff and Commercial Articles of the Treaty of Peace with China can be revised in 1888. These Treaties limit us to no engagements as to Tariffs, but only to give most-favoured nation treatment. By the Treaty, however, with Germany, which is terminable on 12 months' notice, we are bound to place no duty upon the exportation of coal.

Major-General Fielden

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) —THE COURT OF SESSION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the extreme inconvenience caused by a vacancy in the Court of Session remaining unfilled, and to the strong feeling prevalent in Scotland on the subject; and, whether he will take into consideration the reasonableness of putting an end to uncertainty and delay by appointing to the vacant Judgeship before the meeting of the Court in October?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with regard to the vacant Scotch Judgeship, the case stands thus. It is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that the Judicial Bench in Scotland is over-manned, and that the number of Judges would very beneficially admit of being reduced by two. For the purpose of giving effect to this view, the Government introduced a Bill into the other House of Parliament; but difficulties have been experienced there, and, in consequence, this advantageous change cannot at present be accomplished. Under these circumstances, we have reluctantly been obliged to ask ourselves whether it was consistent with the provisions of the present law to keep the existing vacancy open until another year arrives. But our opinion is that that would be a straining of the law, and although we are very sorry to have to make this appointment, yet upon the whole we think it our duty to do so. Consequently, an appointment will be made.

AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS).

MR. O'DONNELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to a proclamation of General Roberts, dated 13th October, 1879, promising a reward of fifty rupees for every Afghan soldier who had fought against the British troops since the 3rd of the previous month; a reward of seventy-five rupees for every Afghan captain or subaltern officer; and a reward of one hundred and twenty rupees for every Afghan field officer; if he can state what was the total amount distributed in rewards for these purposes; and, whether such amount was charged to the British or to the Indian contribution to the expenses of the Afghan War?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The attention of the Government has been called to the proclamation referred to in the hon. Member's Question. It was contained in a Blue Book (No. 1) on Afghanistan, published in 1860. In consequence, however, of the change in the aspect of affairs at Cabul within some days of the issue of that proclamation, it was practically never acted upon in the sense of the Question of the hon. Member. I have the personal authority of Sir Frederick Roberts to say that no payments were ever made under that proclamation.

VALUATION (IRELAND)—TOWN PARKS.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can state what shape the inquiry into the question of town parks in Ireland, promised during the Recess, will take?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was not certain whether it could be called an inquiry, but the Government had the subject under their consideration, and he believed that by the ordinary means they had at their disposal they would have abundant means of getting at a knowledge of the facts. At the same time, they did not wish to discourage any hon. Member from asking for information on the subject in any form he desired.

MR. HEALY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would have any objection to include in the promised Return on this subject the amount of the valuation and rental of town park holdings?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was glad of the opportunity of suggesting that if hon. Members would either draw up a form of return, or would state distinctly the exact particulars of the information they required, he would see whether he could supply it. At present, however, he was waiting for particulars himself.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—(NEGOTIATIONS)—THE CONVENTION WITH THE BOERS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information with reference to the signing of the Convention with the Boers; and, if so, whether he is in a position to give the House any information on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: No information in reference to the subject has reached me; and, therefore, I presume that none can have arrived.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETUYWAYO.

MR. W. FOWLER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the expenses arising from the imprisonment of Cetewayo, ex-King of the Zulus, are defrayed by the English Government; and, if so, from what fund, as no such item appears to be mentioned in the Estimates?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the cost of maintaining Cetuywayo will be provided for by a Supplementary Estimate to be presented this Session. It could not conveniently have been included in the Original Estimates, because, at the time of their preparation, several points connected with it were still uncertain.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked what course was intended to be pursued with the Educational Endowments Bill, seeing that the Act of 1868 expired yesterday; and as the matter was very urgent, and there were nine Notices of Motion on the Paper, whether the Prime Minister did not consider it advisable to take the second reading of the Bill to-night before half-past twelve o'clock?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this Bill is in a peculiar position, inasmuch as present appearances are certainly those of considerable difference of opinion and opposition in regard to it. We are very reluctant, indeed my hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate is exceedingly reluctant, to drop the Bill if he thinks he has a reasonable chance of persevering with it. He thinks it a valuable measure, and is very anxious that it should be passed, and we cannot as yet quite form an opinion whether, this Bill relating exclusively to Scotland, the discussion could be confined within such limits as to enable him to persevere with it. Certainly they must reserve it for consideration.

AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS).

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, with reference to his former statement, Whether the British garrison at Chaman has been strengthened, or whether the troops have been retired from that post, leaving the Khojak Pass unprotected, or whether they have been retired from the Pishin Valley, and are concentrated at Quettah?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I did not make any particular statement on the subject, not having received information from the Government of India. I have no information as to what movements have been made by the force under the command of General Hume, and do not know whether Chaman is occupied or whether it has been strengthened. I infer, however, from the telegrams that a British force is still at Chaman.

AFFAIRS OF EGYPT.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Khedive of Egypt, in view of a contemplated revolt of troops at Cairo, has asked for the protection of a joint army of French and British troops, or protection either from the French or the British Government; and, if so, whether he will communicate to the House the reply of the British Government, with any correspondence that may have passed on the subject between the British and the French Governments.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, it is not the case that the Khedive has made any communication of the kind to Her Majesty's Government, nor, so far as we are aware, to the French Government. The Government have no information whatever to that effect. The last portion of the Question, therefore, falls to the ground. There has been no correspondence on the subject at all.

Mr. Gladstone

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked, Whether Earl Granville has received any answer from Lord Lyons relative to the remonstrance he made to the French Government in a recent letter with respect to the inconvenience which might arise from the protection of Tunisian subjects in Egypt by France?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, no answer has been received up to the present time, but the matter has not been lost sight of. We understand that all those persons at present are being treated as Turkish subjects.

WAYS AND MEANS — TERMINABLE ANNUITIES—LEGISLATION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Prime Minister, Whether he intended to introduce a Bill this Session to carry out the views of the Treasury on the subject of terminable annuities?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the explanatory Minute has been laid on the Table, and we hope to take the Resolution to-night.

MR. ANDERSON gave Notice that, when the Bill was introduced, considering the extreme impropriety of bringing in a Bill on the subject at a late period of the Session, he would move a Resolution to the effect that, however expedient it might be to convert £2,000,000 of Terminable Annuities, it would be more for the benefit of the people and for the prosperity of this country and of India to devote the surplus in reducing the duty on tea and coffee.

ARMY RECRUITING—THE 53RD REGIMENT.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he had seen the following statement in The Times of to-day:—

“The 53rd Regiment, stationed at Chatham, has been ordered to be brought up to its full strength. It is one of the first regiments to embark for foreign service. The regiment was about 400 below the strength, and to fill up the majority of the vacancies, a party of volunteers from the 1st Battalion 14th Regiment, at Portland, and another batch of about 190 from the 52nd, at Chatham, have joined the regiment;”

and whether that statement was not in opposition to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman in bringing forward the Army Estimates?

MR. CHILDERS said, that, not having seen the statement, he could not answer the Question off-hand; but he might explain that it was necessary to take the course referred to in the meantime in order to make up the strength of the First Army Corps, and that it was not inconsistent with what he had said as to the operation of the new system when it was once established.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether the Prime Minister would give facilities for the discussion of a Motion for the imposition of retaliatory duties against certain countries having protective duties?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am unable to give a day for the discussion of the Motion of which the hon. Gentleman has given Notice. I beg now to move—

“That for the remainder of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions on Tuesday, Government Orders having priority, and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesday.”

The only argument that is necessary for this Resolution is the statement that it is now the 1st of August, and the House met on the 6th of January. I may justly be asked what course the Government intend to take with regard to measures still pending, and which have given rise to indications that they will involve considerable discussion. I am very sorry to see that the Rivers Conservancy Bill, which has been viewed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board as a measure of importance and practical utility, is, nevertheless, a subject of controversy, and, considering the very late period of the Session, we are compelled reluctantly to abandon it. Then there is the Augmentation of Benefices Bill, with which we shall not be able to proceed. I do not know there is any other Bill, on which we are at present aware, on which there will be any general or prolonged discussion. With regard to the Notice just given by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), if I understand him right, he hints at this period of the Session it is too late for the discussion of a measure which introduces any new principle; and yet he does not think it too late to decide that instead of reducing the debt we ought to apply the money to a reduction of the duty on tea and coffee. On the point, however, which he has raised, I must ascertain what is the general feeling of the House. Viewing the pledge given by the Government to use all its available means for putting forward Supply, we are desirous to redeem that pledge in the best manner possible. We have considered the best means of putting Supply forward with despatch, and, consequently, we do not propose that the House should have Morning Sitings.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That for the remainder of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion on Tuesday, Government Orders having priority; and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesday.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Lord Advocate if he intended to proceed with the Entailed Estates Conversion (Scotland) Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, in reply, that there was no reasonable prospect of passing the measure, and, therefore, it would not be proceeded with.

MR. ANDERSON said, that in reference to the Motion just made, and the remarks of the Prime Minister on the question of Terminable Annuities, he would like to make one or two observations. The right hon. Gentleman said there was no new principle in bringing in a Bill of this kind. Perhaps not; but they were carrying out a very important principle, which the country knew nothing about, and which there was no opportunity of discussing in any way.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member must be aware that it was irregular on the present Motion to discuss a Bill not before the House.

MR. MONK said, he did not rise to say anything against the proposal of the Prime Minister, but wished to remind him that the first Order of the Day for Wednesday week was the adjourned debate on the Motion with regard to the half-past 12 o'clock Rule. That Motion had been adjourned in consequence of a misunderstanding between the two Front Benches, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to afford him facilities for taking the decision of the House on his Resolution.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he would communicate with the hon. Member.

MR. J. COWEN said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the Resolution of the Prime Minister. He knew that every Member of the House would welcome the termination of a prolonged, harassing, and wearisome Session. What he was desirous of doing was to briefly call attention to the state of Business. The House usually sat 26 weeks in a year; but it had already been in Session now for 30 weeks. The Votes in Supply numbered 193. Of these 53 had been taken, and 140 had still to be got. What he wished hon. Members to realize was that in 30 weeks they had disposed of 50 Votes, and in the next few days they would be compelled to hurry through the remainder—the 140. Under any circumstances, and at any time, the Business of Supply was conducted in a very fluctuating, uncertain, and irregular manner. But it was absolutely beyond the power of Members to apply themselves with business-like assiduity to the granting of all the money at such a late period of the year, and under such circumstances as those in which they were now placed. For all practical purposes, the Government were about to get the major portion of the Revenue of the country without criticism or control. He had referred to the Records of the House, and, as far as he could make out, there was not a Session for the last quarter of a century or more where Supply had been so hopelessly in arrear. There was only one occasion when the condition approximated to what it was now, and that was in 1870. He knew hon. Gentlemen excused the authorities by saying that the present Session was exceptional. ["Hear, hear!"] He was pleased to gather from their applause that hon. Gentlemen on both side of the House, and belonging to all Parties, agreed with his statement. There was no doubt that the Session was exceptional—one of the most exceptional in the history of Parliament. But, unfortunately, as far as the voting of Supply was concerned, every Session was exceptional. All the arrangements made by Ministers, whether Liberal or Conservative, were to curtail the powers which the Representatives of the people had in controlling the National Expenditure. The duties they were charged to perform were two-fold. First, they had to make the laws of the country; second, they had to assist in the administration of its affairs, and transact the general Business of the State. In his judgment the latter duty was the more important. It was always urgent, and it should have primary consideration. At the commencement of every Session the Ministers should submit a statement of the money they required. Parliament should apply itself to inquiring into the amounts thus named; and, having given the necessary consideration, should vote them. The time left after the business-like discharge of this function should go to making new laws or amending old ones. This was the old theory of the Constitution, and it was the soundest and the best. But they reversed that plan. They commenced the Session by making laws, and when they terminated the Session they were still busy with the same process. Just before the close—a few days prior to the Prorogation—the Estimates, containing hundreds, or rather thousands, of items, were thrown upon the Table, and they were compelled to vote them, practically without debate. Again and again this unsatisfactory state of things had been alluded to, but there was never so gross a case as the present. He hoped that the Government next Session would endeavour to mend matters by submitting the Estimates as soon as the House met, and, notwithstanding previous refusals, agree to appoint a Committee which should have the power of calling before it the Heads of the different Departments. With such a Committee, and with such information, the work of Supply might be greatly lightened. The Report submitted by the Committee would obviate the necessity for a good deal of the detailed conversation they had in that House, and altogether it would further the Business of the country. It was not his desire to object to the Resolution of the Prime Minister, or to prolong the discussion; but he was anxious to avail himself of the opportunity to point out in what way and to what extent the first function of Parliament was year after year set aside, if not altogether overridden.

Mr. Monk

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had done good service in calling attention to the condition of the Votes in Supply. He rose, however, to ask whether they were to understand from the statement of the Prime Minister that the Government now intended to proceed with Supply de die in diem, and in preference to any legislative measures? He thought they were right in taking Afternoon instead of Morning Sittings. There were six principal classes of Votes in the Civil Service Estimates which they had not yet touched at all. They might also fairly now expect to receive from the Government some intimation as to the time at which they anticipated they would be in a position to close the Session. It was usual, when demands like the present were made on the time of the House, for the Government to make some communication on that subject. As to the Bills before the House, it was quite understood that there were some that it was absolutely necessary to proceed with; but there were still one or two respecting which there was some doubt as to the decision of the Government. He therefore wished to know what course was to be taken with the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill?

MR. GREGORY asked whether a Resolution was to be moved that night in regard to Terminable Annuities?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that whether the Tories or Liberals were in power, the same thing always happened in regard to India. Again, the discussion on the Indian Budget was not only put off, but was not even mentioned. Surely, with a population seven times more numerous than that of the United Kingdom, and an area 12 times greater, and a Revenue approaching to that of the United Kingdom, the affairs of such a vast Empire well deserved a day for discussion. He wished, therefore, to ask the Prime Minister when he expected that the Indian Budget would come on, and whether the assistance to be given to India from the Imperial Exchequer would be given in instalments or in a lump sum?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had been requested by his right hon. Friend to answer a question put as to the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill. The Government were, of course, desirous to proceed with that Bill, but they felt that in the existing circumstances they were not able to make that progress with measures for Scotland which they and the Scotch Members would desire. They had reason to believe that this Bill was one which the great majority of the Scotch Members wished to see passed, and, if that were so, he should think there would be no difficulty in passing it in the present Session, and the Government would certainly do all they could to facilitate that result. On the other hand, if a large number of Scotch Members were adverse to the Bill proceeding this Session, the Government would not press it on against their wish.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he regretted that the Prime Minister had not offered him an opportunity for bringing forward a subject which was far more important than the unfortunate Land Bill, about which no man in England cared a straw. It could not be denied that the question of Free Trade, Reciprocity, and retaliatory Protective duties excited a strong feeling out-of-doors.

MR. RAMSAY said, that the Educational Endowments Bill was a measure which the majority of the Scotch Members desired to see passed into law. They approved its principle; but a great number of them were opposed to proceeding with it at this period of the Session. In their opinion—he did not say whether it was his opinion or not—the measure could not now be adequately discussed, because it would be necessary that there should be an interval between the second reading and the date fixed for the Committee, in order to give the country and the people of Scotland an opportunity of judging of the Amendments to be submitted for the consideration of the Government and the House. It was, he believed, on that ground that a large number of Scotch Members, certainly the majority of those now in London, recently presented a Memorial to the Prime Minister, asking him to forego the Bill this Session. Twenty-four Members signed the Memorial to that effect, and although the right hon. Gentleman said he hoped to take the Bill this Session he did not fix a day for it. The majority of hon. Members had been in attendance for more than seven months; and at this period of the Session they might expect to be relieved from all uncertainty as to the progress of any measure, and to have a specific day fixed for the second reading, whether it ever got through any further stage or not.

DR. CAMERON said, he was sorry that the Prime Minister had not given a little more definite information. The House had been sitting from a very early period, and if only the most necessary Business were now transacted, it would be obliged to sit until a very late period. He did not know that the Scotch Members deserved to be treated any worse than any other section of the House; but he thought it was treating them very badly to keep them hanging on night after night, and refuse to say even whether the Bill was to be proceeded with or not. He approved—as a good many of the Scotch Members did—of the principle of the Bill; but they disapproved of details, and the discussion of those details would certainly occupy one good Sitting. If the Government proposed to proceed with it, by all means let them have a discussion, and the Scotch Members were quite willing to go on with it; but if it was not to be so—and he saw no prospect of its being done—the Government ought not to keep the Scotch Members dangling on, not knowing whether the Bill was to be taken or not. The Memorial to which reference had been made stated that the Memorialists approved of the principle of the Bill, but thought it expedient that it should be left over till next Session, and the 24 Members who signed that Memorial did not at all exhaust the number of Scotch Members who were of the same opinion. There was no doubt that at a time like this, however willing the Government might be to proceed with the Bill, it was utterly impossible that they would be able to do so, and therefore they would do well to defer it at once.

MR. DALRYMPLE observed, that a large number of Scotch Members sat on the Ministerial side of the House, and if they could not bring influence to bear on the Government in reference to this subject, it was not likely that anything falling from him would have that effect; but if the Government really intended to press the Bill this Session, they should name a time at which they would be disposed to take it. If the Government fixed on a night on which they could report Progress in Supply at a certain hour to proceed with the second reading, it would be found that the differences of opinion existing about this measure were not great; but when the Committee stage was reached it would certainly be necessary to give an entire Sitting to it. By that means the measure might pass even at this late period of the Session; but he agreed with hon. Members opposite that the idea of still going on with the measure, without even yet fixing a day for it, was wrong. He differed from the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay), who said that it would be necessary to consult the country between the second reading and the Committee. He believed the people of Scotland had made up their minds on the subject. The thing had been before them so very long that what was now looked for was the passing of the measure, and not that it should be sent back for consideration. It might appear inconsistent to make these remarks, and yet to have signed the Memorial alluded to; but the feeling of himself and other hon. Members was that that the period of the Session which had been reached made it difficult to secure an adequate discussion of the Bill, while if the Government showed a strong wish to proceed with the measure, they would not oppose that course, but they considered in that case a time ought now to be fixed for the second reading.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he believed there was a general approval of the principle of the Bill, but various details would require considerable discussion. The Government had been informed of one or two important points on which the Scotch Members entertained very strong opinions, and with respect to which it was desirable to have the opinion of the people of Scotland; but the Government had declined to give them any satisfaction in regard to those points. One question was whether the future Governing Bodies were to be representative or not, and upon that the Government absolutely refused to give any reply. That roused the suspicions of the Scotch Members, and of a considerable number of the people of Scotland, as to what were the intentions of the Government with regard to the future Governing Bodies. If the Government had come forward frankly, and expressed their views upon that subject, the opposition to the Bill would have been very much modified. But, after what had passed, it was of very great importance that the people of Scotland should express a decided opinion as to whether they wished these Governing Bodies in future to be representative, and also how far they wished the Bill to be extended. He was personally very strongly in favour of the main principle of the Bill, his only doubt being as to whether the revision went far enough.

Mr. Ramsay

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought enough had been said. ["Order!"] At that time of the Session any Member who got up to withdraw a Bill deserved to be heard. He thought quite enough had been said to satisfy him that although, as he understood, all the Scotch Members were in favour of the Bill, none of them, so far as he had been able to gather, wished it to go on. That he understood to be the sentiment expressed on both sides of the House. ["No, no!"] He heard hon. Gentlemen say "No!" but perhaps they were among the 25 who signed the Memorial. After what had been said, it was evidently quite hopeless for the Government to struggle against the differences of opinion existing on the subject, and therefore he should not attempt to go on with the Bill; but, at the same time, he must express his entire dissent from the explanation given by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he regretted that the Government had been in such a hurry to withdraw the Bill without consulting the Scotch Members who did not sign the Memorial. He agreed with the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) that the Government ought to have named a day for the second reading; but he believed the provisions of the Bill were not of so wide a character as to be likely to cause any very great discussion. Moreover, the difficulty would have been a great deal removed by a frank statement of opinion on the part of the Government and the Scotch Members. At the same time, he must admit that the Government were struggling against great difficulties, and he would only hope that nothing which had now been said would act as a bar to their bringing on the Bill at a future time. The Government should bear in mind that there was at present a determined opposition on the part of Scotch Members. It was not that they loved the Bill less, but that they loved grouse-shooting more.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he joined with his hon. Friend in the regret that the Home Secretary should be in such a hurry to abandon the Bill, when Scotch Members who had served on the Commission were anxious to go on with it. He wished, however, to clear himself from all responsibility for the withdrawal of the Bill. The blame for the delay which had occurred lay with those hon. Members who persistently kept blocking Notices on the Paper against it, among whom was the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), who, although he now said he was in favour of the measure, had blocked it from the first on account of some small question which might be easily settled in Committee. Those who had been misled into signing the Memorial to the Prime Minister must also take some of the responsibility.

MR. T. COLLINS said, it was unreasonable that Members should be detained in town till the third week in August in order to discuss a Scotch Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would suggest that the Ballot Act Amendment and Continuance Bill should be withdrawn for the present Session, and that a simple Continuance Bill should be introduced. As far as the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill was concerned, he would suggest that it should be divided in two parts, one having reference to the re-constitution of the Court consequent on the removal of the Master of the Rolls to the Court of Appeal, and the other dealing with the question of legal patronage. A considerable time ago it was understood that a Return of the patronage of the Judges had been ordered, but that Return had not yet been received. He supposed that the Bill had been drawn in ignorance of the amount of the patronage, and he suggested that the portion of it dealing with the question should be withdrawn. He repeated the question of his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) as to whether the Government intended to take Supply de die in diem?

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he would urge that the House should not be allowed to separate without an opportunity being given for a discussion on the manner in which the law was at present administered in Ireland. In that country Constitutional Law was suspended, and the Government were every day making arrests of the most arbitrary and unwarranted character on the mere suspicion of any of their officials. If the Government had any necessity or excuse for that system, they ought to justify themselves before the House and before the world; but so far they had made no attempt to do so. The recent policy of the Government and the recent arrests by their officials had not been brought directly under the consideration of the House, and he could not think that any sincere Member of the Liberal Party would like the House to separate without some statement from a Member of the Government as to all those arrests, and without some explanation which would show that the Government were sensible that after all there was a Constitution, although it had been suspended in Ireland, and that they were bound to offer some justification of their extraordinary conduct. It was a question which ought to be fully discussed, and he hoped the Government would give them an opportunity. The House of Commons had never been fairly informed as to the powers which the Government had taken under the Coercion Acts, nor had they properly understood the explanations given on behalf of the Government. The explanations had been inconsistent with each other, and inconsistent also with the policy which the Government had pursued. At the outset the Chief Secretary said the sole object was to relieve Ireland from the oppression of "village tyrants" and "midnight marauders;" but a very few days afterwards the Home Secretary gave an explanation which was quite different.

LORD JOHN MANNERS rose to Order, and asked whether it was competent on the Motion of the Prime Minister to review a discussion which had already taken place?

MR. SPEAKER: I consider that the hon. Member is transgressing the Rules of Order by the course he is now taking. The Question before the House is simply in reference to the course of Business. Upon that he is quite entitled to express a wish that the policy of the Government in Ireland may be reviewed at a proper time; but to enter into details is clearly out of Order.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was simply asking the Government to give the House an assurance that he should have an opportunity of discussing these matters. He was urging the great necessity for obtaining information as to, and, if possible, some justification for, the conduct of the Government. Surely, it would be most unreasonable and wrong that the House should separate without any such information or explanation.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he should not proceed with his Motion with reference to Tripoli in consequence of the issue by the Government of Papers on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply to the question of the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), said, that the first part of the Judicature Bill dealt with the transference of the Master of the Rolls to the Court of Appeal. It was very necessary that that should be passed this Session. The second part of the Bill was designed to vest with the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor the legal patronage formerly exercised by the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron. That question, though not so pressing, was one of great importance; but it would not be unduly put forward for discussion if some interim arrangement could be made for dealing with it. The difficulty was that unless the subject were dealt with the patronage must either be left in abeyance or remain with the Lord Chief Justice.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was satisfied with the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought the Bill before the House for dealing with Education in Scotland was, in many respects, a very good Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE remarked, that it was impossible that the Government could fix a night for bringing on the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill. With regard to Supply, it would be the duty of the Government to ask the House to apply the whole of the valuable time left to pressing it forward—at least, during the principal hours of the night. There was no intention at present to ask the House to recur to Morning Sittings. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) would have ample opportunities for bringing forward the subject he had referred to before the end of the Session, seeing that the Appropriation Bill could not possibly be passed until the matter had been discussed. With regard to the Ballot Bill, it would be withdrawn, and a simple Continuance Bill would be substituted for it. With regard to the Indian Subvention, he had nothing to add to what had been said before in reference to it—namely, that India would be put under an obligation to repay the £2,000,000 advanced, and that the remainder of the subvention would be made in a certain number of annual instalments. With regard to the New Annuities, a Bill relating to them would be introduced to-morrow night, and time would be given for its consideration. He could not name a day for the Indian Budget till he saw what progress had been made with other Business. With regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman as to when the Prorogation might be expected to take place, he wished to point out that Votes of considerable importance in Supply still remained to be discussed, and it was impossible at the present moment to forecast the exact number of days that the discussion in reference to them would occupy. Months ago he had stated that there was a probability that the Prorogation would take place next week; but what had since occurred had not encouraged him to form too sanguine an estimate of the speed with which Public Business might be disposed of. In the course of a few days, however, he hoped to be able to give a more definite reply on the subject to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT inquired at what hour the Bill for the Regulation of the Forces would be brought on?

MR. CHILDERS: Late this evening; perhaps about 12 o'clock. It is absolutely necessary that the Bill shall be passed speedily.

MR. PARNELL said, he certainly was very much surprised to hear the reply of the Prime Minister to the very temperate request of his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy)—namely, that he would be able to hold out some hope that the Government would afford Irish Members facilities for the purpose of discussing the wholesale arrests that have been made in Ireland. It was not as if they had pressed the Government unduly in reference to this question, and not as if they had refrained from giving them every facility with regard to the passing of the Land Bill, and not as if they had made use unduly of any of the Forms of the House for the purpose of endeavouring to obtain the ear of Parliament for the purpose of condemning the acts of the Irish Executive. It was not under these circumstances that his hon. Friend had pressed the Government for some reasonable facilities to put this matter before the House. Their conduct with regard to the Government had been to facilitate Government Business in every possible way. Since the Coercion Acts left this House until the present time, he himself had incurred considerable blame from many persons in Ireland, because they had considered he had allowed the captive to rest in his prison cell unnoticed and uncared for; and speaking for himself, and, he believed, for the majority of the Irish Members of that House, he protested that the Irish Members could no longer allow this neglect, for it was nothing more, to continue in regard to these suffering and helpless men. If they had neglected the case of the prisoners of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, it was because they wished to give the Government every chance of passing remedial legislation for Ireland, and because they desired it might not be in the power of anybody to say, from any side of the House, that they wished to prevent Her Majesty's Government from having a full trial in regard to their attempts to remedy Irish grievances; but now, when all that was passed, when nothing remained but the obtaining of sundry Votes in Supply, when the Government had expressly given up their other contemplated legislation, he said that they were entitled to ask that Her Majesty's Government should give them an opportunity of bringing forward the case of these men, who nobly sacrificed, many of them, their business and their social prosperity, in order to do what in them lay to help the cause of the Irish tenant. His hon. Friend had asked that some reasonable time might be given for the purpose of laying the case of these "suspects" before this House, and he had been told that on the Appropriation Bill he would have an opportunity. Well, he did not know whether the Prime Minister really expected them to wait till the Appropriation Bill, and give up all the time—namely, Tuesdays and Wednesdays—which would be at the disposal of private Members to any measures he proposed to bring before the House. But because they had been neglectful of the personal liberty and freedom of the "suspects" in Ireland during the months that had rolled by since the introduction of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, because they had refrained from pressing these questions, that was no reason that now, when these matters had disappeared, there was longer any excuse for them or for the Government to withhold the light of day from their doings in Ireland. Then he submitted that they were entitled to press this matter on Her Majesty's Government; that they were entitled to use the Forms of the House and assert the right, perhaps, of a majority of that House—certainly of a majority of the Irish nation—to justice, truth, and fairness in the doings of the Irish Executive. He, for his part, should not shrink from using all the Forms of the House to prevent the Government from appropriating these days, and thereby preventing them from any possible chance of laying this case before the House. It might be contended that the Government had followed precedents in regard to their doings in this matter; that they had not applied to Parliament at any unusually early period for these days; and to the fullest extent he admitted that, testing this matter by the calendar, the Government had not come to Parliament at any unusually early period. But testing the matter by the unexampled occurrences of this year, looking to the fact that at a very early period of the Session the Government obtained all the days—both the days of private Members and also those days which nominally belonged to the Government, but actually belonged to private Members—he alluded to Fridays—except Supply stood the First Order of the Day—looking to that fact, that all the days of private Members were placed at the disposal of the Government at a very early period of the Session for the purpose of passing Coercion, and looking at the fact that in the interval between the passing of the Coercion Act and the introduction of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill no attempt was made by the Irish Members or by the great bulk of private Members to press their grievances before Parliament or impede or incommode the Government in any way, and that immediately after that interval was over the Government again annexed all the days of the House for the purpose of proceeding with the Land Law (Ireland)

Mr. Parnell

Bill—he saw that the attempt of the Government to annex Tuesdays and Wednesdays now practically meant the extinguishing of the total rights of private Members in the time of the House. Now, they were really getting into a way of looking to the Government as a sort of Deux et machind of the House of Commons, and, indeed, the Prime Minister appeared to be invested with the amount of regard for those who witnessed it, which was applied to the attributes of ancient Jove. Private Members, from occupying a position, when very much of the legislation was shaped in the various Motions and Bills brought forward by them, were now descending to this stage that, practically speaking, no opportunity whatever was to be afforded to them for the purpose of signifying to the House those matters in reference to which their constituents had sent them to this House. In other countries they found the Ministry of the day were not even allowed a place in the Representative Assembly. In the Legislature of the United States no Cabinet Minister had a place in the House; and formerly in this House it was the custom to regard the Government of the day as the Representative of the Crown, and not necessarily the Representatives of the entire popular opinion of the country. But now they were losing all regard for these matters. That House was composed of the Representatives of three distinct Nationalities, not to speak of a fourth. Yet they saw day by day all individual opinion, all private judgment and action merge in the ipse dixit of the Prime Minister. Now, they could not allow the fate of the Irish prisoners to remain unconsidered. Daily for the last three or four months he had been in receipt of dozens and scores of letters from these prison cells, which the Government must very well know, as they had opened them. These captives cried to them and asked them whether they were going to leave the men who had won the Land Bill? He said they ought not to leave those men, and they ought to urge upon the Irish Chief Secretary the duty of informing the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is going beyond the Question before the House.

MR. PARNELL said, he would be very sorry to go beyond the Question, and he wished to confine himself within proper limits. The Prime Minister had moved that during the remainder of the Session Government Business should have precedence on Tuesdays and Wednesdays; and he (Mr. Parnell) had endeavoured to point out that it was the imperative duty of Irish Members to bring the question of these "suspects" and the evidence on which they had been arrested before the House. These men had been arrested without a charge, almost without an accusation. The Government had repeatedly refused to give any replies to Questions which Irish Members had put with respect to them. It was absolutely necessary for the fair fame of many honourable men in Ireland that Irish Members should not allow the Government to continue to libel those men. The Government had arrested the hon. Member for Tipperary; they had arrested a trusted priest. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must caution the hon. Member that he is transgressing the Rules of Debate. The Question before the House is of a very limited character, and the hon. Member is not entitled to bring on the question of the imprisoned "suspects."

MR. PARNELL said, he understood that the Question before the House was a Motion by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that for the remainder of the Session the Orders of the Day should have precedence of Notices of Motion, and that Government Orders should have priority; and he had endeavoured to point out that if that Motion were acceded to Irish Members would practically be deprived of an opportunity of bringing the case of the imprisoned "suspects" before the House. He had desired to show that the character of these "suspects" was in danger—["Order, order!"]—that he might urge with additional force the right that Irish Members had to demand from the Government facilities for rescuing these men from the unworthy libel that had been cast upon them. He would not presume to continue his observations if the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that he was out of Order in saying that a good priest and a good Irishman—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I have already ruled the hon. Member out of Order, and I am surprised that he should continue to make such observations after my ruling.

MR. PARNELL said, that Irish Members would appear to have lost sympathy for the "suspects" if they did not bring their case before the House. [Cries of "Order!"] The Ministry of the day, of course, always gained the sympathies of the powers that be in that House; but if they might not bring the cause of their imprisoned countrymen before the House, he would boldly say that all liberty and regard of private right was lost to that Assembly, and that the Minister of the day had transferred himself from a Constitutional Minister into a tyrant—[Cries of "Order!" and "Name him!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I have repeatedly cautioned the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and notwithstanding these repeated cautions he has held language utterly un-Parliamentary and improper; and I hereby name Mr. Parnell as having disregarded the authority of the Chair.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was about to move, Sir—

MR. PARNELL rose and said: I will not wait for the farce of a division. I will leave you and your House, and the public will see that there is no longer freedom of discussion left to the Irish Members.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I was about to move, when you rose from the Chair, that the words of the hon. Member be taken down. I must say I never in the course of my whole experience ever heard such words addressed to you—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. HEALY: I rise to Order. [Cries of "Order!"] I rise to Order. The Standing Order on which the Prime Minister is about to act prescribes that he shall make his Motion without speech or debate; and I understand that on previous Motions of this kind the Prime Minister went very speedily to his duty.

MR. GLADSTONE: I thank the hon. Member for Wexford for reminding me that I ought not to have made a speech. I move that Mr. Parnell, having been named, be suspended from the service of the House for the remainder of the Sitting.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That Mr. Parnell be suspended from the service of the House during the remainder of this day's sitting."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

The House divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 14: Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 346.)

Question again proposed,

“That for the remainder of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions on Tuesday, Government Orders having priority, and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesday.”

MR. O'DONNELL said, that it was perhaps regrettable that the Representatives of Ireland had only been able to intervene in this discussion at a late period; but this was due to the time that had been consumed by the Scotch Members. He thought that in asking the House to assent to this Motion the Government might have given the House more explicit information as to their intentions on several points. He had not been able to gather what the Government intended to do with regard to the Indian Budget, or to the discussion of Indian affairs generally. If the Liberal Party sat on that side of the House and such incidents were brought forward as wholesale murder in Indian gaols—for the charges on that matter amounted to nothing less—the Liberal Party would be in a ferment of generous indignation on the subject. He did not belong to the Liberal Party, and he hoped that Heaven might spare him from that final fall; but he thought that the Government should give the House the opportunity of discussing the affairs of the people of India, who, like the Irish people, were deprived of every form of Constitutional liberty. When the Prime Minister was in Opposition he had taken from his hands a Motion on the enslavement of thought and opinion in India by the Vernacular Press Act. That was two years ago; but nothing had since then been done in the matter.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the question of the Vernacular Press of India is not now before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would only express a hope that the Prime Minister would give them an opportunity of discussing that important question. They ought also to have the opportunity of discussing the new University Scheme in Ireland—a scheme which promised well under the late Government, but which, according to recent rumours, did not promise well under the present Government. They were likewise entitled to receive an assurance from the Government that distinct facilities would be afforded for the investigation of the very serious charges of maladministration and oppression made against the Irish Executive. The Government had challenged Irish Members to bring forward a Vote of Censure in regard to alleged cases of tyranny and wrong, and they would meet them. But although they indulged in those valorous challenges, they proposed to take away all the time available to private Members, thereby preventing them from bringing forward any such Votes of Censure. The conduct of the Government was such as to lead the people of Ireland to believe that they shrank, in violation of their pledges and in violation of every principle of Constitutional liberty, from a review of their conduct, and that they desired to see the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) anywhere rather than in the House, exposing their policy and holding them up to the indignation of the Irish people. Owing to the course taken by the Government, the Irish Members could only avail themselves of discussions in Supply, during which, no doubt, many unclean spots in Irish administration could be exposed, but where the full discussion to which they were entitled could not be secured.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that as his right hon. Friend had already spoken, he might state with regard to the inquiry as to the Indian Budget that it was the expectation of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India to bring it forward as soon as they had disposed of or had made sufficient progress with Supply. With respect to the Irish University, the House would have two opportunities of considering that question—when the Bill now pending in the House of Lords reached that House, and again when the Vote in Supply was moved relating to it. With regard to the chief accusation of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell)—namely, that the Government avoided investigation into the conduct of the Irish Government, he had to remind the House that no Notice of a Vote of Censure had been given, and, therefore, the Government did not avoid such Motion. But if it was desired to review the conduct of the Irish Government, or to take a Vote of Censure, there could be no better opportunity of doing so than that mentioned by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government—namely, that which would be afforded by the Appropriation Bill. Not only was it impossible for a Government to avoid having their conduct reviewed, but it was impossible for them to avoid any Amendment to the Bill, which would be a distinct Vote of Censure. There could be no better opportunity for such a purpose or one more in accordance with Constitutional precedent, for it had been made available by Mr. Disraeli and Lord Palmerston to enable them to review the policy of the Government of the day. Nothing could be more consistent with the gravity of the subject and with the feeling of a section of the House than that the opportunity he suggested should be taken to move a Vote of Censure; but till it was, the Government had very serious duties to perform.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had nothing to complain of in the speech which had just been delivered; but he must remind the hon. Member for Dungarvan that a mis-spent Session could not be recovered during its last few weeks. He asked independent Members, was it possible, would it be decent that another Session should be so mis-spent? When the hon. Member asked the Government for facilities, he could not forget that the hon. Member had acted with a Party which had deliberately delayed the Business of the House during the Session. To their conduct was it attributable that independent Members had been obliged to resign one after another the opportunities reserved to them by the Constitution for the expression of independent opinion. From first to last the Irish Party had monopolized the Session by their misconduct. ["Order!"]

MR. HEALY asked whether the word "misconduct," applied either to a Party or individuals, was in Order?

MR. SPEAKER: It struck me that the observations generally of the hon. Gentleman are not within the subject of the Motion before the House?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would confine himself strictly to the Motion, which involved the resignation on the part of private Members of their proper opportunities of bringing independent questions before the House. He did not say that the Motion was untimely or unprecedented, but its effect would be that, with very few exceptional occasions, independent Members would be deprived of their Constitutional privileges. The blame did not lie with the Government—it lay elsewhere; but he deprecated the fact that the House of Commons should be Session after Session incapacitated as a Representative Body, as it had been that Session, from transacting the Business of the country. There was no remedy for that state of things save a revision of their Rules. He claimed for the Leader of the House that he should apply himself to such revision, with a view to secure a fair distribution of opportunities for independent Members to express the feelings and opinions of Great Britain with reference to measures before the House. If the Government did not take the matter up, he hoped that the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and other independent Members would.

MR. LABOUCHERE observed, that whatever differences of opinion existed among them they were all, he believed, anxious to get into Committee of Supply. He therefore hoped hon. Members would withdraw the Motions down on going into Committee of Supply, and allow them to proceed to Supply. He trusted also the Government would consider that the unanimous desire of the Press of England was that the Newspapers (Law of Libel) Bill, which had been blocked by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) should pass.

MR. GOURLEY said, the hon. Member for Northampton had a Motion down in Committee of Supply, and it appeared to him that he simply asked him to withdraw his Motion on going into Committee so that he might bring his on.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would also withdraw.

MR. LEAMY complained that the Government had not promised to give to Irish Members the opportunity which was asked by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy). The condition of Ireland was quite as worthy of having a day given by the Government for its consideration as was the Ministerial policy in the Transvaal. He considered the hon. Member for Longford was quite justified in the request he had made to the Prime Minister, and that had it been acceded to the House would have been much nearer Committee of Supply than it was likely to be for some time. The reason why the Irish Members had not yet put a Vote of Censure on the Paper was because the Land Bill stopped the way. When they brought forward any of the arrests that had been made they were taunted with obstructing the Land Bill. Now that the Bill was passed could not the Government give them one day on which to bring this subject forward? If they had not an opportunity of discussing the conduct and policy of the Government, they did not know how many arrests would be made during the Recess.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was surprised at the supineness of the Scotch Members in permitting Bills in which they were much interested to be unceremoniously withdrawn. He held that the suggestion that Members with grievances had full opportunity of bringing them forward on the Appropriation Bill was worthless; and on the Constitutional maxim, that "the redress of grievances must precede Supply," he hoped his hon. Friends would not fail to urge upon the House and the Government their views on matters which they deemed to demand Parliamentary attention. The Estimates were, in fact, a series of pegs on which hon. Members could hang any Questions or Notices they liked, and it was perfectly impossible that discussions on them could be avoided. The opportunities which the Estimates afforded had, however, been much curtailed by the Government getting large Votes on Account. This was a practice which could not be too much condemned. He hoped his Colleagues would avail themselves of the opportunities which Supply still afforded to bring forward the grievances—and there were a great many—from which Ireland still suffered. The Prime Minister must see that the appeal of the hon. Member for Longford was a very reasonable one; and as the Forms of the House would preclude the right hon. Gentleman from speaking again, in order to give him a fresh opportunity of addressing the House he begged to conclude by moving that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion. He said, he thought that there was every necessity for this Motion. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had made a reference to Irish Members.

MR. NEWDEGATE: No, I referred to the Members for Great Britain.

MR. BIGGAR thought the hon. Member spoke more particularly with regard to the Irish Members. He (Mr. Biggar) certainly repelled the idea that English Members who might or might not be thoroughly ignorant of the question in hand were at liberty to lecture Irish Members as to how they should behave and how the Irish people should be governed. The Irish Members stood in that House with equal rights with the English Members, and they had determination enough to insist on being heard on behalf of the causes they had to advocate. As to Supply, the Irish Members would vindicate their right to criticize the Estimates. He suggested that Business might proceed more satisfactorily if English and Scotch Members would make fewer speeches when Irish questions came up for discussion, and would be more influenced by those who understood the subjects. In the early part of the Session Bills were introduced which were of great interest because opposed by Irish Members, but the greater part of the discussion was taken up by English and Scotch Members.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not keeping to the Question before the House. He is wandering far wide of it.

MR. BIGGAR said, that being so, he would confine himself to the Bills under the consideration of the House. There were Bills in which both the English and Scotch Members were interested, and, consequently, the Irish Members also felt an interest in these Votes, seeing the large number of Irishmen in England and Scotland affected by them. Some English and Scotch Members might think that Irish Members had no right to take part in the discussion of English and Scotch Votes in Supply; but he held quite the contrary opinion.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not keeping to the Question at all, and if he does not keep very close to the Question I shall be called upon to regard him as wilfully and persistently disregarding the authority of the Chair.

MR. BIGGAR thought that perhaps enough had been said on the question, and he would simply conclude by seconding the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 12: Majority 99.—(Div. List, No. 347.)

Resolved, That for the remainder of the Session Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions on Tuesday, Government Orders having priority; and that Government Orders have priority on Wednesday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S PENSIONS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GOURLEY, in rising to call attention to the administration of Greenwich Hospital with regard to Merchant Seamen's Pensions, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the grant should include widows whose husbands contributed to the fund, and merchant seamen now in receipt of the Mercantile Marine Fund pensions ;"

said, the merchant seamen contended that while the seamen of the Royal Navy and the Marines had received full and ample pensions from the contributions made by and for seamen generally from the Greenwich Hospital Fund, they had been debarred from receiving anything beyond the miserable pittance granted by the present Secretary of State for War in 1867. Since 1867 the aged seamen had been receiving £3 8s. a-year, while the widows had not received anything whatever from the fund to which enormous sums had been compulsorily contributed by seamen for a long course of years. If the seaman who might have contributed to the Greenwich Hospital Fund should elect to receive £3 8s. a-year, he was debarred thereby from obtaining another pension to which he was equitably entitled—namely, from the Mercantile Marine Fund. On the other hand, if he elected to receive a Mercantile Marine Fund pension, then, although he was entitled through the contribution which he might have compulsorily made to the Greenwich Hospital Fund to the pension which would accrue to him from the latter fund, he was debarred from obtaining it. It was desirable that the existing Act should be so amended as that men who were entitled to the Greenwich Hospital Fund should not be debarred from enjoying the benefits of that fund because they accepted a Mercantile Marine Fund pension—they being entitled to both. It would, perhaps, be said, in answer to the claim that he was setting up, that the Government had taken over and advanced a large sum of money in connection with another fund, the Mercantile Marine Fund. He granted that; but the House must understand that the Mercantile Marine Fund was a compulsory fund, created by the Government of the day, equally with the Greenwich Hospital contribution. Therefore, if the Government lost by the winding up of the Mercantile Marine Fund, that was no reason why the poor men who had compulsorily contributed towards the Greenwich Hospital Fund should be excluded from their rights in regard to the latter fund. He denied that the one fund was intended to be a substitute for the other. The Preamble of the Mercantile Marine Fund Act contained an admission of the right of merchant seamen to the benefits of the Greenwich Hospital Fund. The Act was, in fact, passed for the purpose of supplementing and assisting the Greenwich Hospital Fund. He asked anyone acquainted with the Charter of 1694 and the Act of 1696 whether it was consistent with common sense that Parliament intended that merchant seamen should be taxed more than any other class of the community in order that they might bear the cost of pensions to men who had served in the Royal Navy? For his part, he did not think that such a proposition could for a moment be maintained. He trusted that his hon. Friend (Sir Thomas Brassey) would urge upon the Government the claims of a deserving class who were now mulcted to the extent of about £12,000 a-year by enforced deductions from their earnings. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. WEBSTER, in seconding the Amendment, assured the Government that the dissatisfaction with regard to the application of the fund since 1834 was not confined to the constituency of the hon. Member who had brought forward the Resolution. It was widespread among the seamen throughout Scotland, and more particularly in the seaports of the East of Scotland. He should not say a word as to the deservings of that most patient and hard-working class of men. Waiving this, it was quite plain that some legal right was recognized on the part of merchant captains and seamen when the division of the Greenwich Hospital Fund was made by Parliament. It was also plain that the division with respect to merchant seamen was exceedingly parsimonious, and that the share allotted to them was not what they were entitled to. He hoped that the Lord of the Admiralty who had to represent this matter to his colleagues would see his way to recommend the claims of that deserving and ill-requited class. These claims were of very old standing, and he hoped the Government would look favourably upon them, even if it were necessary to introduce a Bill.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the grant to the Greenwich Hospital Fund should include widows whose husbands contributed to the fund, and merchant seamen now in receipt of the Mercantile Marine Fund Pensions,"—(Mr. Gourley),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR ANDREW LUSK thanked the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) for bringing forward this subject, because, rightly or wrongly, these old people thought that they had a grievance. They had been obliged to contribute to two funds from their hard earnings, and now if they received a return from one fund they were precluded from the benefit of the other. He never liked to break faith with those who relied upon the law. There were only some 3,000 or 4,000 of them alive, and they should not be denied when they demanded their rights. Seamen were, as a rule, a helpless class, and therefore he hoped that the Government would show some consideration for these applicants. This was one of those cases where a small wrong became very irritating.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had made a persuasive appeal on behalf of the aged seamen. In much that he had said he concurred. Some years ago he had brought forward a proposal in that House for a seamen's benefit fund, to be managed by the officials of the shipping offices. He still cherished the hope that the merchant seamen might receive some assistance in their efforts to combine for their mutual support in advancing years. It was not an essential feature of the plan for a merchant seamen's fund that the State should make a contribution of money. Whatever might be the decision on this point, it was his duty to resist any proposal to take money from Greenwich funds. Before submitting a short statement of the leading facts, there was one obvious remark which he might offer. His hon. Friend would acknowledge that the injustice of which he complained was not due to any action which had been taken by the present Admiralty. Similar demands had been steadily resisted by successive Boards, who were under strong temptation to become popular at the public expense by lavish charities to the merchant seamen. The unanimity of their decisions was, in his judgment, conclusive. The present Government, however, in their anxious desire to be just, had once more consulted the experienced officers of the Board of Trade and the Admiralty, under whom the pensions to seamen and the funds of Greenwich Hospital were administered. The Papers containing the correspondence with the Board of Trade would be distributed in a few days. The constituents of his hon. Friend would doubtless be supplied with copies of the Papers, and when they had read them they would be convinced that they had no claim whatever to further assistance from Greenwich. Without entering too minutely into details, he might observe that the relief of seamen who had served in the Royal Navy was the exclusive object of the noble foundation of William and Mary. That object was steadily kept in view both in the Act of 1696, under which the seamen of the Merchant Service were required to pay 6*d.* a-month to Greenwich, and again in the Act of 1834, under which they were relieved from the obligation. The protection afforded by the Navy to the commerce of the country was held to be a sufficient justification for imposing a tax on the Merchant Service. Passing from the original object for which the hospital was founded to the subsequent efforts of the State to administer to the wants of the Merchant Service, he might refer to the onerous obligation undertaken in connection with the Merchant Seamen's Fund. The management was unsatisfactory, and in 1851 the fund was wound up by Act of Parliament. Pensions were granted at the average rates of the preceding five years, and the Exchequer was made responsible for any deficiency which might arise. The net result had been a loss of no less than £920,000. Notwithstanding the losses sustained in connection with their fund, a generous gift was made to the merchant seamen on the occasion of the closing of Greenwich Hospital as an asylum for the Royal Navy. By the Greenwich Hospital Act of 1869, power was taken to expend £4,000 a-year in providing pensions at the rate of £3 8s. to seamen who had contributed 6d. a-month to Greenwich Hospital for five years prior to 1835, and who were not in receipt of a pension from the Merchant Seamen's Fund. In making this concession the Admiralty were doing an act of grace, and they distinctly declined to acknowledge any legal liability. In 1872 a further concession was made. The annual expenditure from Greenwich funds was no longer limited to £4,000 a-year, and an Act was passed authorizing the purchase of annuities by the Board of Trade out of funds provided by Greenwich Hospital for all seamen who could prove a claim to pension under the regulations laid down in 1869. The charge which had come on Greenwich Hospital in providing pensions and annuities under the Acts of 1869 and 1872 had already amounted to £158,000, and it was contemplated that a further sum of from £40,000 to £50,000 would be required. The regulations under which the pensions were granted had been made the subject of complaint. It had been argued that seamen who were in receipt of pensions from the Mercantile Marine Fund ought not to be debarred from the enjoyment of pensions from Greenwich Hospital. In November last the Admiralty addressed a letter to the Board of Trade asking them, as the official protectors of the merchant seamen, how far the sum of £3 8s. per annum, whether paid in the shape of a Greenwich pension or a Merchant Seamen's Fund pension, was a sufficient equivalent for the enforced contribution of 1s. a-month? In reply, they were told that the sum now paid was in excess of the value of the enforced contribution with interest. The hon. Member for Sunderland was not content to urge the claims of the seamen themselves, and he asked that pensions should be extended to widows. The demand could not be presented to Parliament as a matter of right and justice. If, on the other hand, the cause of the widows were pleaded as a case for the charitable consideration of the Government, he had already shown that there were other resources directly arising from the Mercantile Marine from which, if they thought it right to make a concession, an appropriation might be made. The pensions from the Mercantile Marine Fund and the grants from the Greenwich Funds, so far from being an inadequate return for the contributions, had already involved a loss to the State of more than £1,100,000. Having dealt thus far with the case of the seamen as founded on their individual contributions, he passed on to the claims put forward on their behalf as heirs to former generations of contributors. It had been maintained in several Petitions that not less than £2,000,000 of the accumulated funds of the Hospital had been derived from the enforced contributions of merchant seamen. The statement was incorrect. The personal property of Greenwich Hospital was mainly derived from other sources—from unclaimed prize-money, assigned to the Institution in the reign of Queen Anne, and from the prize-money of deserters, made over to the Hospital in the reign of George II. It included a percentage of 5 per cent on all prizes taken during the Great War. The sale of portions of the Derwentwater Estates, which were appropriated to the Hospital in the reign of George II., had been another source whence the personal property had been accumulated. But of all these sources of wealth, the most important was the transfer, in 1814, of the funds of the Chatham Chest, amounting to £1,355,000. The Chatham Chest was originally established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and the revenues were derived from Parliamentary grants, charitable bequests, prize-money, and a tax of 6d. per month levied on seamen serving in the Navy. Having shown that the merchant seamen have no claim, whether in law or in equity, to further contributions from Greenwich Hospital, it might not seem necessary to carry forward this discussion. It might, however, be satisfactory to the House to know the numerous and benevolent uses to which the funds of the Hospital were devoted. Its whole revenues were bestowed in ministering to the necessities of men who had done long service to the country. Out of a total income of £161,000, no less than £120,000 were expended in pensions and gratuities. In addition to this, they were educating 1,000 boys, the sons of seamen and marines. They were doing this at a cost below the average in similar institutions. It had been objected that too large a sum was expended in salaries. To this he had to answer that the school was completely re-organized in 1870 by a committee of which the present Secretary to the Admiralty was the chairman. But although the Establishment was thus recently revised, they had thought it right to appoint a committee, which was on the point of reporting the result of its inquiries. He had reason to know that the work undertaken by Admiral Hickley and his colleagues, the Member for Falmouth, and Sir Digby Murray, had been thoroughly done, and that it would result in valuable improvements in the dietary of the school, and in the training of the boys for the sea service. Where an increase of expenditure was required, they would be able to meet the cost by economy in other directions. In conclusion, he had to express the hope that his hon. Friend would be satisfied with the explanations he had received. He had done his duty to those whose cause he had advocated by stating their case in Parliament. It had been his (Sir Thomas Brassey's) duty, on behalf of the Navy, to show that the cost of the benevolent plan of his hon. Friend could not in justice be made a charge upon Greenwich funds. Hon. Members would believe that it was not an agreeable duty to resist an appeal on behalf of aged and, perhaps, necessitous persons belonging to a class with which he had a warm sympathy. In following his hazardous calling the merchant seaman did a duty to society and to the State, and he had a strong claim to our benevolence; but the seamen of the Navy might be called upon at any moment for yet greater sacrifices. Even in peace, grave disasters might occur, bringing misery to many homes. The present Board of Admiralty were anxious to make more ample provision for these distressing calamities, and if they permitted an unjustifiable encroachment on the limited resources of Greenwich Hospital, they would deprive themselves of the means of giving relief to seamen who had grown old in the service of their country and to the widows and orphans of their comrades who had fallen at the post of duty.

Sir Thomas Brassey

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PUBLIC HEALTH—THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD. — OBSERVATIONS.

DR. CAMERON, in rising to call attention to the power possessed by the Local Government Board for the prevention and control of formidable epidemic diseases, and the manner in which those powers have of late been exercised, said he would not have ventured to call the attention of the House to this subject, had it not been for the very critical and dangerous position in which the Government were at present placed. At the last meeting of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, one of its most energetic members—Sir Edmund Currie—stated that unless immediate steps were taken for the control of these epidemic diseases, they would probably return from their vacation to find themselves in the midst of an epidemic of small-pox and scarlet fever, with no means of coping with it. Already some 1,800 persons had died from the late outbreak of small-pox in the Metropolis. He believed that if prompt measures had been taken by the Local Government Board that epidemic would not have occurred. The small-pox epidemic had been less fatal at present than at any previous period of its prevalence; but the fact that the mortality was less than it formerly had been was no proof that they were at the end of their trouble. The Local Government Board were enabled by Act of Parliament to order the Metropolitan Asylums Board to construct hospitals for the reception of persons suffering from infectious diseases, and such an order had the effect of rendering it imperative on the Asylums Board to carry out their instructions, and any hospital so provided could remain where it was placed in spite of the protests of the people of the district. In March last a case was tried and carried to the House of Lords, in which it was declared by that tribunal that if it were proved that a small-pox or any other hospital for the treatment of infectious diseases was a nuisance to a populous district, it might be shut up, and that the order of the Local Government Board was no authority for keeping it open. Since that decision of the House of Lords, the Metropolitan Asylums Board could do nothing in the way of establishing hospitals of that kind. By the Public Health Act of 1876 the Local Government Board, when an outbreak of infectious disease was threatened, could make, alter, and revoke regulations for the provision of medical aid and accommodation, and for guarding against the spread of the disease. His charge against that Board was that since December last, while an epidemic had prevailed, they had done absolutely nothing; they had refused to take any initiative or to give any advice. Had they been dealing with a threatened invasion of cattle plague, instead of small-pox or scarlet fever, they would have had the Vice President of the Council exerting himself to the utmost to cope with the apprehended visitation. In December last warning was given to the Local Government Board by the Metropolitan Asylums Board that small-pox was steadily increasing, and that something should be done. But nothing was done. In March, 1,500 applications for the admission of patients were obliged to be refused from want of hospital space. In May the Asylums Board themselves proposed to establish a hospital for small-pox convalescent patients at Darenth. The Local Government Board gave their assent. Later on a ship was placed at the disposal of the Asylums Board by the Admiralty, and that hospital ship was opened a couple of months ago. It might have been expected that a Department which was really the Department of Health in this country should know something about coping with dangerous epidemics. They had the outskirts of the Metropolis available to them, and also the river; but they were not resorted to until it was too late. There had been nothing to prevent the Local Government Board; and he said it was its duty to have advised the Asylums Board that all the thinly-inhabited country outside of London, and also the river, lay open to them, where no nuisance would have arisen from the hospitals. If they had taken that course in time, a vast amount of the mischief which they had suffered would have been averted. The city which he had the honour to represent was an unhealthy one. Houses were crowded together; scores of families lived in some tenements; and when epidemics broke out they spread with a virulence which happily was not manifested in London. But in Glasgow, during the last 11 years, although there was an epidemic which extended over five years, and although they had had repeated importations of the disease into the town, the mortality from small-pox had not been one-third what it had been in London during the same period. The saving of life might appear trivial to some Members, but it was not so to him. In Glasgow during those 11 years the mortality was 1,590 persons per 1,000,000, whilst in London it was 4,580 persons per 1,000,000; or, taking the inhabitants of London at 4,000,000, the avoidable mortality in London—mortality from small-pox—in excess of what occurred in Glasgow was close upon 12,000. That was a startling fact, and it showed that they ought to adopt in London the same systems of supervision that existed in Glasgow. This was what was done in Glasgow. He knew a case where small-pox broke out in a tenement consisting of perhaps 60 or 70 families, and was only discovered on the death of one person. The medical officer, who there was entrusted with the entire control of epidemics, immediately on the case being reported to him, instituted a floor to floor and house to house examination, and he discovered that 24 cases had arisen from the one to which he had referred. The staff of vaccinators with which the medical officer of health was provided attended and offered to all the tenants and the members of their families the safeguard of re-vaccination, and in the result 200 to 300 persons were re-vaccinated; and owing to the steps thus taken, whereas 24 cases were infected from one case, not a single fatal case occurred. Why were not similar provisions made here to grapple with epidemics? Had that been done, the disease would never have spread to the alarming extent it had. It was no use putting out placards that people could be re-vaccinated at certain places. The people would not come. They must go to the people. Even where the people were disposed to come to the vaccinators, there was such difficulty in getting a supply of lymph that it had to be stopped. As in Glasgow, so in London, on the medical officer of health should devolve the whole responsibility; but he should be supplied with everything in the way of remedy and everything in the way of assistance that he required. Such, however, was not the case; the trifling expense necessary for obtaining a due supply of lymph was not incurred, and no staff of revaccinators was provided. If this wooden system were to be allowed to prevail, they had better keep in the Treasury the £300,000 they were asked to vote, and leave it to private energy to face a danger the necessary exertion for which, he believed, would have been put forth by the Government Department if it were cattle plague that had to be stamped out.

MR. DODSON said, he understood the complaint of the hon. Member for Glasgow to be that the Local Government Board had not put in force the extraordinary powers for dealing with formidable diseases vested in them by the Public Health Act. As a matter of fact, however, it was not that Act, but the Prevention of Diseases Act that applied to the Metropolis; and it was evident that the abnormal powers given by that Act were only to be applied in a case of plague, or Asiatic cholera, or some unusual and terrible visitation with which the local authorities were unable to cope. He would therefore put it to the hon. Member and to the House whether in their view it was necessary, in the face of the events which had occurred, to exercise the extraordinary powers which were suggested by the hon. Member? As far as the question of house-to-house visitation was concerned, the Guardians in most instances had, with the approval of the Local Government Board, made provision for the purpose by appointing assistant vaccination officers, and the Vestries and District Boards had each of them medical officers, whose duty it was to keep them informed as to the condition of the health of the districts in which they were engaged. As regarded medical attendance for the poor, it was well secured through the agency of the Boards of Guardians, while the affluent classes of course provided for themselves. As to the speedy interment of the dead, not even the hon. Member would contend that any occasion had arisen for the exercise of extraordinary measures for that purpose. On the contrary, to have put forth the powers to which he had referred would have caused an unnecessary panic in the Metropolis, and would have been tantamount to proclaiming martial law because of a disturbance in Hyde Park. He could not admit that the Local Government Board had shown any apathy in this matter. The Metropolitan Asylums Managers had responded most readily to the suggestions of the Local Government Board; but he was sorry to say that the Vestries and District Boards had done very little to provide hospital accommodation, as they were bound to, for persons not paupers who were attacked by infectious diseases. They were not, however, under the jurisdiction of the Local Government Board. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Glasgow to institute comparisons between the city which he represented and the Metropolis; but he seemed to forget that in the Metropolis there were difficulties, connected with its size, the fluctuation of population, the change of lodgings and other matters, which made it much more difficult than in Glasgow to discover or to follow cases in which the Vaccination Act might be evaded. As he had said, it was not possible for the Local Government Board to act directly; they only acted indirectly through the Metropolitan Asylums Board and to some extent upon other local bodies in the way of giving advice in such a manner as he had no doubt had produced, and would continue to produce, good effects on the health of the people. Since the Metropolitan Asylums Board had been established much had been done to provide hospital accommodation. The Board were bound to provide hospitals for the pauper class only; but in consequence of the general neglect of the Vestries and District Boards to do their part and provide hospitals for the non-pauper class, both classes had in the recent emergency resorted to the Board's hospitals. Even as it was, but for the closing of Hampstead Hospital, which had proved a great misfortune, the Asylums Board would almost have provided all the accommodation that was necessary. The Board had, including Hampstead, five permanent hospitals sufficient together for upwards of 1,000 patients. The closing of Hampstead had deprived the Board of 300 beds. To meet the difficulty thus created in the present epidemic, accommodation had been provided at Darenth for 600 convalescents, and a hospital ship, The Atlas, established, which could receive from 150 to 200 patients. As to vaccination, it was not the duty, nor was it in the power of the Local Government Board to supply lymph by the pint or the quart for the vaccination of all persons. Parliament had not given it the means and did not intend to do so. The vaccinations which took place in England and Wales numbered 750,000 a-year. The Local Government Board could not provide lymph for all these. As it was it provided lymph stocks to about 10,000 medical applicants in the year. It had recently established a provision of animal lymph for the benefit of such applicants. In the endeavour to establish hospitals the Metropolitan Asylums Board had been greatly hampered by the objections made by the inhabitants of the districts where it was proposed they should be situated. This was shown by what had occurred at Hampstead, at Fulham, and at Wormwood Scrubbs. He must remind the hon. Member that the present epidemic was not nearly so severe as was that of 1871, and there was reason to hope that it would not be as severe as even that of six or seven years ago. Nevertheless, he could assure the hon. Member that he was by no means inclined to make light of the matter, and was desirous of using to the utmost the very limited powers that had been intrusted to the Local Government Board to deal with the matter. He trusted that the experience of the last few months would not be altogether thrown away either upon his Department or upon the Vestries and local authorities upon whom so much depended. He was far from finding fault with the hon. Member for Glasgow for having brought this subject under the notice of the House, because he was aware of the warm interest which the hon. Member took in sanitary matters; and he trusted that the effect of the discussion might be to stimulate the local authorities to exertion in dealing with these outbreaks.

Mr. WARTON said, he must express his thanks to the hon. Member for Glasgow for having brought this subject before the House; but he thought that the President of the Local Government Board was rather proud of the letters that prevented him from doing anything to secure the health of the people. If the President of the Local Government Board found his hands tied, why did not he bring in some Bill to release them? He was glad, however, that the right hon. Gentleman was so much wiser this Session as to drop the Bill he had last Session threatened the country with, which would have spread small-pox by relieving persons from penalties for not causing their children to be vaccinated.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

RUSSIA IN CENTRAL ASIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, who was precluded by the Forms of the House from moving the following Resolution:—

"That the annexation of the whole country of the Akhal Turcomans by Russia, in violation of her promises to this Country, has been encouraged by the unfortunate evacuation of Candahar, and is a menace to the security of British India; " said: I regret, Mr. Speaker, that it should be necessary to discuss so important a question as that to which my Motion relates at a period very late in the Session, and at an advanced hour of the evening. Hon. Members are naturally exhausted with the heavy labours of a prolonged Session; but the opportunities open to private Members have been so very rare that I do not feel justified in postponing the discussion, on the remote chance of finding a more favourable day before the Vacation. My Notice was placed upon the Paper before recent events in Afghanistan had made the subject even more important. The grave crisis which now exists in that country makes the question peculiarly appropriate. Candahar, the great position which those who wished well to British supremacy in India were so anxious to retain, the scene of our defeat and triumphs, is now in the power of a bitter enemy of our rule. The Prince who inflicted the greatest reverse that British arms have experienced in Asia for more than a generation, is now supreme in Southern Afghanistan. Ayoub Khan, who defeated General Burrows, and was in turn overcome by Sir Frederick Roberts, has recovered from his reverse, has utterly vanquished the Army of our pensioner and protégé, Abdurrahman, Ameer of Kabul, and is now master of Candahar. The £400,000 of treasure, the rifles and the cannons which our Armies captured, and which were handed over with such foolish precipitation to an untried and incompetent candidate for the Afghan Throne, have now become the spoil of his rival and our enemy. By a striking coincidence, the defeat of Abdurrahman took place on the very day on which, 12 months ago, Ayoub inflicted the crushing disaster of Maiwand upon a British force. Such a triumph must have an injurious effect upon the prestige of England, not only throughout Afghanistan and Central Asia, but too probably in Hindostan as well. A state of civil war and anarchy, which is the fertile soil for Russian intrigue, has been created in Afghanistan. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India must now remember, with painful vividness, many of the arguments and prophecies which were addressed to the Government from Members of the Opposition, with regard to the abandonment of Candahar. I do not propose to reiterate those arguments now beyond the briefest recapitulation. On four principal grounds the retention of Candahar was urged upon Her Majesty's Government. It was pointed out that its strategic position, as a great military stronghold, was of immense value for the security of British India. That value has been testified to by the authority of every soldier of any eminence, with one single exception, both in India and Europe. Candahar is on the high road by which every great conqueror of the past has advanced to the subjugation of Hindostan. By a trifling expenditure of money, and with a garrison of some 10,000 or 12,000 men, it might have been made an impregnable bulwark of the Empire. As a great centre of commerce, Candahar is equally important. It has always been the chief mart of Afghanistan and Central Asia. Under our beneficent rule there, its trade had already doubled. If the railway, which Lord Beaconsfield, with such brilliant foresight, planned and begun, had been completed, Candahar might, in a few years, have become one of the greatest emporiums of the world. The manufactures of Lancashire and Yorkshire could have been carried, in four weeks, into the heart of Afghanistan. Vast regions now closed to British commerce, and about to fall under the influence of Russia, would have been opened to our stagnating manufactures, which would have been then diffused throughout Afghanistan, Northern Persia, the country of the Turcomans, and even remoter territories. The interest of the population itself of Candahar was a most forcible argument in favour of our retention of that city. None of the pretences under which it was abandoned are falser than the specious statements that the people wished us to go. The majority of the inhabitants of Candahar wished us to remain. They greatly flourished under the reign of impartial law and peace, which, for the first time for many years, they enjoyed under British ascendancy. Their trade doubled. They bitterly dislike the Afghan tyranny under which they have suffered nothing but extortion, oppression, and suffering. Three-fourths of the people of Candahar are not Afghans at all. They are Persians and Hazerehs, who are by nature and habit industrious and peaceful, and who hate the rule of the licentious Afghan. It is equally incorrect to state, as the noble Marquess has done, that the Candaharis showed their hostility to British rule by falling upon the remnant of General Burrows' Army as it fled from the battle-field. Had any such general hostility been displayed, not a man could have escaped. In a few villages only, and these Alizai and Pathan, our soldiers were attacked. The best disproof of the statement consists in the fact that the inhabitants of Candahar remained perfectly quiet and loyal during the trying siege when our very scanty garrison was surrounded by Ayoub Khan's numerous host. It was not for the interest of the people of Candahar, but against their interest and to their grave injury, that we abandoned Candahar. To whom did the British Government give up that populous and flourishing city? The Governor, whom the Ameer, our protégé, had sent to succeed us, was described by the able correspondent of The Times, then with General Hume, "as a loutish-looking youth of 19, with manners worse than that of the average Afghan noble." It was to this "loutish-looking youth" and his tender mercies that the people of Candahar were given over by a Government that professed to consult their interest. Now, the same unfortunate people are exposed to the resentment of the new victor, and the House may easily picture the fate of those who are obnoxious to Ayoub, because they have been partizans either of England or of Abdurrahman. Well, Sir, there is a fourth ground, on which those who wish well to the power and repute of Great Britain, opposed the policy of surrender. I do not expect this reason to carry much weight with hon. Members opposite, who seem as indifferent to the honour as they are to the material interests of their country. The word of England—that word hitherto inviolate—had been pledged to the people of Candahar, that “they should not again fall under the rule of Cabul.” These were the words in which Sir Donald Stewart, as Governor and as General, representing the British Government, addressed those people. That promise was in 12 months fulfilled by their transfer, their unwilling transfer, to the considerate autocracy of a “loutish youth of 19,” the Agent of the Ameer of Cabul. Sir, when I speak of this humiliating transaction, I cannot help recalling a similar episode, associated with others even more disgraceful, in the recent history of another portion of the British Empire. Sir Garnet Wolseley, also as Governor and General, assured the loyal Colonists and Natives of the Transvaal that—[Cries of “Question!”] I have no doubt those home truths are extremely unpalatable to hon. Members below the Gangway. I am entitled to illustrate my argument by a reference to a parallel case, and I do not intend to be disconcerted by the interruptions of the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine). Sir Garnet Wolseley said that “the rivers should flow back in their courses, that the sun should rise in the West,” before the Transvaal should be again given up to the Boers. Both these solemn assurances have been falsified by the action of the present Ministry. It is an evil practice which they are introducing; a practice which destroys all confidence among the nations in the honoured word of England. Sir, I trust that I have been able to show that the abandonment of Candahar was most unfortunate and ill-timed, and that it benefited no one. Neither the power, the influence and commerce of Great Britain, nor the interests of the people of Southern Afghanistan, nor the safety of Hindostan, were secured by our retreat. Within a few months of the day on which the last British soldier filed out from the ramparts of that splendid position, our enemy is within its walls; and Russia, has, in breach of her engagements, annexed a splendid people and a fertile territory, which brings her armies 400 miles nearer our Northern Indian Frontier, and close to the borders of Afghanistan. That country is the key of Hindostan. Nadir Shah, the great Persian conqueror, said that “the power which holds Candahar holds India.” All the great authorities are agreed, whatever was their side in English politics, that all Russian influence must be excluded from Afghanistan. Even Lord Lawrence, the great standby of hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, had said that if Russia moved with regard to Afghanistan “we must wage war with her in every quarter of the globe.” The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs strongly affirmed this principle in his recent speech during the Candahar debate. Afghanistan could not stand by itself. It must fall under either British or Russian influence. If we deliberately abnegate our interests and duties in that country, Russia will quickly and gladly occupy our position, and we can hardly blame her for doing so. Every event of recent Afghan history proves this. When Shere Ali had been satisfied that the Ministry of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) were, in 1873, too short-sighted or too timid to give him the alliance he offered and prayed for, Shere Ali at once threw himself into the arms of Russia. There is no unity or homogeneity about Afghanistan. It is not united, and hardly ever has been united. For a short time, under Dost Mahomet and Shere Ali, but only after bloody and exhausting civil wars, has Afghanistan been united. The inhabitants are made up of different races, with no bond of union, who are alien in religion and hostile in feeling to each other. The military strength of even an united Afghanistan is contemptible. We have never found any difficulty in conquering it; nor should we have had much trouble in holding it, provided we had possessed the courage to have a distinct and consistent policy, and to stand to it. A large party could soon be formed favourable to our rule, and the whole country would settle down as quietly as the Punjaub did in 1847. There are already 700,000 Afghans subject to British rule in that province. Russia can easily conquer and hold Afghanistan. What, then, are the dangers from a Russian advance? However much the apprehensions and warnings of those who have often been styled alarmists and Russo-phobists may have been ridiculed, no one who contemplates the patent facts of Russia's recent progress in Asia can any longer be indifferent to her advance. I will not weary the House with the details of Russian conquest in Asia. Suffice it to say that since 1862 she has moved forwards over 1,000 miles in the direction of British India. Her armies have traversed vast regions, great rivers, sterile deserts; have overcome savage and warlike races; have conquered great and populous cities, and acquired fresh bases for their operations within striking distance of Afghanistan, if not of India itself. In two directions her outposts are now barely 600 miles from our North-Western Frontier. The great Khanates of Central Asia have been conquered and annexed; and in the cities of Tashkend, Bokhara, and Samarcand, General Kauffman presides over an immense Vice-Royalty, bounded by the Oxus. On the more menacing side of the Caspian, General Skobelev has recently made a prodigious advance, which has brought him close to Herat, and made Russia master of the richest portion of the Turcoman country, and of Northern Persia. It will be a terrible mistake, one fraught with the most disastrous consequences, if Parliament shows itself indifferent to this menacing proximity. Do hon. Members really ridicule the danger of a Russian invasion of India? Do they still assert that she has no intention nor wish to acquire that splendid Dependency for herself? On what grounds do they base their foolish confidence? What is there in the history of Russia to justify it? Has not her whole career been one of continuous aggression and conquest? Which of her neighbours have escaped her tenacious and devastating onslaught? Race after race, country after country has succumbed to the insatiable greed of the Russian power for fresh territory. What is there in the special case of India to justify such confidence? I ask hon. Members to consider the bare facts of the Russian advance in Asia, and ask themselves, dispassionately, for what object she can have incurred the vast sacrifices she has cheerfully undergone to extend her power, and always in the same direction — towards Hindostan? Why has she expended so much blood and treasure, so much labour and time in the conquest of wild countries and of brave and barbarous peoples? There can be but one reply. Her toil and expenditure have been devoted to one great object quite worthy of such efforts and offering an ample reward. The prize sought for is the fabled wealth of Hindostan. India, the Eldorado of all great conquerors, from Alexander I. down to our own time, is the reward that Russia has in view. It may be that experience has taught us that India is not so rich as we once imagined. Yet there is a vast amount of realized treasure in that country, of coin, of precious stones, of ornamental wealth, which are most attractive to an avaricious bureaucracy, civil and military, such as that which has control of the Russian Power. They are troubled with no scruples. It is not the good of the conquered people they seek. There are no sentimental humanitarians to press the claims, just or unfounded, of the subject population upon the conscience of the Russian public at home. The Russians desire to conquer countries in order to exploit them. The Natives of India would soon enough discover the contrast between our beneficent supremacy and the remorseless tyranny of St. Petersburg. Russian rule has been a curse and not a blessing to every people that has fallen under its crushing power. But, Sir, do facts in any way show that Russia has no intention of invading India? I have good evidence to the contrary. Scores of Russian officers have in my presence avowed their hope of sharing some day in the attack upon that coveted Dependency. Russians are extremely frank in their admissions upon these subjects — I mean the ordinary Russian officer or civilian, not, of course, the professional diplomatist or politician. General Skobelev himself, the ablest of Russian commanders, has repeatedly stated that he hoped himself to lead the Russian Army that should march to the conquest of India. The Grand Duke Nicholas the younger, in a book recently published, speaks of a pass in Central Asia which he was then exploring as on the route that he expected to traverse with an army of invasion. India, I affirm, is the goal, the ultimate end, not only of all Russian progress in Central Asia, but of the military aspirations of the great bulk of the Russian Army. Now, Sir, this being the case, I should like to ask hon. Members opposite if they have any idea what that Army is? Authorities of great weight say that in a few years it will number over 8,000,000 of fighting men. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, these are not my figures, they are the official estimates of the Russian War Office as to the results of its new scheme of Army Re-organization. They are confirmed by the evidence of a gentleman of intimate acquaintance with Russia, the only European who took part in General Skobelev's recent Turcoman campaign. I should like to read what this gentleman, the Correspondent of The République Française, the leading journal of France, M. Gambetta's organ, says of the Russian Army—

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

"The Russian Army within seven years will number an effective of 8,000,000 of men. You cannot imagine the ardour which excites all these young men, soldiers to the tips of their fingernails, only demanding a campaign—constant, satisfied, proud, when they gain the Cross of St. George, or when in the midst of flashing sabres they can die gloriously. You cannot compare these men with any other European Army. To them war is a game, a pleasure, a recompense. 'Hurrah! the Tekkes!' they cried, when they were on the march to Central Asia, ready to die rather than to retreat (he saw two whole companies slaughtered, not one having tried to fly). You must see them, you must hear them, you must live in their midst to understand them. War is a perpetual song; it is their ardent irresistible desire to hurl themselves into the mêlée."

Now, Sir, it does not matter very much for my argument whether the Russian Forces are 8,000,000, or 4,000,000, or 2,000,000 strong; the smallest number would, I imagine, be a most awkward problem for our scanty Army to cope with. India has been often conquered by invaders who followed the very route by which the Russians are now so rapidly pressing. To take one instance only, Nadir Shah, in the middle of the last century, marched with 80,000 men from Teheran to Candahar, from Candahar to Delhi, the capital of Hindostan. He took and sacked the Imperial city, and then marched to Bokhara, North of the Oxus, by way of Herat and Balkh. Nadir Shah thus traversed the two great pathways by which the Russians are now converging upon India. How, then, does the Party which advocates indifference and neglect propose to meet an invasion when it comes? Do they think that Russian bayonets can be met by anything except armed men? Do they think that they can repel the onslaught of the men who took Plevna by laughing at them? Or do they propose to entrench themselves behind their moneybags—and even these are shrinking—and expect the Russians to retire overwhelmed from the contest? Is it by their superior "moral sense?" Is it by their self-satisfied consciousness of superior philanthropy? Is it by their pacific intentions that they hope to drive back the Cossack and the Circassian? I know, Sir, it has been the fashion to allay alarms by assuming that Russia has not the money, nor the resources wherewith to invade India. Let not hon. Members lay that flattering unction to their souls. There cannot be a greater mistake. No country that has the men, and the spirit, the courage, enterprize, and desire to undertake a great war is ever kept back for want of money. Lord Derby, in this respect, made a prediction as mistaken as most of his political conclusions. He publicly stated, early in 1877, that Russia could not possibly attack Turkey because her finances were in such a bad condition. Well, Sir, Russia did attack Turkey within a few weeks of that prophecy. She waged a tremendous and exhausting war with her valiant enemy and was victorious. I doubt if the credit of Russia stands much, if any, lower now than it did before that struggle of 1877. Russia has an unlimited supply of good fighting men; nor will she want for money. Iron has always conquered gold. It always will conquer gold unless the gold is defended by strong arms and courageous hearts. You can only repel a Russian invasion by being prepared and resolute. It is the strong man armed that keeps his house in safety, and not those who wait until the danger is upon them in an overwhelming torrent, before they begin to take necessary precautions. It would be a fatal blunder to meet the Russian attack on the Indus—that is, on the plains of Hindostan. For if Russian Armies were in possession of Afghanistan, the key of India, if behind "that veil of mountains" Russia could mature her plans of invasion at leisure and in secrecy, it would be open to her to select her own time for pouring her armies by different outlets upon your immense and ill-defended Frontier. A single battle there would settle, as it has often settled before, the fate of India. It is an axiom of good generalship to keep your enemy as far as possible away from your central resources—from the heart and strength of your power. Once let him penetrate within your inner lines, and immediate collapse may follow from a vital blow. This was the case with France in 1870. So soon as the Germans penetrated her Frontier line of fortresses around Metz, all resistance was ineffectual. War should be, if possible, conducted in your enemy's country rather than in your own. It spares your own people great ravages and suffering. If you had such a splendid position as Candahar, you would paralyze any attempt to attack you by any other route. You could then await your enemy with confidence in a fortress of great strength, abounding in every kind of natural resource. With the railway to Candahar, British troops could be placed within its ramparts within four weeks of their leaving your shores. Not a man or gun need be moved from Hindostan itself. All the garrisons of that country could be retained to meet the emergency of internal trouble. It is by no means improbable that if you waited to meet the Russians on the Indus, the most serious difficulty you would have to deal with would not be their bayonets in your front, but an alarmed and discontented population in your rear. Well and honourably as India is governed, it would be folly to shut our eyes to the fact that there are large sections of the population jealous of our rule. There are fanatical feelings towards the alien race, and ambitious Princes jealous of our ascendancy. There are proud races discontented at having their right of tyranny over their less warlike neighbours taken from them by the equity of British rule. There are Princes whose right to make war, to plunder and annex, has been curtailed since they were compelled to bow before the flag of England. How artfully, and with what success Russia would work upon the jealousy, ambition, and smouldering discontent of the Natives of India, those who know her history will be at no loss to realize. Russia would choose her own time for her great and final blow. It might well be such a one as the present, when our scanty Army has its hands full with a revolt in a distant Colony and with revolution and anarchy at home. Meet her onslaught at Candahar, and even if the most improbable contingency of your being driven out of that fortress occurred, there are dozens of positions among the defiles between Candahar and India which a few men can make good against an army. Sir, there are two facts in connection with the Russian system of conquest which deserve special notice. They constitute the great difference between her conquests and those of England. Every race, every district which Russia acquires is immediately subjected to a rigid conscription. Her fighting material is thus constantly increased. Each fresh acquisition is thus made a stepping-stone for a further conquest. In the late Russo-Turkish War, it was her auxiliary and subject races that bore the brunt, at least of the earlier stages of the contest. It was after the Poles, the Finns, and the Cossacks had been decimated that the Imperial Guard was brought up to finish the war. In Asia Minor it was the Grenadiers of the Caucasus that stormed Kars, and Georgian and Circassian regiments that did most of the fighting. In a few years the most determined of Russia's opponents will learn to fight under her banners. Those same Daghestani mountaineers, who, under Schamyl, waged a struggle to the death for 12 years before they succumbed, are now her choicest troops. It is with them that Skobelev has just annihilated the Turcomans of Akhal. Therefore, it is of serious moment to us whenever Russia adds fresh strength to her already enormous forces. She is conquering the finest races of Asia. With our scanty Army and declining military spirit this cannot be a matter of indifference to us. It has been said that these conquests weaken the Russian power. It may be true that her internal condition, honeycombed as it is with revolution and discontent, is very bad; but her military strength is not less—it is considerably greater than it has ever been before. The second point is the system of colonization that Russia adopts with regard to every new and unsettled country. Colonies of Native Russians or Cossacks are planted among the conquered population. These live side by side with them, and hold their land on tenure of military service, like the old Roman Border Colonists, from whose tenure originated the feudal system. They are thus able and ready to suppress the first beginning of revolt. In the Caucasus these Military Colonies are frequent. Some of the Circassian mountaineers have actually been transported 1,000 miles from their homes to make room for their oppressors. So now the recently subjugated country of the Turcomans is being effectually colonized with Cossack settlements. Now, Sir, I come to the latest advance of Russia towards India, and the most serious of all. In my humble judgment, the fall of Geok Tepé was the gravest event for British interests that has taken place in Asia since the Indian Mutiny. Russia has at one stroke advanced her outposts nearly 400 miles nearer to our Empire in Hindostan; she has subdued a gallant people, and acquired a very rich and valuable territory. Before considering the annexation of the Turcoman country further, I wish to bring under the notice of the House the horrible, the atrocious cruelty with which this last conquest, like so many others, has been effected. The conduct of General Skobelev closely resembles that of his predecessor, General Lomakin, in the expedition of 1879. Within the badly-constructed clay walls of the great aoul or village of Geok Tepé were collected most of the families, as well as the fighting-men, of the Akhal Turcomans. Upon this vast assemblage of some 50,000 souls, men, women, and children, the Russian General rained continuously for three weeks, heavy shot, mitraille, and bullets. He surrounded the encampment with his Cavalry and Artillery (70 cannon), and prevented any attempt at escape on the part of these wretched beings. When Geok Tepé was taken by assault, aided by dynamite mines, General Skobelev, in his official Report, states that 4,000 unburied bodies were found within the walls. The number of Turcomans who perished in their most gallant defence is estimated, at the very least, at 12,000 persons. So much for the humanity of a Russian General who bombards an inhabited encampment even of Turcomans, and refuses to allow the women and children to escape. But what followed? I will describe it in the words of General Skobelev himself. When the survivors, abandoning the struggle, fled from this scene of death, he let loose upon them his Cavalry and Horse Artillery.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

"For 17 versts our soldiers pursued and slaughtered the fugitives; 8,000 of both sexes were hacked to pieces by our pursuing troops."

Was a more fearful, more heartrending scene ever pictured by the imagination?

These wretched people, encumbered with their families, fled across the level plain without protection or shelter. Grape shot and rifle bullets were poured through their dense masses, while the sabres and lances of the Cavalry did their work upon the defenceless fugitives, and the bayonets of the Infantry despatched the wounded and exhausted who could no longer fly. Let me briefly quote the account of what General Lomakin did in 1879. General Lomakin wrote as follows in his official Report to the Russian Government:—

"During six hours our 12 cannon kept up a continued fire on the fortified village settlement, where were collected nearly all the population of Akhal, including women and children, more than 20,000 persons. The effect of our artillery was terrible. The Turcoman prisoners say that several thousands of their people were killed."

The Correspondent of The Golos, the principal Russian newspaper, thus describes the scene—

"At 4 o'clock the women and children streamed out of the aoul by two roads with pack-camels, in the hope of passing through and escaping. Picturesque was the sight. The long line of pack-camels, surrounded by women clad in variegated garments, and half-naked children with cries and noise and tears, winding in the direction of the mountains. To the feet of our troopers the beautiful, swarthy Tekke women on their knees, threw themselves, holding forth in their hands sucking babes, and imploring in an unknown tongue to have mercy on them. All of them by command of the Chief of the Staff were turned back to the aoul. Affecting were these scenes; but war will always remain war."

[Mr. CAINE: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) cheers the last sentence. Such barbarity is not war. It may be the warfare of an Attila or Zenghis Khan. It is not the warfare of modern times or of civilized nations. If the hon. Member for Scarborough thinks that it is, let me recommend him to re-read his history. Such atrocious deeds are a disgrace, an ineffaceable disgrace, not only to the cruel generals and soldiers who perpetrate them, but to the Government and Monarch under whose rule they are permitted and encouraged; aye, and to civilization itself. For it is under the pretence of civilization that such foul barbarity has too often of late been committed. I trust, Sir, we shall hear no more of the civilizing mission of Russia, even from the right hon. Gentleman himself, who has been so often her apologist. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] Well, Sir, I will not now detain the House by trying to disprove the disclaimer of the Prime Minister. I regret to say that I cannot accept that disclaimer, recollecting, as I do, expressions with regard to "the knightly crusade," "the sisterly mission," "the civilizing labour" of Russia; recollecting, above all, how actively the right hon. Gentleman worked on her behalf when he was in Opposition. These are no exceptional acts of cruelty on the part of Russian commanders. This is the usual way in which Russian warfare is conducted. General Kaufmann treated the Yomud Turcomans with equal cruelty in 1875. I could even parallel these massacres from a hundred similar and worse cases in Bulgaria and Roumelia during the late devastating war. At Hermanli this same Skobelev, able general and agreeable companion that he is, drove with his Cossacks and Artillery 80,000 helpless refugees, most of them women and children, through a deep river and a narrow gorge, and finally into the bleak hills of the Rhodope, where most of them perished amid the frost and snow of a severe winter. What, Sir, is this Turcoman region which Russia has just annexed in spite of her promises? It will be remembered what an effect the assurances of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had upon the House during the Candahar debate. He told the House in the most formal manner that the new Czar had recalled Skobelev, and that Russia would withdraw from her recent conquests. Sir, I cannot suppose that the hon. Gentleman, a responsible Minister of the Crown, would have made such a statement had he not possessed what he believed to be ample grounds for making it. I cannot believe that he would make a statement which was intended to influence, and which did influence, a critical debate on a great subject without having received some direct assurance, in the sense he quoted, from the accredited Agents of Russia. What has happened? General Skobelev was not recalled. Within a very few weeks of the Under Secretary's solemn statement there appeared an Imperial Ukase incorporating the whole country of the Akhal Turcomans, and much beyond it, in the Russian Empire. Even that was not enough. Within the past month we learn that the whole of the Attrek Valley and a region extending close up to Meshed, and including some of the most fertile portions of Khorassan, are also annexed. Time was when the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was not the humble and ever ready apologist and defender of Russian aggression that he always now appears to be. Time was when he took a manly and statesmanlike line upon these questions, and when he was no inconsiderable thorn in the side of the Prime Minister's "masterly inactivity." In 1871, during the debates on the Czar's arbitrary abrogation of the Black Sea Clause, the hon. Baronet denounced in no measured terms the weakness and incapacity of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman. What legerdemain has worked the painful change that we see? Is it the thralldom of Office? Is it some other reason? or is it the spell of national humiliation which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) seems to cast over all those with whom he is brought into contact. The hon. Gentleman made a statement in 1871 which I should like to repeat to the House, so sound and admirable as it is itself, and so unlike the uncertain and unsatisfactory utterances which we have been getting accustomed to expect of late from the Under Secretary. It related to the shuffling and pusillanimity shown by Ministers over the Black Sea Clause.

"It is none of the fault of England; but comes of the timidity of her statesmen, and the weakness of her rulers. It is said that the policy of the Government has been a peace policy. I do not think that it has been either a peace policy or a safe policy. It may be a policy for a time cheap—although your Estimates do not show it; but it is not a truly pacific policy, if it is neither calculated to maintain the present dignity of this country, nor the security of any in the future."—[3 Hansard, ccv. 915-16.]

Admirable words! The policy of Her Majesty's Government is, indeed, not a peace policy; it is not a safe policy. It is not cheap. It is a peace-at-any-price policy, a policy of humiliation and surrender—a policy which suggests aggression and invites attack. It is a policy which leads you to spend millions of money and thousands of lives in the near future that you may save some trifling expenditure and some little effort at present. It is a policy which allows threatening evils to accumulate until it is impossible to cope with them without the most desperate sacrifices. It is the policy which drifted England into that unnecessary and costly struggle of the Crimea, which by a little firmness and statesmanship could have been so easily avoided. This is known by nobody better than by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Would that the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) retained a little of the patriotic watchfulness and forethought which he displayed 10 years ago. The moment that we abandoned Oandahar and that the present Government showed that they really meant to go backwards and close their eyes to evident perils, then the Russian Government took heart of grace, and decided that it might venture to annex whatever it fancied. This Turcoman region is a splendid acquisition. The country is rich and prosperous, especially that portion which lies South of the Kopet Dag range, the water-shed of Khorassan, and the proper boundary of Persia. Every traveller who has visited this country has borne evidence to the fertility of the soil and the physique and courage of the people. I will only quote one extract from a good authority, at least one which hon. Members opposite will not dispute. General Petroosevitch, the Russian explorer, writes that besides cultivating juwarree or maize, they grow barley, rear enormous crops of melons, and manufacture embroidered carpets and cloths having no equal in Asia. In one of his rides along the Akhal Frontier in 1878, he caught a glimpse from the crest of the Kopet Dag of the Tekke country near Askabad. He says—

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

“Before me stretched a broad zone of gardens inclosing settlements and containing, according to those who had been there, any quantity of peach-trees, nut-trees, and grape-vines. Walnut trees and vines I myself saw in the neighbouring valleys. Consequently, if the Akhal Tekke settlements, exposed to the North wind, enjoy such a propitious climate, how much more so must the valleys further to the South, sheltered by mountain ridges?”

The valleys the Russian traveller refers to are the valleys of North Khorassan, where sheep lamb twice a year, and the people never know what it is to have a bad harvest. These valleys have already been annexed by Russia. Khorassan, up to and including Herat, was for several centuries the granary of Central Asia. This is really the first valuable country the Russians have yet conquered in Asia. It brings them South of the Desert, which is their natural boundary in Asia, and which should be the barrier between England and Russia. It gives them a fresh base close at our gates, from which they can prosecute their further advance with every advantage of position and resources. They will no longer have long and difficult marches to make, or dangerous opposition to overcome on the road to India. Their railway will soon be able to convey any number of troops from the Caspian to Herat. The Russian Army of the Caucasus is over 100,000 men. It can readily be trebled, and one half despatched to annoy, if not to invade, one of our Indian Possessions. The Russian head-quarters are now barely 100 miles from Meshed, the capital of Khorassan, and second town in Persia. They are less than 300 miles from Herat, “the outer gate of India.” From the Caspian to their new outposts, a distance of over 400 miles, has thus been bridged by one campaign. The integrity of Persia is violated, and the Shah seems to have become a mere instrument in his great neighbour's hand. The most serious fact connected with this advance is the railway which the Russians, with real statesmanship, are bringing forward from the Caspian to Herat. Already, half of the distance to Meshed is laid down; soon one-half of the remainder will be completed. The same Correspondent, whom I have already quoted, gives a most interesting description of its progress and value, written in April last—

“The railroad no longer encounters the least obstacle. It is an immense green billiard-cloth of turf, upon which the sleepers and rails can be placed without need of spade or pick. By next June (1881) the railway will certainly be completed to Bami—i.e., 264 versts (180 to 190 miles). . . . This line, which, such as it is, has so efficaciously served General Skobeleff, will, after June, have a fresh destination. It will then serve, not only to throw into Central Asia as many troops as the Russian Government may desire, but it will serve equally for the transport of merchandise coming from Herat, from Meshed, from Bokhara, and from Samarcand. General Annenkoff is busy in appointing special agents to most of these places, who will direct all their caravans to concentrate at Bami. Let people in England be under no illusion that this line, so excellently constructed, and upon which I have already travelled 35 versts an hour, can arrest itself at Bami. Once at Bami, a Ukase will direct its prolongation to Askabad, if not immediately to Herat. They may move gently (doucement) at St. Petersburg, and dole out their orders by doses of 20 or 50 versts; but it will not be surprising if they make 500.”

According to this well-informed gentleman, there is not the slightest obstacle between the Russian troops and Herat. The ground is level and well watered. "They have but to march some 300 miles, and say 'J'y suis.'" The efforts, and successful ones, which Russia is making to secure the trade of all these regions are not the least suggestive to us. Will it be believed that a British Ministry deliberately threw away such a rare opportunity of extending British trade and political influence as was offered by the railway to Candahar? It seems incredible; yet this was done only four months ago, and we are now reaping the evil fruits. There now remain only the Tekkes of Merv and a few minor tribes independent. These cannot long retain their liberty. Gallant they are; but no untrained and ill-armed race, be it as brave as Hercules, can long stand against breech-loaders. General Kaufmann, from the Oxus, and Skobelev or his successor, from the Tejend, will join hands at Merv, and the whole of this magnificent people of the Turcomans will become Russian subjects. You will then find, too late, what you have lost in allowing such a valuable barrier between your possessions and the Armies of Russia to be beaten down, and not only beaten down, but to be added to the strength of your enemies. The physique of these Turcoman horsemen is unequalled. Their courage is proved by Geok Tepé, when they lost over half their numbers in defence of their liberty. They will make a far finer cavalry than the Cossacks, say Sir Henry Rawlinson, General Baker, Colonel McGregor, and Professor Vambéry. Their breed of horses is matchless, both for speed and endurance. A Turcoman rider will go, for five or six days, 100 miles a-day, on the same horse. It is no wonder that the Russian generals are anxious to conquer, and turn this splendid race into auxiliaries of the Czar. They might, by a very little management and support, be turned into our allies, and fight our battles for us for many years. Instead of this, we shall only too probably have to meet them as enemies upon the Indus. For her advance upon Herat, and thence upon India, there are now three roads open to the Russian Armies. One along the Tejend by Sarakhs, the second through Kuchan and Meshed, and the third West and South of Meshed, avoiding Herat, and striking the main road to Candahar at Farah. That there is no difficulty in marching from Herat to Candahar, Ayoub Khan's advance over the very ground twice within 12 months shows its facility. We have, Sir, a great dominion and a great charge at stake. On the highest ground, we have to guard the safety and interests of 250,000,000 of an alien population in India. However short our rule there may fall of the standard of absolute perfection, no one can deny that England has done much for that wonderful Dependency. It is no empty boast to say that the people of India have never, in their long history, enjoyed such benefits of government as England has conferred upon them. These growing myriads, alien to us and to each other in origin, in creed, in feeling, and in interests, enjoy to an extent, for them unequalled, the blessings of order, of law, of peace, and education, and all that makes a people prosperous and happy. It is our duty to preserve this vast population from the blighting domination of Russia. Nor are the benefits to England herself inconsiderable. The trade with India is worth £100,000,000 every year to this country. The number of your surplus population to whom India gives beneficial occupation, is close upon 250,000,000. She buys your manufactures, and sends you in return her products. More than this, upon the possession of India depends all the carrying trade with the East, with China, Japan, the Islands of the Archipelago, with Arabia and the Persian Gulf. No Englishman can wish to see this mine of wealth for England handed over to the most backward of European Governments, a Government that shuts British products out by protective tariffs. I have ventured to remind the House of these reciprocal advantages to India and to England from our connection with that country. They may be of service to those who would cry "Perish India!" or who could hear that cry unmoved. I have to thank the House for the kind and patient hearing it has granted me. I regret that I could not have dealt with a subject so extensive and important in a shorter compass. The interests and honour of the most noble fabric of Empire that human genius and enterprise have ever erected are at stake. I am very sensible of the inadequacy of my statements. I would only urge upon the Government to be forewarned and forearmed in time to meet the danger while it is still a small cloud upon the horizon, and, before it has swollen and covered the whole sky, to take that "stitch in time which saves nine" in political as well as in domestic relations. Let them retrace their mistakes. Let Candahar be held as an impregnable bulwark of our power, and let the Russians be courteously but firmly informed that they will not be allowed to annex the Turcoman people. England cannot afford to lose the high repute she has hitherto held in the East. I never thought, Sir, that I should hear, as I did in this House a few days ago, the reputation of England spoken of as "that miserable thing called prestige." Sir, what else is prestige but the character, the moral status, the reputation of a people among the nations? It behoves no State to guard its prestige so vigilantly and resolutely as England. Her "thin red line" can do a great deal, but it must have the prestige of old at its back. It is not by your bayonets, your rifles, or your cannon; it is not by your handful of soldiers among myriads of an alien population that the supremacy of England is secured. No, Sir; it is by the belief, hitherto unimpaired among your subjects in India, that the courage of Englishmen is invincible, that the word of England once pledged is never broken; that the foes of your power never gaze upon the backs of your soldiers in permanent retreat; that although you might be beaten once, or twice, or thrice, yet you would return to the struggle with quenchless resolution. These were the great qualities by which Englishmen of the past built up and consolidated the Empire you enjoy. It is by maintaining your reputation for courage, for statesmanship, for unflinching tenacity of purpose that you can alone maintain it.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not hear any proof from the hon. Member that the annexation of the country of the Akhal Turcomans was a violation of any promises made to us. He considered that the hon. Member had been alarming himself unnecessarily. By many persons the importance of Merv had been ridiculously over-estimated; but they had forgotten that Merv was not on the road to India. Candahar was on the road to India, he admitted; but he did not see why there should be so much outcry about it. The late Lord Beaconsfield; while a Member of that House, described in the darkest colours the atrocious character of these Turcomans. They were a set of robbers who had damaged Russia, and had always been a terrible scourge to Persia. It was not for us to complain when Russia, in her own interests, had been forced to make an advance against those enemies of the human race. This advance of Russia was having a civilizing influence in Central Asia; and, even were we so misguided as to seek to stop her advance, we had not the power. He hoped, therefore, the Government, by fair diplomacy, would come to a fair understanding with Russia.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I find it difficult to deal with the somewhat extensive speech of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). The hon. Member has evidently given his attention to this question, and has collected a great deal of information on it. I should be sorry if he or the House supposed that I mean to treat him with disrespect in saying that I will not attempt to follow him through the whole of that speech. But I should find considerable difficulty in doing so, because I am utterly unable to ascertain what was the exact point to which he wished to direct the attention of the House. As the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) said, there was not a word in the speech of the hon. Member to prove the proposition that Russia's annexation of the Akhal Tekke territory was a violation of her promise to this country. Neither has he said a word as to the second proposition in the Motion he had intended to make, that the annexation of the Akhal Tekke territory has been encouraged by the unfortunate evacuation of Candahar. I think the hon. Member was well advised in avoiding that subject, for he would have found it difficult to prove that operations which had been going on for a year before our evacuation of Candahar were encouraged by that evacuation. There is no connection whatever between our occupation of, or advance from, Afghanistan, and the Russian occupation of the Akhal Tekke territory. Does the hon. Member mean to say that if we had resolved to remain in Candahar Russia would have been prepared to abandon the results of her campaigns, and to have retired from the Akhal Tekke territory? [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT was understood to observe that the Under Secretary of State said so.] The Under Secretary of State said nothing of the kind. I do not think it ever entered the head of any reasonable person that such a result would follow. As far as I could gather from the hon. Member's speech, his sole object was to discuss again a subject which was fully discussed months ago—namely, our evacuation of Candahar, which evacuation was approved by a large majority of this House. I do not think it necessary that I should follow the hon. Member into another discussion of that subject. The only matter which I think it may be necessary for me to advert to for one moment is his endeavour to prove that our retirement from Candahar has led to the victory of Ayoo Khan, and that that victory is a condemnation of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The Government and the House also, I think, were perfectly aware that the success of Ayoo Khan against Abdurrahman Khan was perfectly possible, and even probable. We have never pledged ourselves or our policy to the success or to the ability of Abdurrahman Khan to overcome his rival. On the contrary, I remember perfectly well that in the observations that I made to the House in the debate, I stated distinctly that the question of his supremacy in Afghanistan could never be decided until there had been an appeal to arms, and that it was impossible to foretell what the result of that appeal would be. No doubt, we have given some support to Abdurrahman Khan; but, if so, we have done nothing more than to discharge what we considered to be a debt to the people of Afghanistan, rather than an act in our own interests. We have, undoubtedly, inflicted a very great injury and mischief on Afghanistan. We have destroyed whatever existed there in the form of government, and we have replaced it in the state of anarchy in which it was before Sher Ali succeeded to the Throne. That may have been necessary or it may not; but, no doubt, great injury was thereby done to the people of Afghanistan. We decided that it was not necessary in the interest of England that we should permanently occupy and undertake the administration of Afghanistan. Having decided to retire from that country, we considered that it was our duty to its people to give them, at all events, a chance of re-establishing for themselves settled government. Whether we selected the best candidate or not, what was done was done not so much in our own interests as in discharge of a debt to the people of Afghanistan, and to give them the opportunity of restoring, if they thought fit, a settled Government, such as existed before we destroyed it. The hon. Member has informed us that Russia can have no object in conquering these vast and sterile regions, unless it is with the view of invading India. At other times he informed us that she had acquired by those conquests fertile districts and the control of useful, warlike, and also industrial populations. He told us that he had had the privilege of conversing with General Skobelev and hundreds of Russian officers, who, with wonderful unanimity, had avowed their intention of invading and conquering India, and that Indian Sepoys are quite unable to cope with the Russian soldiers. I wish when he made that assertion that somebody on the Bench opposite had explained how, under those circumstances, it entered into the mind of the late Government to bring Indian Sepoys from India for the purpose of defeating Russian soldiers in Europe. The hon. Member told us that the danger which now threatened India from the advance of Russia is only to be compared to a small cloud; but that soon we shall see Russia commanding the services of 8,000,000 men. He did not inform us by what process the Russian Army of 500,000 men is to be increased to the extent of 8,000,000. He indulged in an eloquent denunciation of the cruelties practised by Russia in the conquest of the Turcomans. It is no business of mine to defend Russia, and, no doubt, those campaigns may have been accompanied by some cruelties. But when the hon. Gentleman denounced Russia in such warm terms he ought to have adduced stronger proofs than he did of the facts that those cruelties were committed. All that he brought forward was the report that a Russian General had bombarded a fortified place, which not only contained soldiers, but the families of soldiers. I do not conceive that it is possible, if women and children and property are placed within a fortified inclosure, to avoid the bombardment of such a fortified position consistently with the necessities of war.

The Marquess of Hartington

The hon. Member only quoted the Correspondent of a newspaper, and gave no official authority for the allegation he made in that respect. He had spoken of the annexation of the Akhal Tekke country as a menace and a danger to India. Differing altogether as I do from the views of the hon. Member and those who agree with him as to the security of our position in India, I cannot admit his contention in this respect. But if it is any satisfaction to him, I have not the smallest hesitation in saying with perfect plainness that I do not think the annexation by Russia of the Akhal Tekke country is a matter of indifference to us. I will not enter into the discussion of the question whether that annexation was consistent or inconsistent with the pledges given by Russia to this country. I think that a good deal may be said on both sides of that question; but it has not been entered upon by the hon. Member, and I do not wish to enter upon it now. We are not concerned in the independence of the Akhal Tribes. But the recent advances and conquests of Russia have, no doubt, had consequences which do affect us in two points very nearly. The extension of Russian territory along the Northern Border of Persia raises a question of the integrity of Persia which cannot be indifferent to us, and the near approach of Russia to the borders of Afghanistan is not a matter of indifference to us. The present Government have admitted as plainly as any other that the integrity and independence of Afghanistan is a matter to them of vital importance, and that they do not intend to permit interference by any foreign Power with the internal or external affairs of Afghanistan. If Afghanistan were under a settled form of government it might be indifferent to us whether Russia or any other country extended to the very borders of Afghanistan. But that is not the case of Afghanistan. It has not, and perhaps it never may have, what we recognize as a settled form of government. There could be no doubt that, if Russia advanced towards the borders of Afghanistan, a state of things might ensue which would not be of advantage to the good relations between this country and Russia. Such an advance, therefore, could not be a subject of indifference to Her Majesty's Government, and I have no objection to state that what has taken place in Central Asia is receiving the consideration of the Government. But what does the hon. Member ask us to do? I have listened to his speech, and I confess I failed to ascertain the conclusion at which he arrived. The hon. Member, indeed, said there was some connection between our leaving Candahar and the advance of Russia; but, so far from that being so, it is my opinion, and it is the opinion of many persons—military men and others of high authority in India—that our continued retention of Candahar would have been in itself a sufficient reason for the advance of Russia.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he wished to explain that what he had said was that it was the general policy of retreat which had been adopted which encouraged the advance of Russia. He had not said that none of the Sepoys were a match for the Russian troops. What he did say was that most of them were not.

MR. ONSLOW expressed his thanks to the noble Lord for the re-assuring speech he had made. For his part, he did not look at the question from a political point of view. The noble Lord said that the Government had always shown Russia that the independence of Afghanistan could not be a matter of indifference to them. The present position of that country was most serious, for if it fell under the rule of Ayooob Khan it would be governed by an enemy of ours and a friend to Russia. Her Majesty's Government could not, therefore, too plainly give Russia to understand that there should be no interference on her part with Afghanistan.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the noble Marquess had stated the broad outlines of the policy of the Government, and it was satisfactory to have to deal with a Member of the Government who did not take shelter under evasions. For his part, he would not regret seeing Ayooob Khan Ruler of Afghanistan. It was true he hated England, and not without cause; but if he kept England out of Afghanistan on one side he might be relied on to keep Russia out on the other. He thought the real danger of the matter was that Russia was advancing near enough to India to be within striking or, at any rate, agitating distance; and in the latter case her action would be sufficient to compel this country to send to India a force which would have a tendency to cripple her power in Europe.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH asked leave to withdraw the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

REGULATION OF THE FORCES BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

[BILL 193.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. CHILDERS: I beg to move, Sir, that you do now leave the Chair. I should not have done more than make that Motion if it had not been for the Notice given by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Alexander), in the early part of the evening, of his intention to oppose the Motion for going into Committee. I have not the slightest idea what the motive of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is in taking that course. The Bill is a very simple one, and it has been in print for some time. It contains certainly two important clauses—one to enable the Chelsea Commissioners to grant certain pensions, in regard to which I have been interrogated several times in the course of the present Session; and the other to enable the Crown to increase the Reserve by allowing men, after their 12 years' engagement, to volunteer for four years more into a second Reserve. All the rest of the Bill relates to matters of detail in connection with the Scheme approved this Session, or improving the provisions of the Army Discipline and Regulation Act. I hope, therefore, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not persist in his opposition to the measure at this stage, believing, as I do, that when the House goes into Committee, I shall be able to prove that there is no real ground of objection to any of the proposals contained in it. I promise him that when we come to any clause he objects to, I will explain the purpose of it as fully and as candidly as I can. I hope he will allow the House to go into Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr Childers.)

Mr. O'Donnell

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, it was with considerable surprise that he had first perused the provisions of the Bill now before the House. When, two years ago, after labours only exceeded by those of the present year, the House at last succeeded in passing the Army Regulation Act, it was imagined that their labours had terminated for ever. They were doomed to find, however, that like those of Sisyphus they were eternal. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had placed in their hands a Bill which really consisted of three parts and 53 clauses. The contemplation of the prospect before them was eminently discouraging; and he looked back with regret to the halcyon days when they were able to pass 100 clauses of the Mutiny Act in the course of a single Sitting. Two years ago it was proposed to substitute for the Mutiny Act a consolidated Code of Army Regulations, and it was imagined that that Code contained, at least, the element of permanence. They relied upon the judgment of Sir Henry Thring, the eminent draftsman, for rendering the provisions of the Act perfect; and they were told that it was impossible for the ingenuity of man to contemplate a crime which would not be dealt with and punished by the Act of 1879. Yet, notwithstanding that declaration by so eminent a draftsman, he found that the Bill now before the House contained many additions to, and alterations of, the Act of 1879; and some of them, in comparison with the provisions of the Act of 1879, were distinctly disadvantageous to the British soldier. At the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War he would withdraw his opposition to the Motion for going into Committee; but when the Bill went into Committee he should propose certain alterations in some of the clauses, which he hoped would meet with the assent of the right hon. Gentleman, and with that of hon. Members on both sides of the House. Before he sat down he wished briefly to make good his assertion that where the Bill erred it erred on the side of excessive severity. He would take, for instance, the important clause which dealt with the composition of a general court martial. This was an important court, because, with the exception of what was known as a field general court martial, an ordinary general court martial was the only court which had power to sentence a prisoner to death or penal servitude. In the English Army, following the customs of the Swedish, Dutch, and German Armies, the general court martial originally consisted of 13 members; but in the Army of James II., by the Articles of War, the court was made to consist, according to the French practice, of not less than seven members. From the passing, however, of the first Mutiny Act of 1689, in the Reign of William III., down to so recent a period as 1868, the minimum number of members of a general court martial in the United Kingdom was fixed at 13. In 1868 an important alteration was made and the minimum number of members composing a general court martial was fixed in the United Kingdom and the East Indies, Malta and Gibraltar, at nine; for Bermuda and Nova Scotia, at seven; and in any other Colony or place out of the Queen's Dominions, at five. An important provision was also added that no sentence of death in any circumstances should be passed, except with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members composing the court. In the Act of 1879 the minimum of nine members was continued for a general court martial, except when, in the opinion of the officer convening the court, that number in the interests of the Public Service was not available, in which case the general court martial was to consist of not less than five members. But now, what did they find in the present Bill? The word "nine" had no place in it at all, and it was simply provided that the general court martial should consist of not less than five members. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would ask him to read to the end of the sub-section, and would point to the provisions which forbade any officer below the rank of captain from sitting as a member of a general court martial; but he had yet to learn that a prisoner would derive any consolation from being sentenced to death by a captain instead of a lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman also said that five was the minimum number of members composing the court, and that, as a general rule, the number of members composing the court would exceed that minimum. That was quite true; but he had had considerable experience in acting as Deputy Judge Advocate before general courts martial, and he could remember more than one case in which the actual number of members composing the court was, through sickness and through other causes, reduced to a minimum. That was not very material in the days when 13 formed the court; but they were now making a very small minimum number of officers as the composition of a general court martial. In point of fact, they were fixing the composition of a general court martial, which would have power of life and death, at precisely the same number as that which, only two years ago, they fixed for the inferior tribunal of a regimental court martial, whose powers were limited to sentencing a prisoner to 42 days' imprisonment with hard labour. He also found that they were going to allow four members out of five composing the court to pass a sentence of death, and three out of five to pass a sentence of penal servitude. Then, again, he found that, by Clause 48 of the Bill, the Governor of a Colony or the officer commanding the troops out of the Queen's Dominions was authorized to declare from time to time that it was necessary, either in consequence of the imminence of active service or in consequence of the recent existence of active service, that the troops under his command should be subject to the Act of 1879 precisely as if they were upon active service. In other words, it was provided that a soldier should be liable to suffer the penalty of death for offences which, in ordinary times, would only have been visited by a few months' imprisonment. That was one of the results of the total abolition of corporal punishment, and that was not the last time that they would have to deplore the consequence of yielding as they did in 1879, just previous to a General Election, to the popular clamour for the abolition of corporal punishment. He had never been an advocate of excessive corporal punishment; and it would be remembered that, on a certain memorable occasion, he advised his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley), the then Secretary of State for War, to mitigate the severity of the punishment, and his right hon. and gallant Friend was pleased at the time to say that he would act on his (Colonel Alexander's) advice, and that he would reduce the punishment from 50 to 25 lashes. But he did protest against the spurious humanity which strained at the gnat of corporal punishment and swallowed without compunction the camel of capital punishment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he was glad to see that it was not intended to re-open the question of corporal punishment. The Act of 1879 was necessarily only a tentative Act; and, in consequence of the time occupied in the discussion of the question of corporal punishment, many parts of the Bill were passed without the consideration and discussion which their importance required. It had been found, since the Act came into operation, that there were certain defects and omissions in it which tended to produce a miscarriage of justice. No one knew that better than himself, as he had been charged with the administration of the Act of 1879. The object of the present Bill was simply to remedy those defects and omissions; and he would call the attention of the House to one of them which had already been referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander)—namely, the composition of general courts martial. The Act of 1879 prescribed a certain minimum number of officers both for district and general courts martial, and then allowed that minimum to be reduced by the general officer who convened a court of inquiry, where the larger number were not, having due regard to the Public Service, available; but the fact had to be stated in the order convening the court. The proceedings of several courts martial had been rendered invalid in consequence of the later requirement not having been properly complied with. The object of the Bill was to reduce the minimum number of officers composing the court, and to make the number uniform in every case; but, on the other hand, it was proposed to raise the standing of the officers composing the court. The alteration was a most desirable one, and he hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not persist in his objection to it. He could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that as soon as they got into Committee the Government would be happy to offer every explanation in their power. It was hardly necessary to remind his hon. and gallant Friend that at that period of the Session it would be quite impossible to pass the Bill at all unless the House was disposed to accept the guarantee of the Government that the changes proposed would be advantageous to the interests of the Army.

Colonel Alexander

MR. O'DONNELL said, he understood that the objection of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) was to the very small majority of a very small court by which important sentences—such as death and penal servitude—could be passed under the Bill as it stood. He hoped the question was one on which the Government were open to persuasion, because, of course, although the argument was very strong that at that time of the Session they could not afford to devote to the measure a very scrutinizing spirit, still it was desirable that some consideration should be given to points of this kind.

MR. CHILDERS did not understand that the point raised by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) was one of those which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander).

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Punishment of fraudulent enlistment of militiaman).

MR. CHILDERS said, he had a verbal Amendment to move in line 21—namely, to substitute the words "punishable for" for the words "guilty of."

Amendment proposed,

In line 21, to leave out the words "guilty of," in order to insert the words "punishable for."—(Mr. Childers.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 7 to 13, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Removal of doubts as to pensions of army reserve men).

MR. CHILDERS said, it would be necessary to make an addition to the clause, for the purpose of incorporating a former Act.

Amendment proposed,

In line 23, to add the words "and Sections 4, 5, and 7, of the Army Discipline and Regulation (Annual) Act of 1881."—(Mr. Childers.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 15 to 19, inclusive, agreed to.

Offences in relation to Courts Martial.

Clause 20 (Amendment of s. 28 as to power of court martial over contempt).

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he thought this clause would be found to be quite unworkable. Under the Act of 1879 a witness might be sentenced by a court martial for contempt of court to imprisonment not exceeding 21 days' hard labour. The present clause authorized the court to sentence a prisoner for using violent or threatening language to the same punishment of 21 days' imprisonment with hard labour. But the use of threatening language to the members of a court martial was one of the greatest military offences a prisoner could commit; and it had always been the practice, up to the present time, to try a prisoner so offending by general court martial. He recollected an instance, when he was himself acting as Deputy Judge Advocate, where a prisoner was tried for using abusive words. He was tried by an inferior court; and on being asked if he had any objection to make to the composition of the court, he said he objected to the whole lot, and he used most violent and threatening language. For that offence he was subsequently tried by a general court martial and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. It was quite evident either that such a term of imprisonment was too great, or that 21 days' imprisonment for the same offence was much too little. He thought it would be much better if the right hon. Gentleman would allow the clause to be struck out altogether.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the clause simply gave power to the court by which a man was tried to sentence a prisoner who was guilty of contempt of court to 21 days' imprisonment; but, if it were considered necessary, the contempt committed having been of a serious character, there was power to convene another court. Hitherto, in every case of contempt, however slight, it had been necessary to convene a second court for the trial of the second offence. That practice had been found to be highly inconvenient, and there had occasionally been great difficulty experienced in summoning another court. This clause, in such a case, gave power to the court against whom the contempt was committed to sentence the offender to some punishment.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to point out that a punishment of 21 days' imprisonment with hard labour might, in many cases, be wholly inadequate to the offence.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that, in the event of the offence being of an aggravated nature, of course another court martial would be summoned. It was only where the offence was slight that power was given by the clause to the same court to try it.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought, if the object of the clause was to amend the provisions of the Mutiny Act, power might be given to the court to award a far higher punishment than 21 days' imprisonment with hard labour. Such a punishment seemed to him to be absurd, for the grossest conduct which could be committed by a soldier when before a court martial. As a rule, when an offence of this character did take place, it was of a violent and aggravated character; and he thought the clause might be amended so as to extend the punishment inflicted without rendering it necessary to summon another court martial.

MR. CHILDERS: I will consider the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member before the Report is brought up. I must remind him, however, that it would be introducing a clause very much against the prisoner. We have thought it better to leave the Act as it stood, with the single exception of giving the same court the power of trying the case. The clause does not restrict the power of a second court martial. I think the Committee would hardly venture to allow a court martial, not specially summoned for the purpose, to inflict a heavy punishment.

MAJOR-GENERAL BURNABY thought the clause was one which was worthy of further consideration. He remembered a case where a prisoner in the Army, being tried for some trifling offence, had his cap removed from him, because he would persist in throwing it at the President or members of the court. On another occasion, a prisoner got away from the escort and struck a member of the court. He did not think that for such offences 21 days' imprisonment was sufficient punishment; but, of course, a general court martial might be convened for the purpose of trying the second offence. He understood that the present clause was only intended to meet minor offences, when they did occur. But, unfortunately, they seldom did occur, because when a soldier lost his temper he generally went in for some gross act of insubordination.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the hon. and gallant General was quite right. It was only intended that the present clause should deal with minor offences.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Courts Martial.

Clause 23 (Amendment of ss. 47 & 48, 51 & 53, as to composition of courts martial).

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he perceived that sub-section 2 of this clause reduced the number of members composing a regimental court martial from five to three. The power of the court was limited to the infliction of a punishment of 42 days' imprisonment with hard labour; but he also observed that there was, for the first time, a provision in the clause that each member of the court should have held a commission for not less than one whole year. Up to the present time the requirement had been that no officer should serve on a court martial until he had joined his regiment for six months, and that during that time he should have attended all the courts martial which were held in the regiment. That provision had been found to work irregularly, because it was not improbable that in the course of the six months no court martial would be held, and, consequently, an officer was liable to be placed on a court martial before he had had an opportunity of attending any court of the kind, or, at the most, only one or two, and when he was, consequently, altogether incapable of performing the duty he was required to perform. He quite approved of the alteration made by the clause in this respect; but he disapproved of sub-section 3, which reduced the number of members composing a general court martial from nine to five. He therefore, move that sub-section struck out of the clause, in order to leave the number nine, as it now is in the Act of 1879.

Amendment proposed, in page leave out sub-section 3.—(Colonel Alexander.)

Question proposed, "That the proposed be left out stand part Clause."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said Section was governed by section the Act of 1879, sub-section 2. section provided that a general martial should consist of not less than nine members; but, under the present law, nine was not adhered to a minimum where the general office convened the court thought it was impossible to bring nine officers together. Having regard to the interest of the Public Service, it had often found expedient to reduce the minimum to five. Therefore, it was not correct to say that nine officers were the minimum. Nine formed the minimum in England; but abroad it was found that nine officers were available and the minimum was generally five. The present minimum, therefore, was practically five abroad and nine in England.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the minimum was in India?

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said he could not answer for India. He did not see the records of Indian courts martial, but he did see them in regard to other courts martial, and as there existed at present a power to reduce the nominal minimum, he did not see objection there could be to the Government's Government thought the best course would be to reduce the minimum, and to provide that the minimum which was constantly employed should in future, be the minimum, so as to make the proceedings uniform in all cases. On the other hand, it was proposed to raise the status of the officers composing the court, so that, although the number was reduced, a preponderance would have the advantage of being by officers of higher standing. In the matter of fact, the clause did not reduce the minimum below that which was found necessary in the case of general courts martial abroad.

Major-General Burnaby

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that what he wished to point out to his right hon. Friend was that the Act of 1879 fixed nine as the minimum for all general courts martial assembled in the United Kingdom, Malta, Gibraltar, and the East Indies; seven for Bermuda and Nova Scotia; and five for any Colony or any other place out of the Queen's Dominions. He did not see how it was not possible to continue that arrangement, and why the number should not be nine in the United Kingdom as heretofore.

MR. CHILDERS: I think there is something in the objection of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and on the Report I will consider the desirability of introducing nine as the number for the United Kingdom and the East Indies.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the concession, and would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that for the same reason he proposed to amend the clause in regard to district courts martial. The clause reduced the number of officers composing a regimental court martial from five to three, and also reduced the number of a district court martial from seven to three. He would move that the number "five" be substituted for a district court martial.

Amendment proposed, in sub-section 4, line 19, to substitute "five" for "three."—(Colonel Alexander.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he would introduce an Amendment on the Report, making the number uniform.

COLONEL ALEXANDER intimated that upon that understanding he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 23 agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 34, inclusive, agreed to.

Pay.

Clause 35 (Amendment of ss. 133 to 135 as to penal stoppages from ordinary pay).

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked for an explanation with respect to sub-section

A of this clause. The powers of commanding officers were considerably increased by the Act of 1879, and it seemed to him that this sub-section would tend to induce commanding officers to keep soldiers in confinement, thereby delaying the punishment due to their offences, which ought to be awarded as soon as possible.

MR. CHILDERS said, that would not be the effect of the clause, which was intended to correct that portion of the Act of 1879 which provided that a soldier absent without leave should forfeit his pay during his absence, and also for every day of his imprisonment and detention on the charge for which he was brought before the court martial.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he found no provision in the clause that where a commanding officer delayed to bring a soldier to punishment the soldier should not suffer for the delay caused by the misconduct of the commanding officer.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that Section 45 of the Act of 1879 provided that the soldier should be brought to trial within eight days.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that sub-section 3 would, in his opinion, effect a considerable improvement on the existing practice. There were amongst commanding officers different methods of calculation with regard to the days of a soldier's absence without leave; and, therefore, this portion of the clause could not but be regarded as effecting a great improvement. But, then, the next sub-section went in the opposite direction; and the Government, it would seem, took away with one hand what they had given with the other. He, therefore, begged to move its omission.

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 1, leave out from "or" to the end of the sub-section.—(Colonel Alexander.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHILDERS said, he trusted the Amendment would not be pressed. It had been deemed right that the commanding officer should have power to inflict heavier punishment where necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 36 agreed to.

Exemptions of Officers and Soldiers.

Clause 37 (Exemptions from jury).

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, it was a question of importance whether the Militia and Volunteers, when called out for training, should not be exempt from serving upon juries. He had known one or two cases where men belonging to these branches of the Service had been called upon to serve during the time they were in camp; and, therefore, he asked the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) whether it would not be possible to exempt these persons from serving on juries during their periods of training?

MR. CHILDERS said, that this question had been gone into by him on a former occasion, when it was found that there were difficulties in the way of making the exemptions suggested by the hon. and gallant Baronet, although the law exempted persons belonging to the Militia from serving on juries during the period of their training.

MR. WARTON said, he considered that words should be introduced to prevent Volunteer officers being called upon to serve on juries.

MR. CHILDERS said, there was considerable difficulty involved in this question with respect to the Volunteer Service. He was not prepared to introduce any words into this Act providing for the exemption of Volunteer officers from serving on juries.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 38 to 42, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 43 (Amendment of s. 171 as to application of the Act to Royal Marines).

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, at the time of the passage of the Army Discipline and Regulation Act of 1879, he had drawn attention to the question of Marines landed and serving on shore, and had referred to a case where a body of Marines had been, under these circumstances, for 14 days subject neither to the Mutiny Act nor any discipline Act whatever. He asked that the word "shall" should be substituted for the word "may," so as to make it clear that a Marine force serving on shore would be under the Army Discipline and Regulation Act.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought it better that the wording of the clause should remain for the present.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 44 to 47, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 48 (Amendment of s. 181 as to definition of active service in certain cases).

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, this clause gave great power to the Governors of Colonies, and to commanding officers of troops out of Her Majesty's Dominions. The Committee would see by the 6th clause of the Act of 1879 that a very great distinction was drawn between offences committed on active service and those committed at other times. For instance, a soldier who, on active service, was guilty of sleeping or being drunk at his post, was, on conviction by court martial, liable to the penalty of death; while, for the same offences committed when not on active service, he was liable to imprisonment only. He thought the Committee should hesitate before they conferred upon the Governors of Colonies or upon officers commanding troops out of Her Majesty's Dominions such extensive powers as were proposed by this clause.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would refer the hon. and gallant Gentleman to the following clause, which provided that the Governor of a Colony or the commanding officer of troops, if they had the means of direct communication with the Secretary of State for War should obtain his consent before carrying out the sentence.

COLONEL ALEXANDER pointed out that it would have been impossible to communicate directly with the Secretary of State in the case of the outbreak of the Zulu War, because there was no telegraph with the Cape at the time.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT regretted to say that he considered this clause to be absolutely necessary, because he believed that circumstances had arisen which had compelled the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to insert it in the Bill, although it might be true that the punishment of flogging had nothing to do with the question, yet the abolition of that punishment had made it absolutely necessary that the powers provided for in the clause should be granted.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the practical effect of the clause would be that offenders on active service would be liable in future to much severer penalties than at present. He thought the clause should be revised, because he objected to a commander having power, merely for the purpose of punishing a certain class of offences, to create a fictitious state of war ad hoc.

MR. CHILDERS said, that all cases would be most carefully revised.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 49 and 50, inclusive, agreed to.

Amendment of Regimental Debts Act.

Clause 51 (Amendment of 26 and 27 Vict. c. 57 as to collection, disposal of effects of deceased officers and soldiers).

On the Motion of Mr. CHILDERS, Amendment made, in page 25, line 15, after "may," by inserting "after such notice only, if any, as is determined in the regulations;" in page 25, line 18, after "soldier," by inserting "and may dispose of the same."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 52 to 54, inclusive, agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACT (1880)
AMENDMENT BILL—[Lords.]—[BILL 226.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Amendment of s. 3 of 43 and 44 Vict. c. 35).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 4, to leave out after the word "Provided" to the words "eighteen hundred and eighty" in line 6.—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. DILLWYN said, he must object to the Amendment. Sub-section 3 was inserted to prevent the destruction of birds which were not noxious, and did not increase too fast, but rather the contrary. Such birds ought to be protected, and for that purpose this section was necessary.

MR. THOMASSON urged the undesirability of encouraging the killing of these birds in foreign countries by allowing them to be sold in this country.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had rather misunderstood the object of the clause, and contended that the effect of the sub-section was to extend protection to the importer.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SAVINGS BANKS AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS, AND SECURITIES IN CHANCERY DIVISION.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ANDERSON said, the state of the House showed the hopelessness of opposing these Resolutions to-night; but he appealed to the Government, when they were so strong that they could do whatever they pleased, to be merciful as well as strong, and not to press the Committee to commit the House to a measure which was far from advisable. The meaning of these Resolutions now to be proposed was to impose £2,000,000 a-year of taxation on the country for 21 years, and that was far too important a proposal to be brought up in the expiring hours of an arduous Session, when the country had had no opportunity of considering whether the proposal was good or bad. He did not wish at present to discuss its goodness or badness, but to raise the question of the Government bringing it forward at such a time when so very many Members had gone home under the impression that no Business of importance or of surprise would be brought before the House.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH explained that these Resolutions were only preliminary to the introduction of a Bill, and that, so far from the proposal being a surprise, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had clearly explained the matter in his Budget speech.

(1.) Resolved, That it is expedient to grant powers for the conversion of certain Government Annuities standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of the Fund for the Banks for Savings, and also on account of the Post Office Savings Banks Fund, into certain other Stocks and Annuities, and to provide for due payment thereof out of the Consolidated Fund.

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the conversion of a portion of the Government Stocks or Annuities standing in the name of the Paymaster General on behalf of Chancery into certain other Stocks or Annuities, and to provide the guarantee of the Consolidated Fund for the security of such Government Stocks.

(3.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the conversion of certain Exchequer Bonds into Permanent Annuities.

(4.) Resolved, That it is expedient to amend "The Savings Bank Act, 1880."

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

CORONERS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 230.]

(Mr. Healy, Mr. Gray, Mr. Barry.)

Lords' Amendment considered.

MR. HEALY said, he understood that there had been an Amendment made by the Lords which was a breach of the Privileges of the House of Commons. Personally, he should have no objection to it; but as it was a breach of the Privileges of the Commons, he would move to disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed, "to draw up Reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to the Amendment made by The Lords to the Coroners Bill:"—MR. HEALY, MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, MR. O'DONNELL, Colonel BARTTELOT, and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH:—Three to be the quorum:—To withdraw immediately.

Reason for disagreement to The Lords Amendment reported, and agreed to:—To be communicated to The Lords.

EAST INDIAN LOANS, ANNUITIES, &c.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of the loan of two million pounds, advanced out of the Consolidated Fund to the Government of India, under the authority of "The Indian Advance Act, 1879."

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the conversion into Terminable Annuities of the Permanent Annuities created under the authority of "The East Indian Loan (Annuities) Act, 1879."

(3.) Resolved, That it is expedient to increase the annual charge on the Consolidated Fund for the National Debt, by including therein the amount of the Permanent Annuities created under the authority of "The East Indian Loan (Annuities) Act, 1879," or the amount of the Terminable Annuities into which the said Permanent Annuities may be converted.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

IRISH CHURCH ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Bill to make provision for the future administration of the property, and the performance of the duties vested in the Commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, and MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 235.]

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 2nd August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Royal University of Ireland * (194); Public Works Loans * (196).

Second Reading—Land Law (Ireland) (187).

Committee—Report—Presumption of Life (Scotland) * (142-197).

Third Reading—Metropolitan Open Spaces Act (1877) Amendment * (164); Public Loans (Ireland) Remission * (176), and passed.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 187.)

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

SECOND READING. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for the Second Reading, read.

Debate resumed accordingly.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, in rising to resume the debate on the second reading of the Irish Land Bill, I am very anxious not to detain the House upon any details, or upon any of those subsidiary parts of the measure, which the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) last evening designated "as ornamental." I am not quite sure that I agree with the statement that those parts of the Bill are purely ornamental. I hope, though they are more limited than I could have desired, that, however ornamental they may be, they will be of some substantial value. But, at all events, my Lords, they are not those parts of the Bill to which our attention ought to be directed on the second reading, and my desire now is to concentrate the attention of the House upon the general scope and bearing of this Bill as concerns the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland. My Lords, this measure, like every other measure affecting the interests of large numbers of people, must always be viewed in two different aspects. The first is its own intrinsic value; and the second is its relations to those circumstances which constitute political necessity in this country. My Lords, it is a happy state of things when those two aspects are combined; and almost as happy a circumstance when those two aspects, which appear different at the time, coincide, and are proved by history to be really the same. There have been occasions in this House, and in the other House of Parliament, when measures have been carried by pressure from without, and purely under circumstances of political necessity, which have afterwards recommended themselves to the consciences and convictions of men as measures of justice as well as of necessity. Such, my Lords, was the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. When the Duke of Wellington introduced that measure into this House, he made no secret that he pressed it on the adoption of the House as a matter of pure political necessity. Its object was to repeal one of the great curses of the country—the last of those penal laws which had been in force against the Roman Catholics; and although this House at that time passed that measure merely from political necessity, I imagine there are not three men in this House now who would not admit that it was a right and a just measure to admit a large majority of the people of Ireland to a share in the government of their country. But he would be a bold man who would assert that every measure which is pressed upon Parliament as a measure of political necessity is, therefore, a just and a wise measure. My own impression is there never has been a wider gap than that which exists in regard to this measure between its own intrinsic merit and the recommendations which arise from external circumstances. My Lords, I thought I could trace in the debate last night some feeling of bitterness and almost of humiliation that we felt ourselves obliged to accept a measure to which many of us have such strong and fundamental objections. Depend upon it, my Lords, this House does not stand alone in that respect. That feeling, I suspect, is as great in “another place.” It has been carried by authority alone, and let me remind the House, because it is important that not only this House but also the country should be aware, of the circumstances which constitute the political necessity for this measure. In the first place, it has been brought forward by a Government which has been lately installed in power after one of the greatest and most violent revolutions of public feeling which has ever taken place in the political history of this country. In the second place, it has been made a test question with that Government, and the whole weight has been cast into the scale of the personal authority of the Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend, whose high character, whose unquestionable genius, whose extraordinary powers, and whose splendid services have not unnaturally led thousands of his countrymen to place in his hands almost their reason and their conscience. In the third and next place, my Lords, there is that natural fear of the consequences of the defeat of this Government; the dread of the consequences of a Dissolution of Parliament at this time, in Ireland, and even in the United Kingdom, and that is a contingency which none of us can contemplate without serious anxiety. Last of all, my Lords, there has been the spectacle of the dreadful anarchy in Ireland, an anarchy during which great parts of the population have appeared—I hope it has been only in appearance—to have had sympathy [with crimes which are not only dreadful, but many of them loathsome in their character, and which would have been a disgrace to the barbarians of Fiji. Then, my Lords, comes that weariness of Parliamentary Obstruction, that sense of the whole Business of England and of Scotland and of the United Kingdom being prevented from being conducted with any success or even decency by the urgency of this Irish anarchy breeding a spirit in this country of almost complete indifference to what is done, and a desire of granting anything rather than that there should be a continuance of these scandals. These form a combination of circumstances, my Lords, which tell not only in this House, but, I am sure, tell much more powerfully in the other House of Parliament; and, therefore, I beg this House not to suppose that if we are, to a certain extent, placed in circumstances of humiliation, that those circumstances are peculiar to the House of Lords. They are by no means so. My Lords, when I hear the language which is uttered out-of-doors by Friends of my own, and belonging to my own political Party with regard to this measure, and with regard to the necessity of passing it, I am a little reminded of that description given in that well-known work by Miss Edgeworth, to which I referred the other day, in which a retainer of Castle Rackrent narrates to a companion how his master, having stood for the county and obtained his seat, went off to Dublin and joined that company of persons who knew how to support the Government most honourably against his Party. Now, I feel the necessity of the circumstances in which we are placed; but, submitting to these necessities, I think it is most important we should form a clear estimate of that which we are sacrificing. What, then, is the general object of this measure? My Lords, this measure has these two main objects. First of all, it is to empower three very respectable gentlemen to dictate the price of the hiring of land all over a great country inhabited by 5,000,000 of men. In the second place, it is to enable every tenant in Ireland to sell that which may not be his own by law, by custom, or by equity. Now, these two sentences contain a literally true and exact description of the great aims and objects of this measure. Now, I will take these in their order, but in an order the reverse of that in which they are mentioned in the Bill; for, strange to say, this Bill deals first with the question of sale, and, second, with the question of the valuation of rents. But in the statement of the Government, and especially in the statement of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, the question of the valuation of rents was put first, and that of sale second. Mr. Gladstone's speech in the House of Commons has now been published in the form of a pamphlet, and as it may be considered to be the Government on the subject, it is remarkable to notice the description my right hon. Friend gives of the object of the measure with regard to the valuation of land. He says—

“I come to the great question which, I think, must constitute the salient point and cardinal principle of the Bill, the institution of a Court which is to take cognizance of rent, and which, in taking cognizance of rent, will also, according to the provisions of the Bill, not be debarred from taking cognizance of tenure and assignment.”

And he also speaks of the Court as “an optional Court for regulating rent.” Now, in the first place, I must demur to the accuracy of the description. It is not, strictly speaking, an optional Court at all—that is to say, it is not a mere Court of Arbitration to which both parties may go and have access, but it is a Court to which everybody may be driven by somebody else. Now, that is a very different thing from an optional Court; and I must say, in passing, I am not at all sure that an optional Court, in the shape of a Court of Arbitration, would not have been almost necessary in the present circumstances of Ireland. Indeed, I believe, in the circumstances of anarchy in which the country is, the landlords would almost unanimously have been delighted to appeal to such a Court in regard to the fairness of their rents; and this I can say, that a very great number of my own Friends, who are strongly against the Bill as a whole, have not been against this part of it, considered as establishing an optional Court. Now, this is the principle of the Bill—that three private gentlemen, I believe of the highest character and attainments, are enabled, compulsorily, at the instance of any one of the two parties, to compel everybody in Ireland to submit to them the hiring and price of land, in order that it may be settled at their discretion. I must say, apart from the political circumstances called the peculiar relations of Ireland, of these two provisions, one of them is eminently ridiculous, and the other is eminently unjust. A universal power of valuing rent by three men all over Ireland is eminently ridiculous, and the giving of an absolute right of sale to everybody, whether they have acquired it or not, is, to my mind, eminently unjust. It does not require to be an inhabitant of Jupiter or Saturn to perceive the absurdity in the one case, and the injustice in the other. And here I may remark that I was much struck by the quotation of the noble Marquess from a French journal, which shows very fairly the opinion of foreigners as to this proposal. The next thing I wish to point out is this—that this principle of valuing rents for the future was denounced by my right hon. Friend in 1870 in the strongest language. Now, I do not quote these things for the purpose of fixing a charge of inconsistency on my right hon. Friend. I quote them as expressing my own opinions at the present moment. I happened to be a Member of the Government at that time, and consented to the Bill of 1870, on the understanding that these were the views of the Government, and that these were the principles of the Bill. Now, just listen to the language in which my right hon. Friend refers to the question of the power of valuing the rents of land in Ireland—

“Shall I really be told that it is for the interest of the Irish tenant bidding for a farm that the law should say to him—‘Cast aside all providence and forethought; go into the market and bid what you like; drive out of the field the prudent man who means to fulfil his engagement; bid right above him, and induce the landlord to give you the farm, and the moment you have got it come forward, go to the public authority, show that the rent is excessive, and that you cannot pay it, and get it reduced.’ If I could conceive a plan more calculated than anything else, first of all, for throwing into confusion the whole economical arrangements of the country; secondly, for driving out of the field all solvent and honest men who might be bidders for farms, and might desire to carry on the honourable business of agriculture; thirdly, for carrying widespread demoralization throughout the whole mass of the Irish people, I must say, as at present advised—to confine myself to the present, and until otherwise convinced—it is this plan and this demand, that we should embody in our Bill, as a part of permanent legislation, a provision by which men shall be told that there shall be an authority always existing, ready to release them from the contracts they have deliberately entered into.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1845.]

I beg the House to observe that this is not an argument of mere expediency. It is not a temporary argument referring to any particular state of things. It is an argument founded on morality, and it points out that to give this terrible power of re-valuing rents to the Irish tenants will be a demoralizing influence in this country. Now, I say, what has happened since 1870 to alter the bearing of that argument? Nothing whatever, as regards the merits of the question. There is but one answer, and one only; and I wish the Government had the courage to state it frankly, and not go beating about the bush, fishing for means of reconciling things that cannot be reconciled, and proving language to be consistent with their present conduct which is utterly inconsistent with it—there is but one answer, and that is that the people of Ireland are now so thoroughly demoralized that even this cannot demoralize them more. Now, if this measure were confined to the poorest class of tenants, I must say that, even as regards its own intrinsic claims, there might be a good deal to say for it. There is no doubt whatever that the poorest class of tenants in Ireland are comparatively weak and helpless; and I believe, notwithstanding the abstract doctrines of political economy, that most Members of this House would be willing to entertain exceptional measures as regards those exceptionally poor and weak tenants. Certainly, indeed, this House, in the Act of 1870, did pass a measure which was especially directed to giving compensation on an increasing scale in proportion to poverty and the size of the holding. But this is to apply to all tenants in Ireland, and to include men quite as competent to make a bargain as any one Member of this House. My Lords, I heard with surprise my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) last night arguing that there should be no exemption in regard to the large tenant, because he says they have a larger stake in the country. What has that to do with it? If they have a larger stake in the country they are perfectly competent to take care of their own stake, and do not need the protection of this Bill; and I must say that in this argument there could be no difference between tenants of different sized holdings. My noble Friend is not consistent with his own Bill, because, after all, even in this Bill it is provided that, above a certain stage, free contract is to be allowed. Now, with regard to this Court for the valuation of rent, I have come to the conclusion, I must frankly say, that such a measure is necessary in Ireland; and it shows an extraordinary ignorance and thoughtlessness of men upon this subject that it has been held that the observations which I ventured to address to your Lordships some weeks ago indicated that I was adverse to such a proposition. Most people have thought so ; but the argument tells the other way. My object was to prove that the accusations brought against the landlords of Ireland before the Bessborough Commission were, almost in every case, false. That was my argument, and that the Bessborough Commission took no pains to test these falsehoods. Very well ; I want the Court to do that. I want the Court to do what the Bessborough Commission did not do. This is perfectly consistent with my argument, for I never saw or read a document which was so painfully full of error as the Report of the Evidence of that Commission. It is redolent of the atmosphere of falsehood and imposture, and that is my reason, and no other, for wishing a valuation of rent by a competent tribunal in Ireland. And now I must say that the speech of my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal last night gave me an additional reason for wishing that the Court should investigate facts. I proved to your Lordships the other day that subordinate Members of the Administration had been repeating stories against the landlords which, on investigation, proved to be groundless, and one of which an investigation of no more than 10 minutes would have shown to be false. Well, my noble Friend last evening made no accusation of that kind ; but he did make another statement, without one syllable of explanation as to the evidence on which he founds one of the most wild and violent propositions in the measure. I am not, however, now saying it may not be necessary, in the present state of Ireland, as a measure for giving to this Court an absolute power of dissolving leases. When I left the Government there was no question of touching leases, and the Bill as it was introduced into the House of Commons did not touch them, and the provision I speak of was added at a later stage. My noble Friend last night admitted that it was a violent course ; but what did he say ? He spoke to this effect—" You will think it a very strange proposition ; but the more I investigate the subject the more convinced I am of the necessity of revising the conditions under which iniquitous leases have been given, in order to bring them to an end." Now, I never heard a Minister make such a demand upon Parliament without supporting it by evidence. A measure which leads to the breaking of all contracts my noble Friend asks you to assent to, because, as he says, without evidence, the most iniquitous leases have been given. He does not even give a hint to the House what the nature of those leases was. I do not want him to give names, because that is dangerous in Ireland. I want him simply to describe what is the nature of the leases he describes as iniquitous, and we shall be entitled to hear as to the particular terms of those leases. In regard to the point, I would remind your Lordships that the Act of 1870 deliberately adopted the principle that an agricultural lease of 30 years would exhaust the tenant's interest in all agricultural improvements except buildings. I will now direct your Lordships' attention to another important point. It is one of the fundamental points connected with this Bill. When I was a Member of the Government there was a guiding principle laid down for this Court ; the absolute power was not given without an indication on the part of Parliament to a general principle on which the Court was to proceed. Not only was this so, but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in his speech on the Second Reading, used these words—

[Second Night.]

" We have thought it our duty to endeavour to grapple with the very difficult task—where none of the Commission show any particular readiness to deal with it—of giving to the Court some guidance in its efforts to arrive at a fair rent."—[3 Hansard, cclx. 909.]

Observe, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister speaks of it as a " duty " on the part of the Government to give some guidance to the Court. Well, my Lords, that duty has been abandoned. The Bill gives up to the Court that attempt to fulfil that task which the Prime Minister spoke of as a duty, and which the Government, when I left it, had taken some pains to discharge. Now, where is the reason why this duty has been abandoned ? I know very well it is an extremely inconvenient duty to define what a fair rent is ; but if you are to have any accurate notion of what is to take place—which Irishmen do not want—you are bound to give some general indication of the principle on which the Court is to proceed. Look what the Bill says. As originally introduced it said—

“A fair rent means such a rent as, in the opinion of the Court, after hearing the parties and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, a solvent tenant would undertake to pay one year with another.”

Now, that is the fundamental basis of rent. It points to the market value. This basis of market value is, I may say, the basis of State valuation of land in India. In that country it is the rule to find out what the market value is, and from it to make whatever deductions that may be fair. Then the second direction is—

“Provided that the Court in fixing such rent shall have regard to the tenant's interest in the holding;”

and then the Bill proceeded to attempt to define what the interest of a tenant was, and in that attempt it broke down. Observe how it broke down. The tenants did not want their interests defined. They wanted the Bill to be perfectly vague and indefinite. This was their object, and this duty of the Government was given up because the tenants did not like it. In the first place, the very sound of market value—and, in the second place, the sound of defining their interests—frightened the tenants. Mr. Gladstone says that the Commissioners have shown no particular willingness to enter upon this task which the Government undertook. Well, I am not a great supporter of the Commissioners, or of any of their Reports. I rather agree with Mr. Gladstone when he said these Reports constituted a litter. But the Bessborough Commission makes some reference to what a fair rent is. The Bessborough Report defines a fair rent to be the commercial value determined by professional valuers, subject to the deduction of the tenant's interest, less any sum paid by the incoming tenant as the ordinary price of the goodwill. That is a perfectly fair definition. You start from market value, and you deduct from the market value that which is due to a particular tenant in the particular circumstances of the holding. That is a very fair indication of the general principle. Now, I say it was the duty of the Government to maintain and to discharge this obligation of giving an indication to the Court, and I cannot help thinking that the total departure from any attempt to give an indication simply shows an evasion of the difficulty, and I wish to smooth over difficulties by placing everything in the absolute power of this triumvirate of men. Now, I pass to another, or rather the same consideration from another point of view. Parliament gives no indication to this Court how these rents are to be valued. I should like to ask if my noble Friends on the Treasury Bench have themselves considered what this Court will have to deal with in finding out the principle or basis for the valuation of rent? They give no guidance to the Court, and not only that, but they deliberately withdraw from the attempt to give that guidance. Now, I will direct the attention of the House to cases which we know are common in Ireland. I will first take the case of what are called labour rents. That is to say, rents which are really not paid out of the produce of the holding, but paid out of the labour of the tenant. Now, some of your Lordships who have not attended very closely to the matter may suppose that this is a very small item in the rent-roll of Ireland. It may be a very small item in the rent-roll, but it is a very large item in population. There are several hundreds of thousands of farmers in Ireland who pay their rents, not out of the farms, but out of their labour. Well, I ask the Government have they formed any conception of the principle on which this Court is to proceed in valuing the rent of a labour tenant? It is not the market value that a solvent tenant would pay out of the land. It is a rent paid out of the labour of the tenants; and as, in many instances, the whole produce of these wretched holdings will not support the tenants and their families, is the Court to say that they are to pay no rent at all? The Court is perfectly free to do so; but if that rule is to be adopted, there are some large proprietors in Ireland who would lose almost the whole of their property—at all events, a very large proportion of their rental. I say sincerely that I have no conception of the principle upon which the Court will value these rents. It is perfectly easy to value ordinary farms, where you have local valuers who know all the circumstances of the case; but how the Court are to value the interest of these cottier tenantry in Ireland, who are labourers, in fact, with large allotments, I cannot understand. In this case, it is quite different with the three gentlemen who constitute this Court, and I doubt whether the Government has any conception of the principle on which they will proceed. Well, then, I take another case, as I want to show that in Ireland the first principles upon which rent is regulated are disputed. It is not a question of ordinary valuation, but a question as to what are the fundamental principles in respect to property. I take the case of long leases, and it happens that I am supplied with a very remarkable example. Perhaps the Members of this House may recollect that, in the observations I addressed to your Lordships on the 1st of July, I had occasion to refer to the evidence of a certain Mr. M'Elroy, who is a well-known leading man in one of the largest tenant right associations in the North of Ireland. I found fault with his evidence, and I pointed out that he himself had been obliged to confess that, instead of the landlord eating up the tenant right, the tenant right had not declined at all in value during the last 10 years. A few days afterwards I had a letter from Mr. M'Elroy finding fault with my speech, and pointing out that I had omitted to notice certain cases in his evidence, particularly mentioning the case of a farm at Ballywilliam, near Portrush. I immediately investigated the case, and I found some very curious facts indicative of what are Irish ideas in Ulster at present with regard to the rights of entering into long leases. In this case the lease was entered into in 1791, and did not expire until 1874. In all, the tenants under the lease had held the farm 83 years. What happened? The tenant wished to prove, when the lease was beginning to come to an end, that he had tenant right, and he appealed to the County Court on this point. The County Court Judge, after hearing all the circumstances of the case, decided that tenant right had never existed in regard to this farm. The tenant had paid nothing for it in 1791, and there was no right, therefore, to it in 1874, when the lease expired. Upon that finding, the tenant applied to the landlord for a renewal of the lease, and the landlord naturally said—"Yes; I will give you a renewal, if you will give a better rent," and the two parties agreed as to what a fair rent was. Now, that is the case that Mr. M'Elroy quotes to me as proving to me that the tenant right is being eaten up—a case in which there was no tenant right, and in which the two parties agreed upon a fair rent. Well, but the circumstances of this case are still more curious. The farm is situated on some of the finest land in the county. It is close to a very important seaport, which is becoming a very important watering place. Dairy produce is very valuable in that quarter, and the landlord says in his rebutting evidence before the Commission that he was offered between £4 and £5 per acre for it, and that he gave it to this tenant for something like £30. Now, I want to know on what principle the Court will deal with cases of that kind? It is good evidence that the whole of the Ulster tenantry would think the landlord was very wrong in wishing to increase any rent. Mr. M'Elroy complains bitterly of the decision of the Judge. He complains of the Court, and says that the Judge does not hold the same opinion about land as that which some of the tenants hold. Well, that is very likely. He complains, also, that the rent was so high that the tenants could not pay, if it had not been for the exceptional value of milk and butter at Portrush. That is to say, the rent would have been too high, if the produce of the farm had been left out of consideration. Now, there is a truly Irish idea. I want to know how my noble Friend and his Court are to deal with these Irish ideas? In the first place, is he quite sure that Mr. M'Elroy will be more content with these three private gentlemen set over the whole of Ireland than with the Court now established? In the next place, when these three gentlemen are put on the Bench, on what principle are they to decide? In Ireland there are two principles diametrically opposed one to the other. The first is the principle of the tenant, who says—"The longer I have held your land, the longer I am entitled to continue to hold it;" and the second is that of the landlord, who says—"The longer you have held my land at an enormous profit to yourself, the more am I entitled to resume it when the period of your tenancy comes to an end." Now, those are fundamentally opposite propositions, and there is no going between them; or, if there is, it is purely arbitrary in the mind of the Court; and I want, therefore, to know what is the principle the Government will lay down, in such cases? I have put two cases; I will put another. My noble Friend says there is no freedom of contract in Ireland for the larger tenants; but I will give him a case. It is not the case of the individual only; it is the case of a great Body, such as the College of Maynooth, which received a large annual revenue from Parliament, and which Government determined to buy up, because it was provided with a very large fund. It was a rich Body, and I suppose my noble Friend will admit that they are as free to contract as other people. A valuator came to the conclusion that the land round the College belonging to the Duke of Leinster was let at a sum considerably below its real value, and accordingly the proprietor asked the College to pay a higher rent. This, after giving a great deal of trouble, the Institution refused to do; and in the evidence given before the Commission the representative of the College says that there is no freedom of contract in such cases as that; that they had no resource but to pay the rent or give up the farm; and that they considered a terrible grievance. What is this Court to do with Maynooth College, representing the whole interest of the Irish priesthood? On what principles is the Court to regulate rents in that case? What is the end with which they are to exercise their powers? I go back to the labour-rent holdings, with regard to which I want to ask another question. Is it the object of the Government that these people should be kept on the land whether they can pay rent or not? If that is the object of the Government, and if this is to be the effect of their measure, instead of being a remedial measure for Ireland, it will be a perpetuation of the very worst difficulties which beset that country. Take the evidence of Professor Baldwin. He tells you that there will be no remedy to the evils of Ireland until these people are removed. You talk of political economy as if it were fit only for Jupiter or Saturn. How are you to get rid of this population? Is it not better to say to these people, as frankly as that gentleman does—"You live a miserable life, in miserable cabins, exposed to perpetually recurring famines, unable to pay your rent; is not it better that you should go elsewhere, where you can have ample labour and better wages?" In those words are indicated the remedy which the landlord has in his power to give at present, and there are very few landlords who are not willing and do not assist such emigration. But what is this Court to do? Is it to take upon itself to say—"This holding is so small, and you are so poor, as not to be able to pay rent, and, therefore, you must give it up"? As far as I can see, this Bill leaves everything in confusion, unless you leave it to the absolute jurisdiction of these three private gentlemen. It seems to me that there is one explanation of all this obscurity, and this reluctance to deal with principles, and that is the explanation given by Baron Dowse. He says—

[Second Night.]

The Duke of Argyll

"Our object is to deal with the existing tenants of Ireland, and to satisfy them, and never to mind the future."

It is an answer that should be printed in letters of gold as embodying the directing principle of a great deal of this legislation. It is a mere postponing and bottling up of the difficulty, and is not facing it in a manly manner. I come now to the question of free sale. I know that my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal is a most straightforward and a most candid man; but I was surprised to hear him last night quote one of his speeches in 1870 in regard to the extension of the tenant right custom in Ireland, as if this Bill was in fulfilment of the principle of the Act of 1870. In my view—and I was responsible for that Act along with my noble Friend—the principle of this Bill and the principle of the Act of 1870 in respect of tenant right is absolutely divergent and contradictory. The great principle of the Bill of 1870 was to ascertain the facts in each particular holding, and to regulate the tenant's rights by his equitable acquirements. My noble Friend said, perfectly truly, last night that when you legalize a custom, you would most necessarily alter its character. That is perfectly true; but, as far as we could, we endeavoured in that Act to legalize what existed. It was not the legalization of one custom over the whole of Ireland, it was the legalization of the custom of each holding—each tenant was required to prove what his equitable rights were with regard to his holding. If that could be properly done it was an equitable principle. It is perfectly just to legalize and enforce custom properly ascertained—that is to say, custom so universal that you may presume it presented itself to the minds of the contracting parties. Such was the principle of the Act of 1870; but the principle of this Bill is wholly different, for it does not require each tenant to prove what are his individual rights, and gives to every tenant in Ireland something which he may never have acquired and never paid for. The distinction is, therefore, broad and fundamental. There is no getting over it by explanations of particular words and speeches. Not only was the doctrine of legalizing in each particular holding that which each man equitably acquired embodied in that Act, but it was prominent in the speech of the Prime Minister, and over and over again Mr. Gladstone said, during the debates in 1870—“We are giving these tenants that which they have paid for;” and he entered into an estimate of what they had paid for the Ulster tenant right, amounting to something like £20,000,000; but the principle now is to give him something he may not have equitably acquired, and whether he has paid for it or not. I am not going to dispute for a moment that tenant right has done a great deal of good in Ulster. I may have my own opinion as to its advantages, and whether they are an accidental or necessary incident of that kind of tenure, or whether it is connected with the manufacturing history of Ulster. I accept the evidence of my noble Friend that the custom has worked admirably. All that I say is, that in Ulster it was equitably acquired by the payment of money, and by a long course of proceeding to which the landlords had been parties. Now, with regard to the effect of this tenant right, I am bound to say that I should be adverse to the introduction of it where it has not grown up, not only on grounds of equity, but on grounds of policy also. I must say that I find great discrepancy between the language of different Members of the Government on this point. Last night my noble Friend (Lord Carlingford) used these words—

[Second Night.]

“We are often told confidently that if a tenant holding at a reasonable rent makes this tenant right payment when entering on his holding, he converts himself into a rack-rented farmer. My Lords, that may be the theory of the matter, but it is not the fact.”

But the opinion of Mr. Gladstone is quite the reverse. He says—

“It may be very fairly said that in vain do you cut down the landlord’s judicial rent . . . and take care that the landlord’s receipts shall be limited if, with the land-hunger and scarcity which prevail in Ireland, you still leave it open to anyone to pay an extravagant sum for tenant right, and thereby to take holdings on the same virtually rack-rented condition.”—[3 Hansard, cclx. 904.]

Now, I want to know which of these opinions is the true one.

LORD CARLINGFORD: Mine.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My noble Friend cannot get off so easily. What does Mr. Gladstone say? “I am not going to propose unrestricted tenant right. I am afraid of these rack-renting prices. What, then, is the remedy? That the power of the Courts to increase rent is the proper limitation of extravagant tenant right.” That runs counter to another doctrine of my noble Friend that tenant right and rent grow up side by side, but have nothing to do with each other. But how can one fail to be a subtraction from the other? That is the difficulty. There is no doubt whatever that rent and tenant right are two antagonistic powers. You may balance them as you like, artificially or naturally; but one must give way to the other. [“No, no!”] My noble Friend says “No;” but what I say is this—that the doctrine of the Bill that the power to raise rents will limit the tenant right is not a true statement of the case. The converse must be equally true, and no ingenuity can disprove it—that the tenant right must prevent the payment of a reasonable rent. If one is true, the other is no less true. My noble Friends are ingenious arguers. Will they explain how the one will always limit the other? I proceed to ask another question. My right hon. Friend at the head of the Government says that he admits the danger of extravagant tenant right. He admits that it is an evil; unlike my noble Friend, he admits that it may reduce the tenant to a rack-renting condition; but then he says that the power of increasing the rent will prevent those extravagant prices for tenant right. That is not my belief. I believe that after this Bill becomes law, the power of increasing rent will not long remain a practical power at all. Look at the terms of the Bill. Ostentatiously, and, as it would appear, for the very purpose of ostentation, you put it on the very front of your Bill that the tenant may sell for the best price that can be got. It has been said, and I think truly said, that that points to a sale by auction, and a good number of tenants in Ulster have been alarmed at that prospect. They do not like sales by auction. There is a process which is called "sweetening," where people are employed to run up prices to an extravagant figure. All these practices are well known to the tenants, and they are beginning to be afraid that the best prices which can be got will be very extravagant prices. The Bill, however, puts it ostentatiously in the front that tenants may get the best price obtainable; and if prosperity returns, we shall find tenants buying the tenant right at 30, 40, or even 50 or 60 years' purchase. What is the Court to do when the landlord comes to ask for an increase of rent? The tenant will be able to prove that, under the express indication of an Act of Parliament, he has bought his holding for 40 or 50 years' purchase. But how will it be possible for the Court to say that these extravagant prices are not to be given? Then you have the power of combination among the tenants. On many estates with 3,000 or 4,000 tenants, applications may have been made to the Court to have rents raised. At the end of 15 years the landlord says—"Since I let this farm a railway has been made through this country; there has been a great improvement in prices, and I ought to have a rise of rent." The tenants, on the other hand, will be able to show that three or four times over they have paid these extravagant prices, and to combine against such an increase of rent. I hold, therefore, that the doctrine of the Prime Minister, that, in the circumstances of this Bill, the possible and periodical increment of rent will be a practical abatement of tenant right, is a pure delusion. Now, my Lords, with regard to the principle on which this new universal right of sale is to be given to all the tenants of Ireland, I wish to enter my protest against some of the principal arguments which are advanced by the Government. The Prime Minister has said that the law of assignment is a law which is rooted in the law of Europe, and that, therefore, we ought to give universal right of sale. It may be perfectly true that the right of assignment is so rooted in the law; but there is another right equally rooted in all systems of European law, and that is the right of the landlord not to accept the assignee. Is it not obvious that one right is as well established as the other? My Lords, neither my conscience nor my reason will allow me to accept that statement of the Prime Minister as conclusive of the matter. With regard to the general effect of this power in Ireland, I am bound to say that I entertain very serious apprehension. I think, now that it has been proposed by a powerful Government to put this morsel into the mouths of the tenantry, it will be almost impossible to get it out again. I am firmly of the conviction that it will lead to the entire ceasing of landlords' improvements in Ireland. My Lords, I am bound to say it is frankly admitted by the Bessborough Commission. They say that the universal right of sale interferes with the sentiment of ownership; and upon the sentiment of ownership depends the inclination of the landlords to improve their land. I have no doubt, therefore, that after the passing of this Bill, unless great modifications be made in it, there will be a complete and absolute cessation of all landlords' improvements, and a more mischievous effect it would be difficult to conceive. You are depriving all the landlords of Ireland of their privileges, and you are releasing them from their duties. Now, my Lords, such is my opinion of the general character of this Bill on its own merits, apart from its political significance; let me say a few words as to the omissions of this Bill. This Bill does not deal, or attempt to deal, with one of the greatest evils of Ireland. I have shown that it will very materially interfere with the only remedies going on with regard to the cottier population of the West of Ireland; but it does not attempt to deal with the small tenantry and the greatest evil under which they suffer, and that is the enormous interest which they pay for money. That is the evidence of Professor Baldwin, who says that a large part of the small tenantry—I think he says 100,000 out of the total of 500,000—are so deeply in debt that they owe to the usurious money-lenders sums amounting in the several cases from three to 10 years' rent. The interest paid on these loans is a burden infinitely heavier than the rent paid to the landlords. It would be a task worthy of the genius of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government if he had attempted to deal with this great evil. In the Land Reforms effected in Prussia and Germany and other Continental States questions of this kind were dealt with. But nothing of the kind is attempted in this Bill. We have nothing but the rude and coarse expedient of reducing rents, however moderate those rents may be—moderate, I mean, except in the opinion of the tenant class. Now, my Lords, with reference to emigration, I am not going to say much. I hope, and I think the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) was mistaken in saying that the Emigration Clause had been intentionally reduced to narrow proportions. No doubt the sum of money is small, but we may hope that it is only a beginning. But what I fear is that you are putting into the minds of these poor tenants that by some means or other you will enable them to continue on the land, and to live happily and prosperously when they cannot possibly do so, and that not until they have discovered that they have been unintentionally deceived will they avail themselves of the opportunity of emigration. The fear is that by emigration you may lose the best part of the population, and may not get rid of the class which most needs emigration. I have detained the House for a long time on this question. I only wish to add this—that when I look back to the general character of the Bill, although it is most ingeniously and elaborately framed, and I think with a sincere and honest desire to check the different evils which prevail in Ireland, by means of compensatory provisions, I cannot help smiling at the adulation which has been lavished upon it by a large portion of the supporters of the Government as a great act of constructive policy by a Liberal Government; and this of a Bill which places absolutely in the hands of a triumvirate the destinies of the whole of Ireland. My Lords, is this the acme of the wisdom of the Liberal Government? I cannot doubt, for a moment, that the Government has been driven to this Bill, as we are driven to it, by circumstances of external pressure. It is the Government that has been driven to have recourse to this somewhat rude and coarse expedient—worthy of a despotic Government, wondered at by every civilized nation in Europe. My Lords, when I look at my noble Friends below me on the Treasury Bench, I cannot help regarding them as something very like what I have seen on the shore of the Western Islands of Scotland—a row of jelly-fishes. [Great laughter.] My noble Friends need not be affronted by the comparison. Jelly-fishes are the most beautiful creatures in the world. They have been studied by eminent biologists now for many years. It has been discovered that they are endowed with a most elaborate and delicate nervous system; but I am sorry to say they have been hitherto found destitute of a skeleton and a backbone. But there is one peculiarity about these jelly-fishes, they make the most beautiful convulsive movements in the water, and you see that the poor creatures think they are swimming; but when you take the bearings of the land you find that they are simply floating with the currents and the tides. That is the position of my noble Friends with regard to this Irish Land Bill. I really hope that success may be possible with the Bill; but it can only be on one condition, that I hope you will observe—namely, that you develop your jelly-fish qualities into something like a skeleton. Let the Irish people understand, at least, that you mean to support the decisions of this Court. I understand that the men who have been selected by right hon. Friend are men of the highest eminence, and that they have the respect, at least, of many noble Lords on the opposite side of the House. Some of them have, indeed, expressed to me their perfect willingness to accept their arbitration in such matters. I have shown your Lordships some of the difficulties they will have to deal with, that it is a question not merely of the valuation of rent under ordinary conditions, such as it would be in England and Scotland, but that the Court will have to deal with fundamental differences of opinion on abstract questions of property. I say that it will require all the powers of the law to support their decisions; but let it be understood by the Government that there is an end to these apparently endless conessions, and that they intend to support the decisions of the tribunal that will be appointed, and that it will be useless for the advocates of tenant right to come and say that they do not submit to their decision, because they find that the opinion of the Court does not coincide with the opinion of the Irish tenant. If it were otherwise, and unless some strong ground of this nature is taken, neither this message of peace nor any future message of peace you send to Ireland will be a message of peace. Now, I wish, in conclusion, before I sit down, to say a word as to the Irish population. I hope that nothing I have said will induce any feeling on the part of any portion of the population of that country that I feel, or anyone in this House feels, harshly towards them. I have myself Irish blood in my veins, not merely that we came from Ireland some 1,000 years ago; but recently I have made a personal and near connection with Ireland; and I admire their many great qualities, and it is impossible not to admire and respect their domestic virtue. Many of the evils of their lot and faults of their character have been the developments of an unfortunate political history; but I say this—it is high time to tell the people of Ireland that no people can prosper who, like many of the tenants in that country—I am afraid thousands of them—have been lately pleading poverty as an excuse for crime and fraud.

The Duke of Argyll

[Second Night.]

The Duke of Argyll

VISCOUNT MONCK said, he would not refer at any length to what had been called by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) the “ornamental” part of the Bill; but he regretted that the emigration portion of the Government scheme had been dwarfed to its present limits, for he believed that portion of the scheme was the only one which would meet the case of a large portion of the population in the West and South-West of Ireland. But he would suggest that another portion of the Bill might serve as a great means of promoting emigration indirectly—namely, the right of sale, which had been found in all parts of Ireland as the one means for the consolidation of farms. It had been found to combine the least amount of inconvenience to the tenant with the greatest advantage to the estate. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Waterford) treated the Bill as if it were a Bill of Pains and Penalties against the whole body of the Irish landlords; and he evoked a loud cheer from the Benches opposite when he asked was that the way to treat men who had been tried and acquitted. But the question their Lordships had to consider was not whether a large majority of the Irish landlords had misconducted themselves—which he (Viscount Monck) did not believe—but whether the law was in such a state as to enable a minority of the landlords of Ireland so to exercise their legal rights as to create alarm amongst the tenants, and so to imperil the public peace. He was of opinion that the law was in such a state, and the object of the present Bill was to remedy that evil. What was the evil in the present case? He thought it was that, although the conditions of tenure in England and Ireland were entirely different and distinct the one from the other, the rule of law which regulated the relative rights and obligations of both landlords and tenants was the same in both countries—namely, the English system. That, he thought, was a fair statement of the state of things which subsisted up to 1870. What were the differences? It was notorious that in England when the landowner lets a farm he lets it in the form of a highly-equipped machine. The machinery was provided by the landlord, and kept up by him. The tenant merely provided the capital necessary for the annual outlay. What was the state of things in Ireland? He (Viscount Monck) spoke generally, not universally. Everything that was necessary to be done on the land, the building, the draining, was done by the tenant. To anyone who knew Ireland, the extent to which improvements had been made by the tenants did not require proof; but a singular piece of evidence was furnished in a statement which was published the other day by what was called the Landlords' Committee in Dublin, a statement which they had obtained by issuing questions to landlords all over Ireland, as to the amount of money spent by landlords. The number of acres included was 4,216,619 spread pretty evenly over the four Provinces of Ireland; and the returns showed that within 40 years on those 4,200,000 acres there had been spent £3,544,547, or an annual expenditure of some 5*d.* per acre per annum.

[Second Night.]

He assumed, therefore, that, generally speaking, it was the tenant who had to expend the capital and the labour necessary to bring the soil up to a productive state. In England, if a landowner desired to resume possession of his land, he had no pecuniary liability or obligation to the tenant, except such as were of a temporary character, for tillage and unexhausted manure; and these being allowed for, if he could not come to terms with the tenant, the landlord resumed possession of the land, and neither had any just ground of complaint. But how stood the case in Ireland? In that country, the tenant having expended his capital or labour, the landlord had the power to move him out of his holding, that tenant, perhaps, having expended on that holding, in increasing its value, the whole of his life-long savings. Was that right or fair, or was it a system upon which the prosperity of a country ought or could depend? Where land was in a productive state, rent consisted of two elements—one remuneration for the use of the natural qualities of the soil, and the other the interest payable on the capital expended in making those qualities productive. In England, on every principle of justice and equity, both belonged to the landlord; but in Ireland the landlord was only entitled to payment for the natural qualities of the soil, the assumption being that the capital and labour required to bring it into a productive state had been expended and applied by the tenant. Down to 1870 the landlord had the power of raising the rent, with the alternative of evicting the tenant and appropriating the full amount of these two elements, to only one of which, in equity, he had any right whatever. By the Act of 1870 the grievance was considerably modified as regarded the tenure, and the landlord was deprived of the unlimited power of evicting the tenant; but the blot on the measure was that it did not affect the question of rent at all. These were matters which affected the view the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had taken of the intrinsic merits of the Bill; and he (Viscount Monck) hoped their Lordships would give them consideration, for they might modify what the noble Duke had said. It might not be a popular doctrine in that House, but it was not one of yesterday with him (Viscount Monck), that the course of events in Ireland had amounted to the gradual creation by the tenantry of a property in the land, which had become so thoroughly incorporated with the property of the landlord that the only way of meeting the equity of the case was to give a joint interest to the landlord and the tenant. He might also say that he was not ashamed of the "three F's." Whether in capitals or small letters, they were large enough to confer a considerable benefit on the tenants of Ireland, and it was one to which they were entitled by every principle of justice and equity. It was argued that the Bill could not confer great advantages on the tenants without taking something from the landlords; but the possibility of the argument was principally due to a non-definition of terms. Unquestionably, great advantages were given by the Bill to the tenants, and the landlords did lose something. His noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord O'Hagan) said they lost their amenities; but the only definition he seemed to give of amenities was the right of evicting tenants. Undoubtedly, the landlords would lose that, and the tenants would gain security of tenure; but the landlord would not lose in a pecuniary sense, except where the tenants were too highly rented. But when they talked of losing and gaining, the advantage which the tenants would gain by the Bill was this—that it would give them security both for their tenure and for their rent, and the landlord would not lose in a pecuniary sense, were his land only fairly let. He would get the same monetary return as he had hitherto obtained. A good deal had been said about the Court which was to be established, and which was to consist of three Commissioners; but he (Viscount Monck) had the highest confidence in that tribunal. He could tell the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) that he happened to know Mr. Serjeant O'Hagan, and believed the only fear was that the constitution of his mind was such that, from conscientious fear of giving effect to his inclination rather than his judgment, his decisions would be likely to incline in the direction opposite to his opinions. He could not help thinking that the duties of the Commissioners would be very analogous to those discharged by Courts in several cases. They would, in fact, constitute a Court of Arbitration, which the noble Duke admitted to be an excellent institution. And now one word about tenure. The system of tenure proposed in the Bill had been denounced as unsatisfactory and barbarous, and a step of a retrograde character. He should like, however, to see how its provisions worked before he assented to such a sweeping opinion as that. His thorough belief was that the Bill was the only way they could fairly deal with the question, although it might be a clumsy sort of mode of doing it. As to the arguments based on the expediency of an exactly similar system of Land Laws for the United Kingdom, he would say that they must not sacrifice the peace of the country and the probability of reconciling interests which clashed in Ireland to the symmetry of a system of Land Laws or land tenure. In the present circumstances of Ireland, freedom of contract, he maintained, could not subsist. If his contention was correct, the tenant had created a property in the land, and the real confiscation and invasion of the rights of property was that which deprived him of what he had created by his industry and capital. As to the question of political economy, he was puzzled to know how it had arisen. He always thought that political economy dealt with the production of wealth, and that anything which tended to the production of wealth could not be opposed to political economy. So far was this Bill from being an invasion of the principles of political economy, that he maintained it was in harmony with them, and carried at least one of its leading principles. As to free sale, he did not apprehend it would eat up the landlord's interest. Hitherto, in the North of Ireland, the free sale of tenant right had been notoriously restricted by office rules. There were very few large estates in that part of Ireland on which free sale prevailed, and the natural tendency of such a state of things was to enhance the value of the tenant right on those estates where it existed. His opinion was that the extension of tenant right to the whole of Ireland would lead to a reduction of its price. But after all was said, the great question was—What would be the effect of this Bill? He was old enough to have been able to follow the course of Irish politics for nearly half-a-century; and although it might seem strange in the present condition of things to say so, he held that an enormous improvement, both in feeling and in material prosperity, had taken place under his eyes in that part of the Kingdom. He thought he could trace that improvement almost directly to the conciliatory change of policy adopted towards Ireland, as regarded remedial measures, by all Parties during the period he had mentioned. Of course, it would be rash to prophecy; but he had great confidence in the continuance of that conciliatory policy as evinced in the form of the present Bill, founded as it was upon the principles of equity, guided by sagacity and courage. He had endeavoured to lay before their Lordships the reasons why he thought this Bill founded on principles of justice. He believed its construction exhibited also the qualities of sagacity and courage. He could not help hoping and expecting that that great and statesmanlike measure would be passed by their Lordships, and that would have the effect of restoring quiet and contentment in Ireland, and of weaning the minds of the mass of the people from those recurrent political agitations which had unquestionably retarded the material and moral progress of the country, and which never could have attained the height they had reached if they had not been founded on a well-grounded sense of injustice.

Viscount Monck

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: It was with very considerable gratification, my Lords, that I heard the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) attempt to trace the political causes to which this Bill is due. In the few observations I shall venture to offer I shall endeavour to draw your Lordships' attention to one source of political pressure in connection with the measure which has not hitherto been referred to by any of the noble Lords who have addressed the House. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), who followed the noble Lord who moved the second reading of the Bill, drew attention in a marked manner to some speeches made by the noble Lord, then Mr. Chichester Fortescue, and by the noble and learned Lord now sitting on the Woolsack, which are entirely inconsistent with their action in regard to this measure. It would not be difficult to produce a whole array of speeches of the same character. It is not, however, my intention to occupy your Lordships' time by lengthy quotations in proof of inconsistency. But if I wanted an ample refutation of the principles of this Bill it would be found in this fatal volume of Hansard, which records the opinions of public men, and which is full of retractations and recantations and disavowals of previous opinions. Their name is legion, and if I were to attempt to draw forth a refutation of the principles of the Bill I could quote as witnesses Sir Robert Collier, Baron Dowse, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Gladstone, Lords Granville and Hartington, Mr. Hugh Law, and Sir Roundell Palmer. The opinions of those Gentlemen have furnished the most complete answer to the principles of the measure now before your Lordships, which those who put them forth now advocate with an ardour only equalled by the success with which they previously condemned them. With this host of witnesses who some time ago condemned the principles which they now approve and advocate, it is natural to ask, What has been the cause of this very remarkable change of opinion; but that would lead me to trespass too much on your Lordships' time. But the point to which I would draw your Lordships' attention is one not hitherto noticed—that the present Bill is the result of a successful and most dangerous agitation, and one to which I venture to allude because the events connected with it passed under my own observation during the time I had the honour to occupy a high post in Ireland. Your Lordships are aware of the failure of the Fenian movement in 1866 and 1867. The result was that the Fenian organization in Ireland was utterly broken up, discouraged, and powerless for action. The Fenians were broken into parties in which every section of opinion was represented. In 1878, there appeared a very remarkable letter from a very remarkable man named John Devoy, who took refuge in America after the Fenian troubles, and who, finding the state of affairs as regarded any insurrectionary movement was hopeless, penned these remarkable words—

[Second Night.]

“I am also convinced that one section of the people alone can never win independence, and no political Party, however devoted or determined, can ever win the support of the whole people if they never come before the public and take no part in the every-day life of the country. I have often said it before, and I repeat it now again, that a mere conspiracy will never free Ireland.”

In addition to that, the writer goes on to say that the particular point on which attention should be concentrated was the reform of the Irish land system. Now, that letter was written in 1878, and in 1879 the first of its results appeared in the formation of what was called the Tenant Defence Association in Dublin. The first meeting of any importance in connection with that Association was in the Spring of 1879, in the Autumn of which year was formed the Land League, of which we have heard so much. Your Lordships are aware of the course of events in 1879, and of the opportunities afforded by the distress for the agitation against rent. In 1880 the Land League was in full swing, and we had these remarkable words of Mr. Parnell, which indicated the coming policy that was to predominate in Ireland—

“What can we do to induce the landlords to see the position? You must show them that you intend to hold a firm grip of your land; you must not allow yourselves to be dispossessed.”

And on another occasion he used words which have a still more remarkable bearing; he said last Autumn—

“Depend upon it, the measure of the Land Bill next Session will be the measure of your activity next winter. . . . It will be the measure of your determination not to take farms from which others have been evicted, and to use the strong force of public opinion to deter unjust men from bidding for such farms.”

These words sufficiently indicated the intention of the Leaders of the movement, who advised the formation of a common platform and the taking of a new departure, from which their agitation might be successful, and they were followed by the formation of the Land League, when Mr. Parnell, in his speeches, laid most stress on this, that the Land Question would unite them all, and that the determination to pay no rent would bring about a satisfactory measure of reform. I may be asked what connection there is between all this and the measure before us, and I believe I have shown that that connection is not far distant. We were told by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll), in a previous speech in this House, that when the present

The Duke of Marlborough

Government came into power, there was no intention of altering the Land Act of 1870 by the introduction of another Land Bill; and it is simply and solely to the success which that agitation was allowed to achieve that we are indebted for the introduction of the Bill. Disorder, confusion, and outrages took place during the Winter and Autumn of 1880, and I believe those outrages so acted upon the sympathetic mind of the Prime Minister that they induced him to consider it necessary to overthrow those principles which he and many of his supporters enunciated in 1870 as sound principles of Constitutional Law, and to bring in a measure which has no parallel even among the revolutionary measures the Premier has ever introduced to Parliament. The noble and learned Lord who spoke last night (Lord O'Hagan) laid great stress on the fact that the measure was necessary to produce peace in Ireland. If it were so, I should not object to it; but, judging from the past, and from the advice which has been, and is still being, given to the people, I think we have only to consider what are the particular objects of contention in Ireland at the present time to form a very accurate conjecture as to whether the measure will be productive of peace. We know the advice tendered to the Irish tenants, and the suggestion that they should pay nothing but a fair rent for their holdings. What is the explanation of the term "fair rent?" The fair rent, as explained by those who exercise the greatest influence among the Irish tenantry, is that after they have suited their own requirements, paid their just debts, and laid by a provision for their families, they may then pay what remains to the landlord. That is the rent that the tenants have been advised to pay. The other precept of the Land League is that no tenant shall take any land from which another has been evicted. Now, will the Bill remove any of these grievances and difficulties? The rent under the Bill will be a judicial rent. It may give satisfaction; but it may not. If it does give satisfaction all will be well; but if rents are not fixed on just, fair, and equitable principles it will not be satisfactory. But if it be not, the agitation will not come to an end. Do you think this Bill will necessarily stop evictions? No; evictions will continue, but this great advantage, I presume, will remain to the landlord, that when nearly all control of his estate is taken from him he will have to carry out evictions in his own name. But if the Bill does not stop evictions, can we hold that the injunctions laid down by the Land League will be deviated from, or that there will be greater peace and order in Ireland? I heard, with particular interest, the noble Duke speak of this measure as involving transactions of an improvident and almost immoral character. It appears to me to be like a great gambling transaction, in which payment of a bill is postponed to a distant date, while a certain sum is given to the immediate drawer. This Bill, by one stroke, deals simply with the tenants of the present in Ireland, and puts an enormous sum of money into their pockets. The rateable value of Ireland, exclusive of Ulster, amounts to £11,393,000; and if we add to that 25 per cent, the probable excess of the rental over the rateable value, we find that the rental of Ireland, exclusive of Ulster, comes to £14,242,000. Now, as we have the remarkable provision standing in the forefront of the Bill that every tenant shall be allowed to sell his tenancy for the best price he can get, assuming three years' purchase a moderate sum for the tenancy, the Bill will put the sum of £42,000,000 into the pockets of the tenants existing at present; and at seven years' purchase it will be £100,000,000 into their pockets. I think that justifies the statement of Mr. Baron Dowse, that the Bill simply deals with existing tenants, and that it is not necessary for it to provide for the future. Now, where does that sum of money come from? It comes from the pockets either of the tenants for the future or of the landlords. In the latter case, it is so far a loss of interest on the money they pay for the redemption of their estates, or it is a loss of rent that can never be replaced; in the former, it becomes an increase of rent paid by the tenants, but not received by the landlords. The great difference between this Bill and the Act of 1870 is that that Act offered an inducement—a strong one—to tenants to remain in the quiet possession of their holdings. Under that Act they were to have compensation for disturbance of tenure; and therefore, under the shelter of that provision, they might profitably and safely farm their lands. But this Bill will invite tenants to quit their holdings, and, treating as it does all tenants alike, will offer a premium on idleness and unproductiveness on the part of the tenant. A system like the Irish land system is one of extraordinary complexity and diversity, yet the Government have proceeded in a rough-and-ready way to deal with the multitude of different circumstances which must necessarily arise in practice. I can conceive nothing more calculated to encourage the spirit of gambling and speculation that exists among the Irish tenants than the facilities given by this Bill to enable them, both provident and improvident—those who have effected some improvements and those who have not—to obtain from the Court a statutory term of 15 years, and then to go into the market and sell their interests for the highest price they can get. What can be more unreasonable, for example, than that a tenant who has only been in his holding for six months should stand in as favourable a position as another who, together with his family, have held the farm for six generations? To both, however, it offers the same facilities. We have heard a good deal about the village tyrant; but there is another person who is well known to Irish landlords, and who is a still more objectionable character—namely, the village “gombeen.” During the great distress in 1880 many loans were made, and the calling in of these loans was one of the principal sources of the poverty and distress which now pervaded Ireland. Among the many disadvantages which encumber the system of free sale is this—that, as the noble Duke has said, it precludes every man from obtaining a holding except by the payment of a considerable sum of money. That system may work very well in Ulster, for in that Province there is an industrious and a frugal population, and a system which works well there may be detrimental in other parts of the country. This Bill reminds me of the story of Samson in the arms of Delilah. All the power of the landlords is gone, all their strength expended, and the cry is raised—“Up, for the Philistines are upon you.” The Winter of 1879-80 was a most instructive one. I know nothing more commendable than the self-denying character of the Irish landlords during that trying time. But will that feeling remain after the passing of this Bill, when we have abstracted from the landlords every interest in their property, all their proprietary rights, and have fixed their rent by a judicial decree of the Land Court?—when we have, in fact, reduced them to the position of mere rent-chargers upon their estates. I do not think that they will submit to the same deprivations and show the same kindly spirit and feelings towards their tenants. On the contrary, they will stand upon the letter of the law. The effect of the Bill will be to impose a fine of enormous magnitude upon the landlords of Ireland. It is said that the landlords will be able to enforce the payment of their rents by civil process; but I fear that after the passing of the Bill the dangers attending the collection of rent will be the same as now. We are also told that they may redeem their farms; but some landlords possess thousands of them, and they will not be able to exercise that right. I contend that during the first period of 15 years for which the Court can fix a tenancy, we shall see a change in the relations between landlord and tenant which will make the latter the virtual possessor of his farm. In 1870, Mr. Gladstone said—

“As I understand it, the scheme itself amounts to this—that each and every occupier, as long as he pays the rent that he is now paying, or else some rent to be fixed by a public tribunal charged with the duty of valuation, is to be secured for himself, and his heirs, in the occupation of the land that he holds, without limit of time. He will be subject only to this condition—somewhat in the nature of the Commutation of Tithe Act—that with a variation in the value of produce the rent may vary, but it will be slightly, and at somewhat distant periods. The effect of that provision will be that the landlord will become a pensioner and rent-charger upon what is now his own estate. The Legislature has, no doubt, the perfect right to reduce him to that condition, giving him proper compensation for any loss he may sustain in money; the State has a perfect right to deal with his social status, and to reduce him to that condition if it thinks fit. But then it is bound not so to think fit unless it is shown that this is for the public good. Now is it for the public good that the landlords of Ireland, in a body, should be reduced by an Act of Parliament to the condition practically of fund-holders, entitled to apply on a certain day from year to year for a certain sum of money, but entitled to nothing more? Are you prepared to denude them of their interest in the land; and, what is more, are you prepared to absolve them from their duties with regard to the land? I, for one, confess that I am not; nor is that the sentiment of my Colleagues. We think, on the contrary, that we ought to look forward with hope and expectation to bringing about a state of things in which the landlords of Ireland may assume, or may more generally assume, the position which is happily held, as a class, by landlords in this country—a position marked by residence, by personal familiarity and by sympathy with the people among whom they live, by long traditional connection handed on from generation to generation and marked by a constant discharge of duty in every form that can be suggested—be it as to the administration of justice, be it as to the defence of the country, be it as to the supply of social, or spiritual, or moral, or educational wants—be it for any purpose whatever that is recognized as good and beneficial in a civilized society. Although, as I have said, nothing would induce me voluntarily to acquiesce in a continuance of such a state of things as has prevailed, and still, to a great extent, prevails in Ireland—it would, I own, be a most melancholy conclusion were we to find that we could not rectify that which is now wrong in the land tenures of that country without undertaking a social revolution, a social revolution in which the main characteristics would be the abolition of wealth and property from the performance of duty, and an addition to that lounging class—unfortunately too abundant in this country—who are possessed of money and of nothing else, and who seem to have no object in life but to teach us how to multiply our wants and to raise the standard of our luxuries, even when we have not yet solved the problem, or got to the heart of the secret, how we are to relieve the destitution which is pining at our doors.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 351-2.]

The Duke of Marlborough

Now, the provisions of this Bill will have the effect which the Prime Minister contemplates in these words. I very much doubt whether the land hunger of which we hear so much will be assuaged by the means provided by this measure.

“*Crescit indulgens sibi dirus hydrops,
Nec sitim pellit, nisi causa morbi
Fugerit venis, et aquosus albo
Corpore languor.*”

I hold that in time the tenant's interest must completely absorb the interest of the landlord, and we shall some day see an agitation in Ireland productive of still more revolutionary demands, and directed, not against unjust rents, but against rent of any kind. I believe that the Irish people will soon perceive that by a judicious exercise of the powers conferred upon them by this Bill, that by enlarging their own interests and contracting those of the landlords, the whole interest in estates will pass into their hands, and that it will require but a slight shock to overthrow the remaining structure of the landlord's property in Ireland. I wish to say one or two words about the constitution of the Land Court. I have nothing to say against the gentlemen who will compose it, no doubt they are men of the highest honour and probity; but the Court, nevertheless, does not commend itself to me as a Court of the highest impartial judicial characteristics. It seems to me to partake of the nature of a Court whose members have been selected from the partizans of one political Party in order to give effect to preconceived ideas. In Serjeant O'Hagan we have the learned gentleman who assisted the Catholic Bishops of Ireland in the preparation of their criticisms upon the Bill, many of which were listened to. There is one of the recommendations which I rather think was made to find out which way the wind blows. It is a kind of explanation why the Prime Minister refused to sanction any re-arrangement for the re-appointment of the two lay Commissioners after seven years have expired. This last recommendation is that two Assessors should be associated with the County Court Judges, and have co-ordinate jurisdiction. These Assessors would be chosen by popular election. One of the features of the case which strikes me with the greatest alarm is the reception which the Bill will meet with in Ireland. It will be a very dangerous thing if, by a revolutionary measure, we hand over the whole of the property of Ireland to a system of hotch-potch, placing the working of the measure in the hands of those who will only work it in a manner which is conducive to their own ends. Yet there is another Court in Ireland to which I have already referred—a Court not nominated by the Queen—whose decisions are secret, which now claims to regulate, and does regulate, the affairs of the whole country. That is the Court which the Government has obeyed, which will administer this law and promulgate it throughout Ireland. The existence of this Court is one of the most dangerous elements in the question. I admit that it is not possible to reject this Bill in face of the powerful Land League which has been raised in England and Ireland; but I cannot for one moment join in the hopefulness as to the future of Ireland which, in consequence of this Bill, is entertained by the supporters of the Government. The picture which I draw is certainly not a very cheering one, because I believe that when the Bill is sent to Ireland it will be the signal for further disorders in that country. It will be seen that agitation has produced successful results; that concessions have been made to disloyal people; and the advent of this measure in Ireland will be the signal of the departure, before any great number of years have elapsed, of what has been termed the "English garrison." The destruction of the National Church in Ireland was one, and this will be another, among the many monuments to the transcendent ability, but, at the same time, ill-regulated optimism, of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT said, as a Member of the Irish Land Tenure Committee, he felt he could not give a silent vote on that most important question. That Committee was appointed last winter, as their Lordships knew, for the purpose of sketching out the general lines on which it was desirable to legislate with reference to land in Ireland; and, feeling as he did very earnestly upon the question, he should like to lay his views before their Lordships with regard to some of the broad principles of the Bill. He maintained that, whether tenant right had been given by the Bill or not, it existed, as was proved both by the Richmond and Bessborough Commissions, in consequence of the labour of the tenants' hands, the reclamation of land, the erection of buildings, and the long occupation of holdings. Therefore, the difference between the practice of England and Ireland as regarded improvements was essential to the proper conditions of the Bill. It was the custom in England for landlords to erect, and also to maintain, all the buildings necessary for the occupation of the farms, and to drain the lands at their own expense. This, however, had never been the custom in Ireland, and could not be, with its system of small farms. When an Irish tenant applied to his landlord for improvements on his holding, the landlord said he could not do the whole of them. The tenant thereupon would ask whether if he did a part he would be given a security. The landlord consented, and the principle of tenant right was thereby established; for, of course, the improvements made by the tenant were his property, and no landlord would charge rent upon such improvements. But sometimes the tenants wanted improvements of a more important character, and the landlord agreed to borrow money from the Board of Works, or became security for the money, to effect them, and an agreement was made that the tenant should pay interest on the loan in the shape of an increased rent. This increase became a permanent increase; and though the money was repaid in 35 years the charge continued. That, he thought, was perfectly fair, as the land was permanently benefited. Of course, if the Bill was passed, and tenant right became universal, landlords would probably only erect buildings strictly on these terms. Many landlords, in fact, had erected buildings before this, and never charged anything to the tenants at all. He had adopted that plan himself. He strongly supported the recognition of the tenant's interest, which was established in the Bill, and by no means agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) on the question of tenants' improvements, which were a real item in the question. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to any limiting Amendments of the Bill of the nature proposed by Mr. Heneage and Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice in the other House of Parliament. He did not believe there existed one estate in Ireland which was really managed on the English principle, and on which all the improvements had been the work of the landlord. He thought, too, it was most undesirable to create two different classes of tenants in the country. He considered that the object of this measure was to put all the tenants of Ireland upon an equal footing, and he thought that such an object could not prejudice the landlords in any way. He deprecated the creating of jealousies and distinctions, and let them not enable a tenant to complain that he did not possess tenant right while his next-door neighbour did. It was also noticeable that the Amendments proceeded from English and not Irish Members of Parliament. He regretted very much to say that he was afraid there would be great efforts to emasculate the Bill. He thought that would be a narrow, selfish, and short-sighted policy; and what they ought to do in the present state of Ireland was to give full tenant right, with free sale. He did not think that when the Irish tenant got tenant right such as the Bill would give him he would be so very anxious to acquire the fee simple. Nevertheless, every facility ought to be put in the way of the tenants becoming the owners of their farms where the landlord was willing to sell. The great point with the Irish tenant was security in his holding and a fair rent. He would also object to any limitation of the principle of free sale as laid down in the Bill. They ought not to attempt to limit the price for which tenant right was to be sold. He was of opinion that the purchase and sale of the tenant right ought to be guided by the market price; and he did not think it would ever be worth the landlord's while to purchase the tenant right; he might just as well throw his money into the sea, except in cases of fraudulent tenants, when he could protect himself by the power of pre-emption provided in the Bill. He did not look upon the Bill as one for the confiscation of the landlords' property, but rather as a recognition of tenant right, believing, as he did, that if they granted security to the tenant they would also secure the landlord, for they must stand or fall together. He asked the House to remember the state of Ulster, where tenant right existed, and to compare it with the rest of Ireland, and say whether the landlords' property was not more secure in Ulster than in other parts of Ireland. He hoped their Lordships would recognize that principle, and that both landlords and tenants would enter into their new relations with mutual respect and cordial co-operation.

The Duke of Marlborough

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I entreat your kind indulgence for a few remarks which I desire to make upon this Bill as an Irish landowner directly interested in its immediate operation, and as an English landowner prospectively interested, with most of your Lordships, in the formidable precedent which it establishes. It is painful to me to be compelled to speak as I shall have to do of this Bill, brought in by a Government comprising many with whom I have long, as a Liberal, been in the habit of acting in politics. But it is more painful to think that a Liberal Government could thus repudiate wholesale their recent professions and promises. It is they, not I, that have changed opinions since I supported their Land Act of 1870. The view I take of this Bill and its antecedents is only consistent with that deep conviction of the paramount importance of law and order, and that attachment to the principles of Free Trade, including freedom of contract for adults, which I have always felt and maintained from my youth upwards. But freedom of contract for adults only, for I well remember repeatedly voting in favour of protection to really helpless factory children from overwork against Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright. Before, however, considering this Bill and its probable effects, I would ask leave to glance for a moment at its causes and antecedents. We hear, on the unimpeachable authority of the noble Duke who addressed us so powerfully to-day, that an Irish Land Bill formed no part of the original programme of the present Government; nor, indeed, we learn from competent authority, of the Liberal Party either; for 300 addresses of Liberal candidates at the last General Election contained, we are told, no allusion to it. So we have to seek aliunde the reason for the introduction of a measure so conflicting with the positive assurances given, and principles emphatically laid down, by the authors of the Act of 1870. The noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor of Ireland spoke, indeed, of resolutions passed at small meetings in the North of Ireland on the subject, and, like one or two other noble Lords, built up an enormous superstructure on some expression in the Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission. So we have heard, also, of the necessary, though unsuspected, development of the Act of 1870. But we find the real reason, as virtually admitted by my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, in the lawless condition into which Ireland has been brought since this Government's accession to Office. They cannot deny that Ireland was handed over to them tranquil and orderly—not, indeed, in a state of comfort and satisfaction—owing to the operation of the Land Act—previously almost unknown, as was erroneously stated by Mr. Gladstone just before the General Election; but tranquil and orderly, though disaffected, as was clearly discerned by the calmer judgment and deeper insight of his illustrious Predecessor, and was publicly proclaimed by him in his memorable letter to the Duke of Marlborough. In the Queen's Speech, in speeches in Parliament, and in speeches elsewhere, the present Government repeatedly announced their determination to govern Ireland on different principles and by different methods from those of their Predecessors; and this they certainly have done, as far as they can be said to have governed Ireland at all. In spite of the public remonstrances of those Predecessors, and of the confidential warnings of the stipendiary magistrates of Ireland, they, with marked self-complacency, refused to renew the Act prohibiting the importation of arms; and tens of thousands of firearms have been, in consequence, introduced into Ireland since their accession to Office. I impute no motives—I state facts. I am not going back to the Prime Minister's unfortunate Clerkenwell speech before the Dissolution. But later during the Recess last Autumn, after the outrages had commenced in Ireland, Mr. Bright—perhaps the first orator in England—went down and addressed his constituents. I remember his speech occupied more than a column in the newspapers. It was full of the injustice of Irish landlords and of the wrongs of Ireland; but there were not more than a few lines of decorous deprecation of violence in it altogether. Nor did any language of his right hon. Colleague tend at all to diminish the mischievous influence of that speech. Now, it is obvious that a systematic refusal to pay rent, accompanied by intimidation and even a certain amount of outrage towards those who paid it, or were engaged in obtaining its payment, would facilitate the object of those who desired a stringent and confiscatory Land Bill to be passed. The persistence in such lawless refusal and outrage would dispose needy and timid Irish landlords to accept almost any terms enabling them promptly to recover part of the money due to them, and would incline the people of Great Britain to acquiesce in legislation inconsistent with their habitual respect for the rights of property for the sake of obtaining a peaceful solution of the ever-recurring troublesome problem of Irish disaffection. The lawlessness spread and increased, till the law of the land was superseded, as the Government had to admit, by the law of the Land League, through county after county in Ireland. For months this dangerous and discreditable state of things was helplessly acquiesced in by the Government, till at last, in January, they felt compelled to propose a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act there. Somewhat later, even the Members for Birmingham, conspicuous by their absence from some of the earlier divisions on that Bill, were roused by the Land League's insolent defiance into speaking out. How useful these speeches would have been if made last Autumn! I will not yield to any one of the Government, or their supporters, my claims to be considered a friend to humanity. In the cause of suffering humanity, if I have effected little, I have worked hard and suffered somewhat. In that cause I have stood by the bedsides of the dead and dying of cholera and fever; I have visited the most infectious wards of workhouses and of hospitals, incurring some risk, unfortunately not always with complete impunity, by doing, rarely and at intervals, what thousands of brave medical men and ministers of religion do daily as a matter of course. But I feel no respect for the humanitarianism which has more regard for the lives and limbs of the law-breaking and law-defying than those of the law-abiding and law-enforcing; which calmly exposed brave soldiers and policemen—armed, indeed, but rendered practically defenceless by the authorities—to insults, wounds, and even death, from seditious mobs or cowardly assassins; which made the magistrate to bear the sword in vain; and which, consequently, left a certain number of loyal subjects for many months to suffer depredation, outrage, and even murder, and thousands more to remain helpless under the daily apprehension of similar treatment to themselves or their families. Conscious of the discredit attaching to them in consequence, the Prime Minister, followed by many of his Colleagues and of his supporters, began last Autumn, and has continued intermittently ever since, attributing the lawless state of Ireland to your Lordships' refusal to pass his Compensation for Disturbance Bill last Session. Now, as I took great pains to persuade several Friends of mine to come up and swell the majority of Liberal Peers, which would, of itself, have sufficed, without other aid, to throw out that Bill, I must be allowed to say of that discreditable abortive attempt at Ministerial legislation that it was the fitting precursor of this measure. For, in all its Protean variety of phases, from its first sudden introduction, contrary to all precedent, as a supplementary clause to a Relief of Distress Bill down to its final rejection by an almost unexampled majority of this House, its principle was confiscation with repudiation of contract. And both these measures have been alike mis-described by the Government. As that Bill was founded on the anticipation of general cruel exaction—unjust, though legal—on the part of the Irish landlords, who have been since, as a body, triumphantly acquitted of this charge by the Prime Minister, so this Bill was avowedly based on the Report and Evidence presented by a one-sided Commission, of which I need now only say that they could find time to admit an anonymous letter as testimony against a landlord, but could not find time to give the hearing which they had promised to the landlords to rebut the charges made against them individually. That Bill professed to be local. It should rather have been called general with local exceptions; for it applied to more than half the acreage of Ireland, and to more than two-thirds of the acreage not already otherwise provided for by legislation. It professed to be temporary; yet it dealt inter alia with changes of tenancy—that is, with arrangements of ex hypothesi more than 18 months' duration. It professed to apply to distressed districts only; yet its Schedules comprised numerous large tracts where the good crops contrasted markedly with those in many large really distressed districts in England and Wales. So this Bill, we are assured with corresponding intrepidity by the Government, is not to confiscate, but to raise in value landed property in Ireland; to benefit not the tenant only, but the landlord also, and especially the labourers. That our rejection of that Bill, notwithstanding the large majority by which it passed the other House, was readily acquiesced in, if not approved, by British public opinion, we learn, not only from the reasoning and testimony of the always honest and fearless Postmaster General, but still more conclusively from the conspicuous failure of the Government to get up successful indignation meetings on the subject anywhere out of Ireland. I agree with that able and courageous Minister that we may find in that fact a strong argument in favour of your Lordships passing a Land Bill, which I feel satisfied is now demanded by the public opinion of Great Britain as well as Ireland. But I go further, and find in that fact also an encouragement for this House fearlessly to modify those confiscatory clauses which in this Bill, as I read it, deal hardly with the Irish landlords in proportion to the good which they and their predecessors have done, and the forbearance which they have shown, to their tenants. The noble Marquess who spoke with such remarkable ability from these Benches yesterday exposed the Ministerial misrepresentation that this Bill had been rendered necessary by the extensive mutilation of the Land Bill of 1870 in this House; the chief mutilations having been made by the present Lord Chancellor, the present Irish Chancellor, and the present Foreign Secretary. So much has been already said so ably about this Bill that I will only now repeat that it establishes free sale everywhere in Ireland, whether previously prevailing or not on an estate—nay, more, none the less, where the landlord has made large and long-continued sacrifices to exclude it. This Bill not only presents the tenant with what he has never bought, but what the landlord has paid heavily to prevent his buying. Why should he be empowered to sell at a high price for his own benefit alone, to whoever he pleases, the enjoyment of a holding rendered all the more valuable by the improvements to which the landlord has contributed without raising his rent, sacrificing for years that contribution with compound interest? This is what my predecessors and I have done for more than half-a-century, and this is what most other improving Irish landlords have done also. Moreover, thinking it undesirable for a new tenant to enter upon a new holding, or an old tenant on an enlarged holding, not only exhausted of capital, but probably also encumbered with debt, we have not allowed the incoming tenant to discharge the arrears of his predecessor in the holding; these arrears being sacrificed in my case generally to the amount of at least two years' rent during more than half-a-century for the sake of the well-being of the tenants and the better cultivation of the estate. But why should all this be presented to the tenants, who have already themselves for years enjoyed the benefit of these sacrifices of their landlords? And how much harder are the cases of estates managed on the English system, where the landlord has made the improvements of all kinds, instead of only helping the tenants to make them, like myself and most Irish landlords! Still worse, however, if possible, as a matter of principle than this, the Bill, as it stands, enacts that written contracts shall be void, and leases not made under duress, but willingly taken by tenants cognizant of their provisions and voluntarily agreeing to them, shall be arbitrarily invalidated; on account, I suppose, of the helplessness of the leaseholder, even if he is occupying land on lease worth £1,000 a-year. Can there be a case to which Mr. Gladstone's forcible words of 1870 more strongly apply?—those words, I mean, so often quoted, as to the demoralizing influence that legislation must have which facilitates and encourages repudiation of contract. And I, as an Irish landowner, frequently visiting that country, and, in earlier years, sometimes resident there for weeks and months at a time, venture to say, from my own experience, that any such influence is particularly undesirable in Ireland, where all classes have too much indulged in what one of the Alabama Commissioners is reported to have professed—namely, “a preference for less accurate modes of expression.” How far and when contracts are to be repudiated, what is a fair rent, and various other questions, are, by the Bill, left absolutely to the discretion of the new Court to be created. Upon the composition of that Court I shall say nothing. I never heard even the names of two of its members before, nor that of the third except in connection with the House of Commons. But, however able and impartial they may be, I think it a dangerous thing to place the interests of the Irish landlords and tenants completely at the mercy of a Court without appeal, and with so little in this Bill of direction on some very important points. All the other Judges in the land, however eminent, act under the control of statute and precedent. Some of the language in the Bill is very vague; and this new Court, obviously, can have no precedents for its guidance. But, further, this Bill is distinctly retrograde in its conception. It encourages and multiplies those divided ownerships in land, which for many years the public opinion and legislation alike of this and other countries in Europe have discouraged and superseded. You must go to India to find precedents for such a measure. In England, successive statutes have long been facilitating the conversion of copyholds into freeholds and the extinguishing of manorial and other dues upon fair terms. The noble Marquess told your Lordships how, in other European countries—in France, in Italy, in Spain and Portugal, and in Germany—land tenure had been more and more simplified, and mediæval dues more and more superseded by money payments. The metayer system, once very prevalent in Europe, is being gradually replaced by money rents, especially where improvement is greatest. In Belgium, of which, but for Mr. Jenkins's instructive Report, we should probably have heard more said by the Government, metayage, once rife, now survives only in a few polders near the German Ocean. The noble Marquess told your Lordships how the great Land Reform in Prussia, begun by Stein in 1807 or 1811, but not completed till 1850, did not consist, as Mr. Bright erroneously stated some time ago, in taking one-third or one-half of the land from the landlord, and giving it to the tenant; but consisted in taking some such amount from the tenant and giving it to the landlord in lieu of the labour and other dues, which, under the previous system, he could claim from the tenant; and, at the same time, exonerating the landlord from claims for assistance of various kinds from the tenant; thus rendering each class very nearly independent holders of their respective lands. I might cite the land legislation of Hesse, begun in 1811, but not quite completed till 1849, which is fully described by Mr. Morier in a very able Report, because, though the territory is small, its condition was typical of much elsewhere in Germany, and the success attending that legislation rendered its example very influential. But I will not trouble your Lordships with it. I will only add Mr. Morier's summing up—

[Second Night.]

[Second Night.]

“The one ruling idea of the agrarian legislation of Hesse, and, indeed, every part of Germany, during the present century has been to extirpate double ownership, and substitute in lieu of it full, unhampered rights of allodial” (or, as we should say, freehold) “possession.”

But all this has been done with scrupulous regard to the just rights of both parties. It was everywhere in Germany an equitable adjustment of the fair claims of each—not a confiscation of the property of either for the benefit of the other class. Far the greater part of this Bill is devoted, not to equitably extirpating, but to confirming and perpetuating divided ownership where it already exists, encouraging—nay, compelling—its creation where it does not; and doing this, not with fair compensation, but by scarcely disguised confiscation. We must consider this Bill, however, not merely as regards its injustice or its retrograde character in relation to the more recent legislation and public opinion of the most civilized countries of the world; we must look also at its probable results by the light of political economy, which was described by Mr. Lowe some years ago in the House of Commons as the one safe oasis wherein to rest in the dreary desert of politics. I know that political economy has been, by one leading member of the Cobden Club, amidst the applause of many other of its influential members, relegated to some distant planet. But political economy has an inconvenient habit of, sooner or later, vindicating its truths and the predictions of its disciples by results. Within the present century a powerful Finance Minister in his day, Mr. Vansittart, on behalf of a strong Government, carried by a large majority through the House of Commons a Resolution affirming that a guinea was worth only a pound note and a shilling, and yet guineas continued to be none the less sold next day for 27s. in London for exportation. The highly protective Corn Laws of 1815, 1822, and 1828, with elaborate sliding scales, avowedly intended to secure a steady remunerative price to the British farmer, though triumphantly carried, did not prevent agricultural distress from twice, at an interval of about 10 years, reaching such a point as to engage the serious attention of the Legislature, and on each occasion to cause the appointment of Parliamentary Committees to inquire into the cause and, if possible, suggest remedies for the distress. The later Protectionist Corn Law of 1842, to which Mr. Gladstone was a party, and of which I was, unworthily, selected to move the rejection of the second reading—that law, specially intended to insure steadiness and moderation of price under a sliding scale of duties doubling the profit and loss on each transaction, though not less triumphantly carried, also conspicuously failed of both objects, and was repealed by its authors four years afterwards. So we need not shrink from considering this Bill in its economical aspect. There can be no doubt that, whatever be the case elsewhere, in Ireland, the capital employed in farming is generally too small for the land to be farmed to the best advantage. Can it be economically desirable that under the influence of earth-hunger a tenant, before entering upon a new farm or upon an enlargement of his former holding, should be encouraged to spend all his capital, if not to borrow more, in order to buy the tenant right? Can it be doubted that the Ulster Custom was far more the consequence than the cause of prosperity in Ulster? Has not much of that prosperity resulted from the rural domestic manufactures long successfully carried on there, but unknown in the other parts of Ireland—all inferior in thrift, industry, education, and civilization, to Ulster? And now that these additional sources of profit beyond the farm have been largely superseded by chemical works and steam factories in towns, are there not indications that the burden of that custom is often found too heavy? Can it be desirable to give to thousands additional fixity of tenure in holdings each too small, even if rent free, to provide food for a family, and abounding by far the most where both soil and climate are unfavourable to tillage? Is not this to encourage a permanent local congestion of the population on spots where every bad season must bring them to the brink of starvation? Can it be desirable, for the real interests of the Irish farmer, to drive away the landlords; or, when they remain, so to diminish their influence, as to render them powerless to restrain the indefinite subdivision of holdings and multiplication of their inhabitants? The litigation under this measure will certainly be immense. Whether tenants, landlords, or labourers will be benefited by it or not, no one can doubt that the Irish lawyers will be so enormously. Can it be desirable that a large amount of capital should be spent on unproductive litigation, which, moreover, we know from experience is sure to generate and

[Second Night.]

foster ill-will between the litigant parties? Then, can it be desirable, in the interest of the Irish labourers, still more numerous than the farmers, to drive away and dishearten the landlords, who employ so much more labour on their demesnes than do the farmers in proportion on their holdings? Will not the sudden withdrawal of the landlords' demand for labour, in consequence of this measure, tend to throw many men out of work, and to lower still more the already lowering, though till quite lately much improved, rate of wages in Ireland? And this brings me to the neglect shown by the Government, notwithstanding their professions of interest in it, to that, the largest class in Ireland, both in their Act of 1870, and in this Bill as originally introduced. In the Act of 1870, Clause 9, authorizing the landlord to take land for cottage building, I happen to know, had to be pressed upon them before it was inserted in the House of Commons; and sub-section 5 of Clause 12, giving similar power to take small allotments for the labourers' use, was introduced in this House. I have heard it said that there is no instance of these compulsory powers being used. But I, who have built a certain number of labourers' cottages in Ireland, despairing of the farmers ever doing so, should be very sorry to be without them. The Royal veto has not been found wholly inoperative by our Monarchs, though William III. was the last who actually exercised it. In like manner, there was not originally a single clause in the present Bill for the labourer's benefit. But then the labourers, though in general badly treated by the farmers, had not yet had recourse to intimidation or violence. Unfortunately, the discouragingly small amount of the fund provided for assisting emigration, through which alone relief can be obtained for the local congestions of superfluous population in the poorest districts, and, above all, the absence of almost all mention of field-draining in the Bill, and certainly of any provision for its extensive execution, together with the prominence given to reclamation in its provisions, afford sad evidence how little the Government have understood the real requirements of Ireland, and how much they have been influenced by clamour in the deviations which they have made in this measure from the strict principles of political economy. The large present and prospective withdrawal of employment by landlords renders it urgently desirable to bring some productive work within easy reach of the labourers pretty nearly all over Ireland without long delay, and without necessitating their removal from their homes. Some field drainage, as distinguished from arterial drainage, is required, I am assured, in every neighbourhood in Ireland—almost in every parish in Ireland. In England, it is stated that about two-thirds of the cost of such draining has been in labour. In Ireland, where the draining would be more largely done with stone, the proportion would be probably greater, and the work would naturally be chiefly piece—not day-work—thus stimulating industry by enabling the industrious to earn good wages. The generally remunerative character of field, or, as it is sometimes called, thorough drainage, is well known. In some cases, its whole cost has been repaid by the increased crops in four years. But it may be reckoned, generally, to do so in 10 years, except in the case of very poor, stiff soils, in a wet climate; so that, with a moderate annual charge for interest, and the gradual repayment of the principal, not only would no loss, except in very rare instances, have been sustained by the landlords, even if the work had been done compulsorily on their lands, planned and superintended by Government officers; but considerable gain would have been realized in most cases by them, which would have been at least fully shared in by the labourers. Field drainage, and not the reclamation of waste lands on a large scale, is what a number of the best authorities, political economists, practical engineers, improving landlords, and land agents, recommend for Ireland at present on all grounds. Unhappily, it is too late now, consistently with Constitutional principles and Parliamentary usage, to remedy the neglect of the Government on this point in this Bill. But while field-draining has been virtually ignored by the Government in this measure, they have introduced clauses about the reclamation of waste land, happily still guarded by some precautionary words, likely, I hope, to render them a dead letter. For from what I have seen in Dartmoor, in Lewis, and in a land-locked bay adjoining my Irish property, and from what I have heard of in Whittlesea Mere and Sutherlandshire, and of the promised but never realized rescue of a whole county from the sea near Boston, I am very sceptical about the profitable reclamation of waste lands on a large scale, even by Companies or individuals, and much more by the Government. Under the most favourable circumstances much time would necessarily be consumed in making the requisite surveys and plans, in bringing the requisite machinery, and preparing the requisite accommodation for the large body of labourers required on these waste tracts. The need of increased employment for the labourers over the greater part of Ireland is urgent, and no provisions have been made for doing this in the Bill. But it is too late to repair this sad omission. We can only lament that the Government in this measure do so much that, in my opinion, they ought not to do, and are leaving undone so much that they might and ought rather to have done. The Government, I know, will triumphantly point to the Bright Clauses in the Act of 1870, and the large extension of the same principle in the present Act. The Bright Clauses failed to be extensively acted upon, as I well remember predicting they would, not so much because of their principle as of their infelicitous details: for transcendent eloquence does not always imply statesmanship, much less legislative capacity or administrative efficiency. Every thoughtful man must have desired to see the undivided ownership of land much more widely distributed in Ireland, not so much for economical, as for social and political, reasons, in order to interest larger numbers in the maintenance of the rights of landowners. Many, like myself, entertained sanguine hopes that the Encumbered Estates Act would have done much in that direction long ago. But, from various causes, it did very little; and among those causes was not only a lack at that time of any great amount of available capital in Ireland, but also, in the middle and lower class, a lack of that particular form of earth-hunger which craves for freehold possession. But though I think the extensive purchase of moderate freeholds by Irishmen with the proceeds of their own industry and thrift, even if aided somewhat by Government advances, would socially, economically, and politically be of the greatest advantage, I believe that in all these three respects Government advances of three-fourths of the price to land purchasers will have a very injurious effect; probably sometimes opening the door to collusion between buyer and seller for sham sales at extortionate prices to cheat the Government, certainly leading to a constant pressure on the Government, as chief creditor and practical landlord in Ireland, for remissions of debt, such as have been conceded from time to time by different Governments ever since I came into Parliament, and further furnishing a strong additional motive to the indebted masses for desiring national separation from England. With many thanks to your Lordships for your kind indulgence, I will now sum up my observations by saying that, on the whole, I consider much of the Bill bad in principle and dangerous as a precedent, as sanctioning repudiation of contract and ill-disguised confiscation; that I find when the Bill, in violation of the strict rules of political economy, makes advances of public money, it makes them, not to assist emigration on a scale sufficiently appreciable to relieve the local congestions of population in the poorest districts in excess of the means of subsistence; nor to provide generally remunerative employment in widely diffused field drainage for a large part of the most numerous class in Ireland now in danger of having to look to the poor rates for support; but it makes advances only for artificially raising a forced crop of freeholders, and for the speculation, if Government can get any Company to undertake it, of reclaiming waste land. Still, though I fear this Bill, extorted by intimidation, unsound in principle, and ill adapted to its object, is little likely to conduce to the increased productiveness of the land, to the permanent prosperity of the country, or to the general contentment of the people with the Queen's rule and the supremacy of Parliament, I am glad to learn that there is no serious intention to throw it out; for public opinion demands that a Land Bill shall be passed. At the same time, I trust the House will not shrink from the duty of altering the clauses most inconsistent with justice or policy which formed part of the Bill as introduced by the Government after full consideration; and I hope still more that the House will not hesitate summarily to reject objectionable provisions hastily put in during the discussion of the Bill, apparently in the vain endeavour to conciliate the irreconcilable Representatives of the Land League—a futile attempt at an impossible task. For the Land League have throughout announced that they will not be satisfied with any measure compatible with British ideas of justice and British supremacy. They really aim at nothing less than having Ireland for the Irish—by ejecting the landlords and confiscating their property—at nothing short of the Repeal of the Act of Union and complete national independence.

[Second Night.]

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, premising that in his remarks he should confine himself to the four corners of the Bill, said, he yielded to no one in his desire to see this unhappy question set at rest for ever, and a better state of feeling promoted between landlord and tenant in Ireland. No sacrifice could be too great, either for an individual or for a class, if they could restore to those portions of Ireland in which distrust had always unhappily existed between landlord and tenant a better feeling; and also if they could produce a good feeling in those districts where no such distrust ever prevailed, before it had been fostered within the last few months by the action of the Land League. He could not, however, but remark the want of appreciation apparent in several of the speeches delivered from the Ministerial side of the House of the haste with which the Bill had been initiated, and the extraordinary complexity of its details. The measure was distinctly and avowedly based on the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Earl who sat on the opposite Benches (the Earl of Bessborough). That Commission collected a vast mass of evidence, which was not taken on oath, and which was full of mis-statements and contradictions; but the Bill had been read a second time in the House of Commons before the rebutting testimony saw the light. His fear was that under the present Bill arrangements which were far more for the good of the tenants themselves than for the landlord would be utterly impracticable. For instance, with regard to free sale, there were two questions he should like to ask. The first was this—“Is it the case that since this custom of Ulster was legalized by the Act of 1870 a large number of tenants in that Province have sold their occupations, have left the country, and have given room to a class of tenants who are less provided with capital, are less able to farm, and are altogether on a lower footing as regards intelligence, capacity, and capital than the men whom they have replaced?” He had it on very high authority, from the manager of one of the largest estates in Ulster, that that was the case on the property with which he was immediately connected, and that he believed it to be the case on many other estates. The second question was—“How will it be possible, if this Bill becomes law in its present shape, for a landlord in the South or West of Ireland to make any improvement, by concentrating around the homestead the scattered fragments of land where the townlands have been let in rundale, or where they have been scattered by some other agency?” Previous to 1870, this object was always obtained by giving notice to quit, and thus inducing the tenants to come to an agreement as to the arrangement of their farms. Under the Act of 1870 such arrangements, which were more for the good of the tenant than that of the landlord, had been rendered difficult; and his fear was that, under the present Bill, they would be utterly impracticable. As regarded the Arbitration Clause of the Bill, it practically abolished freedom of contract altogether, whatever might be said of free sale. How would it be possible to carry out the provisions of the clause without a substantial revaluation of the soil of Ireland, and, if so, what means were provided for doing that; and how, in the numerous appeals to the Court which there would most assuredly be under it, would the machinery be provided which would enable the work in hand to be grappled with? Passing to what had been termed the ornamental clauses of the Bill, he would observe, with reference to the Purchase Clause, that while, politically speaking, there could be no doubt, if it could be properly worked, that it would be of the greatest possible benefit, for there could be no question of the great benefit that would accrue to Ireland by having a large number of owners of the soil; yet that doctrine, when they had to do with anything like peasant proprietorship in a congested district, would prove to be a failure. He believed it would be as impossible to preserve a race of peasant proprietors in Ireland as it had been found impossible to preserve the old race of yeomen in England, unless they could rescue them from the ever-increasing exigencies of modern competition. He did not expect that the Reclamation Clauses would work; the only possible way of reclaiming land in a remunerative way being by the application to waste lands of the spare time of occupiers, who could not get any money value for their spare hours. With regard to the Emigration Clause, whatever might have been the case as regards that clause as it was introduced into the Lower House, as it had emerged from it the clause was a simple farce. Its provisions reminded him of the attempt of Mrs. Partington to oppose the Atlantic with a mop. It had the expense limited to £200,000. That would emigrate about 700 families, or 5,000 souls, at the utmost, while the unaided emigration from Ireland last year was upwards of 96,000. He objected also to the provisions introduced into the Bill with regard to leases as being unjust, and must also be allowed to express his unqualified disapproval of the clause dealing with labourers. He should have preferred that the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, had been applied to the latter. What was to be done in the case of estates managed on the English principle? No proposal was contained in the Bill to meet such cases. He regretted the animus which had been shown towards the Irish landlords, and denied that a case had been made out which could in any way justify the hard things which had been said of them, although he admitted that among landlords, as among every other class, unjust men were to be found. He had always tried to assimilate the management of his Irish estates to that prevailing on his English estates. He thought that the Bill would operate hardly upon the purchasers of property in the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, and this class of proprietors numbered one-sixth of the whole. Many of these purchasers were commercial men, who were invited to make their purchases by way of investment under the inducements held out to them by the Legislature, and they were in this position, that they were disliked by the people, who preferred the former proprietors to them, and now found themselves abandoned by Parliament. The same thing would happen also to those who had become proprietors since 1870. This, however, was but one instance in which the Bill meted out injustice to the unoffending. He thought that it was a dangerous proposal to revise the terms of leases granted on the faith of the Act of 1870, and would not tend to encourage the granting of leases. By the provisions relating to labourers' cottages, the successors of present owners might find themselves charged with large sums for the repayment of advances made for the purpose of erecting cottages which might no longer be required. In other respects, too, the Bill showed an utter disregard for the interests of posterity. Everything was to be done here on behalf of the holder of the present tenancy, who was to be invested with privileges which formed no part of the bargain between himself and his landlord. With regard to the clause for staying proceedings, that clause was introduced at the last moment, and was dishonest on the part of those who introduced it, and on the part of those who accepted it. That clause merely introduced by a side wind the principle which their Lordships refused to recognize in the Compensation for Disturbance Bill of last year. If the clause were passed, it would authorize the Court to decree that just debts should not be satisfied which had been allowed to remain unenforced by the indulgence of the landlord. He was puzzled to understand the principles on which the Bill was framed. He gave the Government credit for a sincere desire to benefit Ireland; but how did they carry out their intention? The subject of Irish land required to be treated like any other subject, on scientific principles. So far as political economy was concerned, those principles had been thrown to the winds at the outset. They would, however, re-assert themselves. Naturam expellas furca tamen usque recurret. They were told that this was to be a message of peace to Ireland. It probably was so intended; but, judging from the reception which the measure had received from the Land League, there was little reason to hope that it would prove to be a message of peace to Ireland. It had already been formally repudiated under the influence which at present dominated Ireland, and was not that of our Sovereign lady the Queen. He could not help thinking that this Bill would open the door to unlimited litigation, a circumstance which was to be regretted, especially in a country like Ireland, where such a love of litigation prevailed. In every clause the interests of the landlords were deliberately set aside in order to gratify the political exigencies of a Government, or the demands of an outrageous agitation. One thing, however, would have even reconciled him to this Bill, in spite of all its objectionable features, and that was if it had been a final measure. But most important questions had been intentionally left open for future consideration, among them being absenteeism, the constitution of the Land Court, and the subject of town parks. If it was to the advantage of the State that any person or class should cease to exercise the rights they had exercised, he had no doubt that the State could remove them; but they had no right to keep them in a position which was intolerable to them. In his opinion, simple expropriation of landlords upon an equitable footing would have been a more statesmanlike proceeding, for the landlords would in the future be of no use to their country, and would not be able so efficiently as they had been to discharge their allegiance to the Queen. The Bill took away from them—and especially from absentee landlords, of whom he was one—every inducement to do their duty to their tenantry; and he felt convinced that, if it passed in its present shape, the landlord's power of improving his own property, or the condition of those who lived upon it, would be nil. Having pointed out what were considered to be the defects of the measure, the responsibility of it must be left in other hands. Should he prove a false prophet no one would be more heartily glad than himself, and no one would be more eager and ready to acknowledge it. But he could not help saying he expected serious consequences, which he did not think the Government had adequately estimated, would result from it in the immediate present, and still more so in the future, and only hoped that the worst results of it would not be realized by generations still unborn.

[Second Night.]

LORD WAVENEY said, that the noble Viscount who had just sat down (Viscount Middleton) had expressed his ideas so clearly and explicitly, that, were it not that all faith in modern prophecy had been lost, he (Lord Waveney) should regard with considerable misgivings the future position of Irish landlords under the Bill. Sharing, however, in that want of faith, he was disposed to think the result would be the direct reverse of the anticipation. He desired, at the outset, to enter a strong protest against the principles which some noble Lords had maintained during the discussion, one of which in effect was that landlords ought to be compensated, not merely for loss of wealth and substance, but for deterioration to their social position and power. But landlords possessed all the social and political rights of other members of the community; and, therefore, they had no just ground of complaint on that score. In the next place, it was contended that expropriation would have been a far fairer solution of the admitted evils of the Irish land system than the remedies contained in the proposed measure, and that it would be satisfactory to the landlords, and not in any way dishonourable to them. That was a principle which he indignantly rejected. Their duty was to maintain and make good their position, and to display in that position those qualities which, in the eyes of the world, would warrant and entitle them to fill those stations of exceptional prominence and advantage which they at present possessed. If the Nobles of France—a body much inferior to the Nobles of Ireland—had only recognized that truth, they might have guided the elements which exploded in the frenzy of the French Revolution into a very different channel. He thought, therefore, their Lordships should act in a manner worthy of the best traditions of the landed class, and not imitate that example so disastrous in its results to those concerned. With regard to tenant right, and its existence in Ulster, surely the improving tenant on the small holding on the mountain side had earned something in the nature of that right by his labour, especially in the reclamation of waste land, and the Bill was framed in a spirit of equity with reference to that class of men. What was wanted, in addition, was some help for those who could not by industry take care of themselves. For them the Bill would provide, by the Emigration Clauses, as to which he did not believe it possible that remedial legislation on the subject could be effective without some provision for a well-regulated system of emigration. A map in the Library of the House was shaded so as to show what land in Ireland remained to be reclaimed; but it was hopeless to talk of reclamation of waste lands upon a large scale. The subject was fully discussed in 1847 and 1848, and the schemes then proposed were found to be impracticable. The landlords, no doubt, did make some improvements; but it was the tenants who carried out reclamations, who prepared the soil for the plough, who cleared away the moss and the heather, to enable the land to be tilled by labour, so as to produce the potato crop. He remembered but one period of absolute peace in Ireland; and that was the peace of exhaustion that followed the Famine, when there was a cessation of political and of religious strife. He did not despair of a different peace, for the people of Ireland could not fail to be touched by the patience of this Empire. He had lived long enough in Ireland to know the value of the Ulster tenant right. The noble Lord then traced the origin of the custom, and, continuing, said that the first blow was struck at it when land in Ulster was sold by the Court with those rights which belonged to the tenants. The Ulster tenant right was not understood in England, or in that House as it ought to be, and the more legislation was based on the ideas underlying that custom, the more lasting benefit would it confer on Ireland, and the better it would be for the tenant and the landlord. It was very easy to find fault, but not so easy to suggest a remedy; but, at the same time, he could not conceive any cases in which a remedy could not be supplied by the action of an honest and learned tribunal; and, in his opinion, there was but one cause of regret with respect to the tribunal, and that was that it would probably be insufficient to deal with the infinite number of cases that would be likely to be brought before it, and he should therefore suggest that there should be a larger number of Judges, sufficient for the formation of two Courts, for he believed the questions to be dealt with were too much for the intellect of three men. The Court would, in the first place, have to consider the custom of Ulster, and afterwards the various modifications of that principle that would have to be made in applying it to all parts of the Island; and he trusted that one of the results would be that they would hear less in future of disputes between landlords and tenants. When the occasion arose, however, the people of Ireland had always exhibited great energy, great ability, and great intelligence; and that this Bill would pave the way for national greatness he was firmly convinced. In conclusion, he thanked the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) for not dividing against the Bill, and thus disappointing those who were expecting that the House would be led into committing a mistake at this crisis. They were indebted to the noble Marquess for relieving them from the task of dividing on a measure which ought to be considered independently of Party politics.

Viscount Middleton

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he was glad that no Amendment had been moved to the second reading, because, having taken some part in the discussion of the subject in Ireland, he had promised to give a fair consideration to any measure which might be proposed. That promise he would not depart from; but, at the same time, it was with very great reluctance that he could express any approval of a Bill that was such a wide departure from the principle of freedom of contract. There was no doubt, however, that something was required to be done in Ireland at that moment. The question of legislation had been alluded to over and over again; and it would be perfectly futile now to indulge in any speculation whether, if a stimulus had not been given two or three years ago to agitation on the question of Irish land, some smaller measure might not have met the difficulty. There were very important social questions in Ireland which required that some measures should be adopted by Parliament to settle the Land Question on a secure basis. It was unnecessary to mention the case of many of the landlords. The agitation which had gone on for some time in Ireland had done much harm to trade in Dublin, and had caused a great falling off in the profits of the railways; and the only institutions which had profited from the present state of things were the banks. Having recently come from Ireland to attend these debates, he happened on his journey to meet a professional gentleman of great knowledge and experience in his locality. This gentleman remarked there could be no doubt that there was a great scarcity of money in the country. He (the Earl of Belmore) asked what had become of it. "Oh," was the reply, "it is said that in one of the banks in the town in which I live there is from £200,000 to £300,000 placed to deposit accounts. The farmers will only get 1 per cent interest for this money." This was so much capital withdrawn from the land from a fear that if they invested it in the land it was in danger of being lost in consequence of their not having any security for the retention of their holdings under the present system. The Bill dealt with several matters, and, avoiding details as much as possible, he would make a few remarks on them in the order in which they came in the Bill. The first question was as to the sale of the tenant's interest, or what was called free sale. He was one of those landlords who, to a considerable extent, had not objected to the sale of the tenant's interest. At one time, many years ago, he had attempted to control it. But, finding the responsibility for the acts of his agents too great, and that it was impossible to prevent a larger sum being paid sub rosa, he abandoned all attempt at direct control, only reserving to himself either the indirect control of saying what he would give to the tenant for the power of exercising a veto upon the persons coming into the farm. So long as free sale was not abused, the principle might be defended. There was no doubt that the rent was made more secure by it. But, on the other hand, unlimited free sale was open to much abuse and might prove a great injury to the country. The man giving up his farm was glad to get as much as he could, and the creditors, as well as the landlord, had a better chance of being paid. But the person coming in was placed in a very much better position by restricting free sale. Probably he had borrowed some of the money, and that circumstance would prevent him from stocking his farm. Therefore, the right of the landlord to limit the amount given for the interest in a farm was a salutary one. That right was now practically taken away, and so far the provision dealing with the subject was objectionable. He would admit, however, that according to the definition of the extreme supporters of tenant right in Ireland this Bill did not confer absolutely free sale. The next question was the tenure of the land, and the greatest objection that the tenants had to the present system was that the rent, even under the Bill, might be constantly increased. But, on the other hand, the noble Marquess (the

The Earl of Belmore

Marquess of Salisbury) had described it as a system which would prevent an increase of rent. That was not altogether so; but, practically, the rent could not be increased, except by converting leases for ever into perpetuities, when a small addition to it might be made, or as the value of money fell there might as time went on be some increase. He had lately looked very closely into the system of tenure on his own property from the time of the Plantation, and he found that at one time every holding was let for a longer or shorter term of years. Down to the present century, it was always usual, on granting a lease, to have a small increase of rent. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) had said that the great rise which had taken place in the value of land during the last 100 years, or less, was due partly to tenant right and partly to the tenants' improvements. That, he (the Earl of Belmore) believed, was certainly not the case. In his opinion, while admitting that the rise in the value of land in Ulster had been considerable, he thought it was attributable to the increased value of money compared with the increased value of land, and not to the tenant's improvements or to the tenant right system which prevailed there. He had no faith in the existence of tenants' improvements before the beginning of the present century, and could not, therefore, think that they had been a factor in the increase of the value of land. With regard to tenant right, he found no trace of it until within the last 100 years. Now and then, it was true, he had heard of cases in which sums of money had been given by way of compensation, and those cases, perhaps, contained the germ of tenant right; but the right in its modern form was not known till a more recent period. Of all the questions dealt with by the Bill, the question of rent was the most important to the tenant. That, at least, was his experience, which was fully confirmed by what he had heard at a land meeting at which he had been asked to preside. Comparisons were sometimes made between the rents on English and Irish estates, and a letter on the subject had appeared in an Irish paper by a tenant farmer from Ireland who had visited Gloucestershire. The writer of that letter pointed out that he paid no more than £1 an acre, and the landlord paid the tithe rent-charge; while in Gloucestershire the average rent was £2 an acre, with tithe and taxes that made the rent practically £3. With respect to the Bill before the House, he would say little as to the proposed Court, lest he should travel over a well-beaten path; but, on the whole, he felt confidence in the Commissioners who would be appointed. One of them he scarcely knew at all, but of the others, one was a trained man of business; while the position and ability of the Judicial Commissioner were guarantees that he would be an impartial Judge. Some people thought that there should be five Commissioners; but he thought that three was a better number. He had always been favourable to some form of arbitration, but could not approve of the establishment of arbitrators in the shape of the Land Court, and he was in hopes that in Committee their Lordships would so amend the Bill as to make it less objectionable than it was at present. The clauses of the Bill that most excited his sympathy were those by which it was intended to make tenants landed proprietors, and he should even have preferred to trust solely to them as a remedy for the present grievances, and to have altogether omitted the other parts of the Bill. No doubt, a great difference of opinion existed on the subject, some maintaining that the sales made under the Church Temporalities Commissioners had resulted in a complete success, while the Returns issued for the county of Armagh favoured the contrary view. Failures there certainly had been in some instances; but the glebe lands were just those where the most unsuitable tenants for the experiment would be found: for the clergyman of former days had not even a life interest, and was not generally an improving landlord; so long as he could get a moderate profit, and live in peace with his tenants, he was satisfied. But, in spite of that fact, he was very glad that the Peasant Proprietary Clauses found a place in the Bill, and he looked to them to counteract the ill-effects of some of its other provisions. It had been contended that the Emigration Clauses would probably be useless and inoperative, and perhaps the experiment might have been tried on a larger scale; but a very considerable emigration would always be going on whenever there was a time of agricultural depression. A Northern public officer—whose office caused him to be a good authority—was of opinion that when this Bill came into operation and creditors had something tangible to sell, so many tenants were weighed down with debt, that it was probable that emigration would be more considerable than ever. In the way of enabling those who were so situated to sell out and emigrate, he thought those clauses would do some good. Amendments to the Bill would, of course, be proposed in Committee; but there was only one point to which he wished to call attention—namely, with regard to those landlords in Ulster who had bought up the tenant right on their estates. The Prime Minister had denied that there were any such cases; but when he moved his Amendment, having for its object the protection of those landlords who had so acted, he should be able to prove their existence, and would support his views by evidence of their actual number. In conclusion, he must say that his own idea with regard to Ireland was that matters would never prosper there until all parties agreed to leave agitation alone. And he said this with the more confidence, because it was true.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have two reasons for asking your Lordships' indulgence on this occasion. One will be obvious to your Lordships. It is that it is necessary for me to explain the causes which have led me, from a sense of duty, to accept my share of the responsibility for the introduction of this measure. The other is because, in the course of this debate, frequent reference has been made to speeches delivered by me, when I was under no official responsibility, in the year 1870. Some explanation is due to your Lordships, after what has been said with reference to those speeches, of the view which I take of the present position of affairs in Ireland, as compared with that of the year 1870. My Lords, I should like, at the outset, to say a few words as to the principles which I conceive to be fundamental necessity. I agree to any such legislation I think there is a necessity for which I see no other remedy—th at least, none so likely to be effectual as t) a Bill of this kind. Now, my Lords, I have done with my own speeches, and I ask you to consider what are the real conditions of this question. Before endeavouring to state them, I will allude, for a moment, to the strange alarms which have been introduced in the course of this debate about the possible consequences of this measure in England. Now, I am quite content to look that suggestion in the face, and to say openly and distinctly that, if there were like circumstances in England, I should loyally agree to similar measures. So far from thinking that any wrong or injustice would be caused, I, as a landlord, although not a large one, should think such legislation under such circumstances altogether to my interest, as well as to the interest of the tenant. I think this is a case in which one cannot do wrong in trying to imagine oneself in the position of an Irish landlord. Remember the circumstances under which the legislation takes place, and say in your conscience whether you would think yourself wronged by such a Bill. I can say with a clear conscience that I should not think myself wronged. On the contrary, I should think the Bill at least as beneficial to myself and to my own class as to the class of tenants. But the real truth is, that the same circumstances do not exist in England, and the tenants desire similar measures at least as little as the landlords. Speaking for myself, in the last few years I should have been very far indeed from alarmed if a fair rent had been fixed upon my land by an independent and competent tribunal, and if the tenantry had been fastened to the land on those terms, at all events for 15 years. But now, my Lords, what are the leading facts which we must keep in mind when approaching this question in connection with Ireland? In England the persons engaged in agriculture as occupying tenants are 1 in 59; in Ireland they are 1 in 9. The difference between those figures shows the dependence of the people of Ireland upon agriculture as, practically, their sole means of living, in contrast to those other means of living and sources of prosperity which the people of England possess. With regard to the holdings, the contrast, at first sight, does not seem equally great, because in England 59 acres, on an average, go to a holding; while in Ireland, if you include all the great grazing farms, 27 acres form the average, a disparity, however, still very great, even if no deduction were made for those great grazing farms. In Ireland nearly half of the whole number of holdings throughout the country are under 15 acres, and nearly two-thirds are not above £10 valuation. Even in the most prosperous part of the country—Ulster—the proportion is practically the same. I do not want to dwell upon some other factors in the question; but they are not without importance in considering the difference between England and Ireland. In England, the great proprietors commonly reside upon their estates; in Ireland they commonly do not. Do not let it be supposed that I wish to do injustice to that class of Irish proprietors. For the most part they have been very liberal to their tenants, although I know that there are some resident proprietors who are equally so. But the fact that so very great a proportion of the land of Ireland is in the hands of large proprietors who do not reside upon their estates, and that those estates are, and must be, managed by agents who can never be to the tenants what resident proprietors might, necessarily introduces a different system of treatment, and produces very different relations between the owners of property in Ireland from those which are prevalent in this country, where large proprietors do, as a rule, reside on their estates. Then, my Lords, there is another circumstance never to be forgotten in estimating the social conditions under which we have to legislate for land in Ireland, and that is, that while from the causes which I have mentioned there is a considerable loss of useful moral and social influence on the part of the landlords, on the other hand, those same landlords are, for the most part, of a religion different from that of their tenants, and thus there is an unfortunate absence of the sympathies which arise from community of religious belief; and the people are, for the most part, under the influence of a clergy who are not directly connected with or interested in the land. I refer to these matters because they appear to me to show the peculiar conditions under which we have to legislate on this question. I would ask your Lordships, can you separate the interest of the landlord from that of the tenant? Can anyone in this House maintain that it is for the interest of the landlord more than for that of the tenant that there should be chronic antagonism between them, mutual opposition, and if not mutual suspicion, yet at least suspicion and distrust on the part of the more numerous and less educated — when taken individually the weaker class, but when taken together, under the influence of combination, by no means the weaker? My Lords, I wish to look at this question, in the first place, from what I will call the landlord's point of view, as I understand it. I say, then, that the value of the landlord's interest depends upon the tenantry at least as much as upon the title which the law gives him to the land. Without an occupying tenantry his land would be valueless to him, and any policy which did not regard as common the interest and prosperity of both, and aim at such an adjustment of their relations as may give them some chance of living on good and cordial terms together, must be at least as ruinous to the landlord as to the tenant. I own I was surprised at something which fell from the noble Marquess on my left (the Marquess of Salisbury) last night, and which, in my judgment, was as great a fallacy and as great an error as could possibly be put into words. The sentence, which I took down, was this—“Whenever large advantages are given to the tenant they must be taken from the landlord.” That I utterly and positively deny. An opinion more unfounded and more contrary to a true conception of the interests of both landlord and tenant cannot, I think, be imagined. The more prosperous a tenant is the better will be his relations with his landlord, and the better is the value of the landlord's interest secured; and unless you show that you directly take from the landlord something which is his and give it to the tenant, then I say the more advantages you can confer upon the tenant, the more benefits you also confer upon the landlord. What, my Lords, under the present state of things is the value of the landlord's interest? What are those rights we are supposed to deprive him of over his tenants? We are supposed to be depriving him of his right of eviction, and to be destroying the freedom of contract. But do these things exist at the present moment? What is the benefit of the power of eviction if, when you have evicted the tenant, you can get nobody to take the land, no one daring to do so? What is the benefit of taking land into your own hands, without the means of hiring labour for its cultivation in a free market? If a moral force comes between the landlord and the class on which he depends for his prosperity, puts them at arm's length, and takes away the possibility of the land being let or profitably cultivated, of what good is your cherished right and power? What is the meaning of power, if you have to face combinations and the result of combinations such as that produced by the present agitation? There is not an Irish landlord in this House who will not say—“If this state of state of things is to continue, the value of our property is gone.” Well, our object is, as far as possible, to put an end to that state of things, and by devising the best means—those most likely, as we think, to work permanently and justly—to secure and maintain the value of the landlord's interest as much as that of the tenant. If there is any other way to bring about that result, it has not yet been stated. It may be asked—indeed, it is often said—“Why do you not enforce the law?” No one is more sensible than I am that it is our duty to do the utmost in our power to maintain and enforce the law. But your Lordships know the old maxim—Quid leges sine moribus? You know very well the state of things which exists when it is necessary to put all the powers of the law, and even exceptional laws, in force—when the moral bonds of society are strained to the utmost. I should like to know, if the law were enforced to the uttermost, as I should desire it to be, what the value of the landlord's property would be, if the masses remain, reasonably or unreasonably, in a chronic state of alienation towards the landlords, of hostility against the law, of virtual partnership in things which the law ought to put down? If that is the state of feeling which is engendered among the tenantry, do you think that by evicting every tenant and putting the landlord in possession of the land, and by the strong arm of soldiery or police everywhere putting down disturbance, you could maintain or restore the value of the landlord's property? Do you think that the mere exertion of overwhelming force could restore the relations which ought to exist between landlord and tenant? Do you think you can thus overcome the rooted opposition of these large classes, if you do nothing to conciliate that opposition? Can you make them take the land? Can you even make them labour on it if you take it into your own hands? In whatever degree you may be able to work against those difficulties, and encounter them, and partially counteract them, is there really any Irish landlord in this House who will seriously say that, on the hypothesis of a chronic abnormal straining of the law, the pecuniary and moral value of the landlord's property will be greater, or that his position will be better than it will be under the provisions of the Bill, provided the Bill comes into operation and works? I believe your Lordships have recognized the truth upon this subject, for that is the reason why, although this measure is denounced as revolutionary and Communist, and as an act of confiscation and injustice to the landlord, not one of your Lordships proposes that it should be thrown out. Apart from any question of the effect of a Dissolution of Parliament, or other political complications, those who so speak do not desire that the state of things which I have described should subsist, and they know that it would subsist if the Bill were thrown out. I will ask your Lordships to permit me to read a significant question and answer with which I was a good deal struck in the evidence before the Bessborough Commission. The evidence is that of a Galway landowner, Mr. O'Flaherty, who seemed to have a great dislike to any legislation of this kind. He was asked this question—"Is not the tenant of a farm more or less at the mercy of the landlord?" I suppose the question had reference to one of the points that are often made about the absence of freedom of contract, when the power of the landlord is too much for the tenant. Mr. O'Flaherty's answer was this, and to my mind it is very true and significant—

The Lord Chancellor

[Second Night.]

"Upon my word, I think that the balance is very little in favour of the landlord, supposing that a crisis like this comes, which every man of ordinary sagacity might foresee. I think the landlord is in the worst position of the two."

My Lords, I am afraid that our experience of this crisis justifies that opinion; and what I ask your Lordships to believe, and what I think I can clearly establish, is that this crisis is not of a factitious kind, got up by a mere unscrupulous agitation like that of the Irish Land League, but is a crisis which—as Mr. O'Flaherty said—"every man of ordinary sagacity might foresee." What, my Lords, is the history of this crisis, of which we have heard something from the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough)? I must carry the answer a little further back than the occurrences of the last two or three years which were adverted to by the noble Duke. There has been in Ireland a long-standing conflict between legal theory and practical status, just one of those conflicts between facts and law which, whenever they occur, lead to inconvenient political consequences, and require adjustments which, in ordinary circumstances, might not be justifiable. I am not going further back in illustration of this than the year 1860, when that remarkable Act of Parliament was passed which enacted that from that time contract, and not tenure, should be the basis of landed property in Ireland. My Lords, it was something like what I remember at the time of the Crimean War. There was a squib published in the shape of an Act of Parliament supposed to have been passed, which declared that a certain newspaper should have authority to take the city of Sebastopol, and that from the time when that newspaper should announce the capture of Sebastopol, it should be and be deemed to have been captured to all intents and purposes whatsoever. The Act of 1860, declaring that land should be held by contract and not by tenure, when, in fact, it was held by tenure and not by contract, attempted an impossibility. Only 10 years passed, and in 1870 the tenour, though not the letter, of that legislation was reversed. The Act of 1870 established the Ulster Custom, which is surely tenure and not contract. It was, however, so established as to leave it vague and indefinite. I do not know of any inadvertence, nor do I know that the Act of 1870 did not accomplish the purposes intended to be carried out by it. But it had undoubtedly some effects which were not foreseen, as it was a measure which did not work out its own principles to such a point as distinctly to separate the interests which it recognized from those which previously existed independently of law. It has, in consequence, been productive of much friction, much irritation, much unsettle-

The Lord Chancellor

ment, and a sense of insecurity. I was struck with two things which were said yesterday—the first by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, who said that, in the case of the Ulster Custom, there was always the absolute power of the landlord in the background to raise the rent. But that is the very thing which has created nine-tenths of the irritation—I am now speaking of Ulster. The people have felt that by the legislation of 1870 you recognized rights, not defining them, but leaving them liable to be indefinitely taken away, whether by intentional encroachment or otherwise, to what extent is not material. They felt that they were liable to have their rights diminished and encroached upon by the exercise, unlimited and uncontrolled, of the landlord's power to raise the rent, which, consistently with the custom, he was entitled to do. As a matter of fact there has been, and is now, in the Province of Ulster, whether or not the landlords have used that power unjustly, a great amount of uneasiness, dissatisfaction, and sense of insecurity. The other remark with which I was struck was made by the noble Earl who was lately Governor General of India (the Earl of Lytton). The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) also referred to it in his speech. The remark was, that when you turn customs not recognized by law into legal rights, you infallibly change their nature, and immediately give them a character, in relation to all other pre-existing rights, which they did not possess before. My Lords, that was the inevitable effect of the operation, which, nevertheless, may have been just and necessary. We know that eminent Conservatives, like the late Lord Mayo and others, pressed for a recognition by law of the Ulster Custom long before it was established by law in 1870; and the moment it was so established, the relative position of the parties was changed, and tenant right, which had been tolerated and endured when the custom was not legal, and which then depended only on the good feeling and sense of justice of the landlords, acquired a different position when it became a legal right as much as the rights of the landlord. But what actually occurred? It was in Ulster, if anywhere, that this land movement began. It is the greatest error in the world to say that the state of things with which we have now to deal is due to the Land League. The Land League was its effect, not its cause. The Land League would never have had the power which it has acquired if it had not found, as materials to work upon, the previous state of feeling and opinion, the previous demand for legislative change, which existed before the Land League, and nowhere more prominently than in Ulster. The significance and importance of this fact are, that if any part of Ireland can be called prosperous it is Ulster; if any part is loyal it is Ulster; if any part is more difficult than another to draw into the vortex of disaffection, it is Ulster. Yet in Ulster this desire for change was originally strongest, because of the feeling, or fear, that the landlord's power to raise the rent might be exercised so as to transfer to the landlord the rights of the tenant; and in that province there grew up a series of Tenant Right Associations for the very purpose of obtaining a better and stricter definition of the rights which, in 1870, had been conceded to the tenants, and which Associations were founded upon the notion that this power of the landlord was one which might be exercised at any time and by anybody. I have never resided much in Ireland, but I can speak upon one point with some slight degree of personal experience. I am not an Irish landlord; but, in the year 1875, I was invited to accept the office of Master of one of the great City Companies, which has a large estate in the county of Londonderry. It had been the practice on that estate, from the time when it came into the Company's own hands, that there should be a re-valuation and a reasonable increase of rent every 20 years. It so happened that one of those terms of 20 years expired while I was Master of the Company. I need hardly say, that the Company desired to behave justly, and not to raise the rent any more than they thought was right. Well, the tenants combined together and resisted. They obtained the services of a Belfast lawyer, who harangued the tenants in the square. We did all we could to consider what was represented to us, and we made a considerable reduction from the original proposal. What did the tenants do then? They still declined to agree to it. Then, other deductions were made, and at last they agreed, with difficulty, to an extremely moderate increase of rent—

[Second Night.]

I think not as much as one-third of what was originally proposed. All this process was attended with constant anxiety, if not danger, and I had that experience long before this Bill was thought of. I came, in my own mind, to the conclusion expressed by a gentleman who acted on that occasion as the Company's solicitor, in the evidence which I see he gave before the Bessborough Commission, that it would be a most happy thing for all parties if there could be a Court to settle such land disputes, and so provide the means of diminishing friction between landlord and tenant. I have hitherto been speaking of the North. As to the South and West, I should like to refer to a passage, not in the evidence of the Bessborough Commission, but in the preliminary Report of Professor Baldwin and Mr. C. Robertson, the Assistant Commissioners appointed by the Commission presided over by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) dated on the 1st of January, 1880. I beg your Lordships to observe the date. It was before the change of Government; it was before the Land League had attained to any very formidable dimensions. No persons could be more competent than those two Assistant Commissioners. Professor Baldwin had filled positions, both in England and in Ireland, of the highest public importance in connection both with practical and with scientific agriculture. He told the Bessborough Commission that for the last 16 years he had annually visited every county in Ireland, and that he had personally examined and inspected every holding of which he spoke. This is what he and Mr. Robertson said in their preliminary Report—

“Finding so many of the small farmers of the South and West steeped in debt, misery, and poverty, while their lands are undrained and neglected, we asked why they did not adopt better systems of farming? Thousands upon thousands of them could easily double their incomes by the exercise of skill. We have travelled through entire districts without seeing any men at work in the digging of the ground before the winter's frost, or in preparing the land as it ought to be prepared at this season for the coming crops. But the answer to our appeals on both matters was the same; it affords evidence of a conviction which is deeply engraved on the minds of this class—namely, that if they made improvements the rents would be immediately raised in consequence of those improvements. Now, whatever view be taken of this subject, the feeling remains all the same in the minds of these small farmers, and it is strongest in the most backward and most densely populated districts, and on the estates of land jobbers, and on those of a few absentees and other landlords who do not take the necessary personal interest in the management of their properties. This feeling would appear to have crushed all spirit of progress and improvement out of the minds of these poor people. In the whole range of the heads of our inquiry this is the most delicate and difficult subject. It is as significant as it is suggestive, that several large landed proprietors in different parts of the country have drawn our attention to the existence of this feeling, and made to us statements which, if true, would fully justify it.”

I must say that I cannot concur in the sweeping denunciations made by my noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) of the evidence before the Bessborough Commission. I think his criticism missed its mark. It might have been to the purpose if it had been the main question whether, in particular cases where accusations were made against particular landlords, the facts might not have been misrepresented or misunderstood. I have no doubt they often were; and that in other cases there may have been something to be considered on both sides. But it is impossible to evade the force of this fact, that the Commissioners received an enormous mass of evidence, not only from small farmers, but from large tenants and land agents, and also from landlords, which if it did not prove many actual instances of oppression and unreasonable increase of rent, at least all tended in one direction—that there is a feeling of distrust, anxiety, and agitation among the tenants on this question. All these witnesses proved, beyond a doubt, that widespread feeling of distrust and uneasiness, the effect of which is to make this large and indispensable class of people, the small farmers—the real cultivators of the land—ready to be the victims of agitation, and to be drawn into combinations dangerous to themselves, to the landlords, and to the State. I think, therefore, I am perfectly right in stating that the Land League is the effect of this state of things, and not the cause; and if you want to get rid of such effects you must address yourselves to the cause, and you must endeavour to place the system of land tenure in Ireland on such a basis as will, so far as the law can, meet these causes, and provide, at least, for a better definition of the mutual rights of the different classes. With all the facts, the Evidence, and the Reports that were before us, with the admission, on the cardinal point as to rent, by the majority as well as the minority of the Commission presided over by the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, that a case was made out for some kind of public arbitration, and that there was reason to believe that the intervention of a Court for that purpose would be acceptable to a large proportion of the land owners in Ireland—I ask what were we to do? Nobody ventures to say we were to do nothing. We anxiously considered what we ought to do, and we endeavoured to get all the help we could from others. There has been a series of philippics composed by an eloquent writer for the Landlord's Committee in Dublin, the echoes of which have been frequently heard in the course of this debate. I rather think I saw one of them, which contains citations from various speeches by myself and my Colleagues, in the hands of the noble Duke who spoke lately (the Duke of Marlborough). I have read those philippics with some degree of admiration for the literary power exhibited in them; but I have failed to find anything practical in them beyond the assumption that this Bill is utterly wrong. There is nothing in them suggesting what ought to be done. If the Landlords' Committee really meant anything by this flood of eloquence, what was it? Do they truly think that nothing ought to be done? That does not seem to me to be the opinion which has been expressed in this debate even by those who have found most fault with the Bill. But if the Government have taken the wrong way, what is the right way? We did not make the state of things which we find. ["Oh!"] Well, let it be supposed, for the sake of argument, that, at one time or another, we did not do something that we might have done, and that we are to that extent to blame—what I say is that we are not responsible for the state of things I have described, which has been going on almost ever since the Land Act of 1870 was passed. We are not responsible for the Ulster Tenant-right Associations, nor for the origin of the Land League, which was in existence in the time of the late Government. The state of things to which this Bill is addressed existed independently of us, and we had the duty of dealing with it. A more difficult and anxious duty we could not have had; but we could not avoid that duty. The Bill shows our idea of the right way of dealing with it. I own I heard with regret some of the things that were said by way of criticism by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne). The noble Marquess always speaks well, and perhaps he never spoke better, as far as oratorical or logical power is concerned, than he did last night; but there were some things he said in criticizing the measure which I think were scarcely worthy of him. The noble Marquess possesses all the qualities of a statesman; but I must own that he said some things in that criticism which might have been more worthy of a spoilt child. I refer, among other things, to what he said as to its being a mere play on words to talk of distinctions between "perpetuity," "durability," and "security" of tenure. I think these distinctions are of exceeding great importance. Neither can I think it was altogether fair and reasonable to represent the difference between the proposals of this Bill and the common conception of the "three F's" as one which did not deceive anybody. Those remarks did not appear to me to be worthy of the ability of my noble Friend. I think the differences are exceedingly great. And now I proceed to give my idea of the proposals of this Bill and their justification. I agree with those who put the question of the adjustment of rent by the Court first; everything else depends upon that. If anything is to be done, that must be done. But I do not think it can be said that a fair rent is unfair merely because it happens to come under the head of one of the three "F's." This "F," if you succeed in fixing it, is just to the landlord as well as to the tenant. It will be arrived at after due consideration of all the circumstances of the case. In reference to this point my Friend the noble Duke who spoke first this evening said something which, I confess, struck me with surprise. He found fault with the Government for having omitted in the House of Commons, as if it were to the detriment of the landlord to do so, all attempt to define a fair rent or to indicate certain considerations which were to be elements in that definition. But I really thought that the change which omitted those attempts at definition or those indications had been made at least as much at the instance of the Conservatives as of any others. I believe that those critics who objected to the original provision were right. If you have a tribunal capable of acting as a judicial board of arbitrators, it is much better that the clause should stand as at present—that regard should be had to the interest of the landlord and the tenant, and to all the circumstances of the case the holding, and the district, for the very reason which the noble Duke urged in favour of the Act of 1870—that it adapted itself to all the varieties of circumstances. A fair rent fixed under these conditions by a competent tribunal will take into account all the varieties of circumstances affecting either party upon which the rent ought to depend. For instance, if the landlord has made the improvements, or has bought up the Ulster Custom, or has managed his estate upon the English system, the rent will be settled according to those circumstances. And so, whatever circumstances exist which may tend to vary the fair rent in the particular case, under the clause as it stands all those circumstances will be taken into account; and the only question material to the point is this—can you trust your public arbitrators? I think you can. To me it does not appear that the settlement of the rent in that way by capable persons, with proper assistance, is very difficult. We know very well that, in all arbitrations, each party states his claim; and the practical result is that something is arrived at which may be more or less favourable to the one or the other, but which fits the circumstances of the case better than if it were left to either of the parties to dictate his own terms. I believe the thing is done constantly in Ireland and elsewhere, and done properly. Certainly, upon the evidence both of the Duke of Richmond's and of Lord Bessborough's Commission, many persons of all classes in Ireland, landlords, land-agents, large as well as small farmers, and many who unite in themselves more than one of those characters, and who are not the partisans of the tenant only, are of that opinion. I come next to the statutory conditions, which seem to me to be at least as beneficial to both parties as any other kind of lease can be, and to provide for the renewal of the term, not with the same rent, but with a re-adjustment of the rent, so that it may be increased from time to time if it ought to be increased, and diminished if it ought to be diminished. Those conditions do not disregard the position of the landlord; they do not seem to me to reduce him, more than a lease does, to a mere rent-charger; they leave him very substantial rights and the power of periodical re-valuation of rent. But if you are to adjust the rent at all by a judicial tribunal or arbitration, you must secure the right to hold the land at the rent which you so adjust. That is an absolutely necessary consequence of any such adjustment. You may secure it for 15 years or some other period, but some recognized term you must have. How does this injure the landlord, unless eviction for its own sake, and not security for his interest upon proper terms, were his object? Witness after witness, of the landlord class, from all parts of Ireland, told the Bessborough Commission that on his own estates, and on others generally which he knew, there was practically fixity of tenure; that the same tenants and the same families go on holding the land without disturbance, from generation to generation, as long as they pay their rent. So far, therefore, as fixity of tenure is concerned, this Bill does but give definition and security to what is already the general custom and practice. And now I pass to the subject of free sale. With regard to it I deny that under the provisions of this Bill there is any ground whatever for saying that the tenant is enabled to sell, either in Ulster, or in places where no Ulster Custom prevails, what is the landlord's or is taken from the landlord. I deny that it will diminish in any degree whatever the rights of the landlord or the value of the interest he possesses. I should never agree to such a proposal. I adhere to what I said in 1870, that to extend the Ulster Custom, or to do anything else in such a way as to take the landlord's interest from him, and give it to the tenant, would, in my opinion, require compensation. But nothing of the kind appears to me to be either contemplated or done by the permission to sell in this Bill. And if the rights of the landlord are not really diminished by this permission of free sale, I do not see how it can be a subject for compensation. What does the tenant sell? He sells his own interest in his own improvements, those which were not made by the landlord, and over and above that he sells the goodwill of his tenancy as a going agricultural concern. That goodwill, in the actual circumstances of Ireland, is a most real element in the value of the interest which the tenant sells, for if a new tenant entered without the goodwill, in the literal sense, of the old, there is no question that his holding might be most insecure and even dangerous. There is also another sense of the word goodwill, in which it also represents that which belongs to the tenant, but which the landlord would never, in any way, realize—I mean that fluctuating difference of value between the rent for the time being and what a person would give to succeed to the position of tenant, under all its actual conditions, a person desirous of land as a means of living in Ireland. Now, both these—the goodwill of the holding and the value of the improvements—are things which in no sense belong to the landlord, in a country where it has never been the practice to put an end to tenancies for the purpose of re-letting farms by auction. This which the tenant has to sell—unless you insist on keeping it unsaleable in his hands—is a thing which the landlord never had and never could have. It is only valuable at all as being valuable to the tenant. If the landlord wants to resume, when he may resume, or to exercise the right of pre-emption, which he is in all cases to have, the Court is to determine, not what the tenant could possibly get in the market; but what is the fair value of the holding as between the landlord and the tenant; and another provision of the Bill is that if the Court is resorted to to fix the rent, it may also fix, as between landlord and tenant, the selling value of the tenancy. The fear that a power of alienation, guarded by these conditions, and by the other conditions of the 1st clause, will diminish the value of the landlord's property, appears to me to be entirely groundless. With regard to the economical objection, the experience of the Ulster Custom furnishes a practical answer. It is said that the clause will take away or encroach upon the power of the landlord to raise his rent; but the power of sale is in all cases subject to the landlord's right to a fair rent, which cannot properly be increased or diminished by the value either of the tenant's improvements, or of his goodwill. On many of the best managed estates in the South and West of Ireland, and elsewhere out of Ulster, the practice of permitting sale does already exist; and as long as that is the state of things, how can you expect to settle the question, if, on one of two adjoining estates, the right of sale belongs to the tenant, and on the other does not belong to him? To give the tenant terms of tenure which are of a substantial marketable value, and yet to lock up that value from him by prohibiting him from carrying it to a market sufficiently free to ascertain and realize that value, would leave the whole settlement which we are attempting to make unsatisfactory and incomplete. Then you also have these incidental advantages, which seem to me very considerable. You have a security for his rent to the landlord, and also security that when there is a change of tenant the new tenant comes in without the risk of disturbance. You have security against that great danger to the State and to society in Ireland, and to both landlord and tenant, which drives the landlord to the necessity of eviction, instead of allowing this natural and easy safety-valve of sale. Taking the view I do of the intention, the nature, and the probable effect of the provisions of this Bill, I hold that there is no case for compensation. What is the loss to be compensated? If you compare the state of things under this Bill with that which would exist if nothing of the kind were done, the Bill may be expected to restore and increase, not diminish, the value of the landlord's property. And if the work of the Bill is frustrated by combination or otherwise, at least things will not be worse than they are now. I have now explained the view I take of the principles of the Bill, in common with the other Members of Her Majesty's Government, whose intentions I am sure I have correctly stated, and I reserve the details for another stage of your Lordships' deliberations. I confess that though our position has been both difficult and anxious, and though it is not without extreme reluctance that I, for one, recognize the necessity for any measure of this kind, yet, in some respects, I prefer our position to that of the Opposition. There are some privileges of Opposition which I admire more than I envy. To denounce and at the same time support a measure—to recognize the necessity for a thing which must be done, and yet to empty all the vials of vituperation upon the responsible Government for recognizing the same necessity—to prophecy every possible failure and evil, while you admit that there is no escape from the necessity before you—these are privileges which I admire rather than envy. I am glad, however, that the conclusion of the Opposition has been what it is, because I think no one would like to be responsible for the government of Ireland, if the present state of things were to continue. It is admitted that a serious attempt must be made to supply a permanent remedy to this state of things, and no one has suggested any other remedy that can be applied if the present measure is rejected. I do not rely much on prophecy; but I prefer, if I must prophecy, to be a prophet of good. Bishop Butler said that nations, as well as individuals, are sometimes liable to paroxysms of insanity. I am afraid that saying is true, and that Ireland has lately been passing through such a paroxysm. But national insanity is, happily, not permanent. The real interests of men are not promoted by it; all classes suffer from it; and, therefore, if a measure of this kind is passed, with the generous, though it may be reluctant, concurrence of those whose power and sentiment it in some degree affects, I cannot but think that happier prospects are before us. Beyond all question, it must improve the moral position of the Government for the necessary enforcement of law. Beyond all question, it will secure the loyalty of Ulster, that great and most important part of Ireland, and prevent it from being drawn into the vortex of turbulence and outrage. And I cannot but hope that, recognizing, as this Bill does, the real value of the rights of the tenant without taking the substance of any right from the landlord, recognizing the principle that the interests of both classes are inseparable from each other, and that the common prosperity of both is necessary for the prosperity of either—it will be accepted and operate as a measure destined to have a healing and beneficial effect in all parts of Ireland.

The Lord Chancellor

[Second Night.]

[Second Night.]

EARL CAIRNS: My Lords, I do not, I think, misinterpret your Lordships' desire when I say that it is your wish that the discussion on this stage of the Bill should shortly come to a close.

The Lord Chancellor

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I shall not stand long in the way of that conclusion, and I am the more easily able to do that from the state of the debate up to the present time. We have had a number of speeches, and we have had criticisms of very great weight upon this Bill. I will not speak of the speeches delivered on this side of the House; but I must be permitted to say that we have heard two speeches on the other side of the House—one from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) yesterday, and which I think my noble and learned Friend who has just sat down hardly spoke of in the way that I should have expected, and another from the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) at the beginning of the discussion to-night. I venture to say that two speeches more remarkable, more interesting, more distinguished for the accuracy of their facts, and for the cogency of their arguments, never were delivered in this House. When I look for the argument on the other side, I feel great difficulty as to where I can find it. I certainly have been able to find very few arguments in the speech of my noble and learned Friend, and from him, if arguments were to be produced, I should expect them to come. My noble and learned Friend began by saying that instances of the most violent interference with property and tenure could easily be pointed out analogous to or even stronger than this Bill. But the only instance he gave us was the case of the zemindars of India. I was astonished at his speaking of the tax-gatherers of India, who had not been owners of property, and whose acts on property had to be restrained, as if their case was to be adduced as analogous to that of the owners of property in Ireland. I agree with my noble and learned Friend that there are great emergencies when State interference, even of a violent kind, may take place with private property; no one doubted that. But upon what terms? I will refer to what my noble and learned Friend said in 1870. He said—

“I shall not go into the argument of that subject, because that point was exhausted by the head of the Government when he spoke of fixity of tenure, which, in plain English, means taking away the property of one man and giving it to another. My right hon. Friend said that, according to the principles of justice, if we transferred property in that way, we must pay for it.”—[3. Hansard, cxcix. 1666.]

My noble and learned Friend further made use of an argument at which I was much surprised, as I thought it a dangerous argument to use. He said—"You talk of the rights of which this Bill deprives the landlords, their rights of eviction, and other rights of that kind. But what is the use," he asked, "of those powers now? Can the landlords evict tenants from their property, and if they can, do they get anyone to take possession of the property?" My Lords, what does that mean? It appears to me to mean this. That the Government, who exist for the purpose of protecting and enforcing rights of property, may act in a manner which is virtually an abnegation of that duty; may tolerate and support, if they do not encourage, agitation; and may then come to Parliament and say—"The rights of property, which we were appointed to maintain, we have not maintained. They have disappeared, and because through our action they have disappeared, we now ask Parliament to complete that which has been commenced, and solemnly to declare that those rights no longer exist." But I think, instead of following my noble and learned Friend into the long history of the causes which, in his opinion, justified the introduction of this Bill, it would be better that I should for a short time refer to what this Bill actually proposes to do. There are two parts of the measure which I look upon with great satisfaction, though I regret that they do not go far enough. The first of these relates to emigration. With regard to this, I have to say that I am not an advocate for indiscriminate emigration from Ireland, for there is the better class of tenants, the more thrifty and industrious, whom I should be very sorry to see emigrating from the country. But there is the poorer class, especially in the South and West, with regard to whom it is quite true to say that if the State were to-morrow to make them a present of their holdings, that act of generosity would not do them the least good. With regard to that part of the tenantry of Ireland, it would be a very good thing for themselves and for the country if they could emigrate to lands where they would be much happier, where their holdings would be larger, and where they could exist in comfort, and perhaps in plenty. But I look upon what this Bill proposes I am greatly disappointed. The Bill was introduced, in the first instance, without any limit whatever; and now I find a provision in it limiting the whole expenditure on emigration to £200,000, to be spread over three years, and enacting that only one-third of that sum shall be spent in any one year. Anyone who knows what is the normal emigration from Ireland—which is something like 100,000 a-year—will see that that sum will not do more than add 3 per cent to the present normal number of emigrants. The truth is, that this scheme of emigration will be of little practical use beyond this—that it testifies that it is right and proper, in the opinion of Parliament, that assistance should be given for the purpose of promoting emigration. Now I come to the other of the two proposals to which I have referred. It is the proposal with regard to purchase. I have always been a very strong advocate of the purchase of holdings by tenants in Ireland, and I supported a proposal to that effect in 1870; but I am greatly disappointed when I see the very persons who formerly were the greatest advocates of proposals of this kind now holding back from supporting the proposal and attempting to limit it. The "Purchase Clauses" of the Act of 1870 were very properly called "The Bright Clauses;" and, if I do not mistake, some few years ago Mr. Bright made a speech in which he said that he had a scheme by which he would turn every occupier of land in Ireland at once into an owner, making him pay his purchase money by the payment of an annual instalment, which would be something more than the rent which he would have been in the habit of paying. But, if I understand the views of Mr. Bright now, he thinks it would be a very bad thing that a very rapid or large transmutation of the tenants of Ireland into holders of land should take place, and, in accordance with that view, the present Bill is limited in a very remarkable manner. How are the Purchase Clauses of this measure to operate? There is a power given to the Land Commission to purchase estates for the purpose of re-selling them to the tenants, and there is no limit to the amount of money with which they may be supplied. So far, all is well. Then the direction to the Land Commission is this—that they may buy an estate where they find a competent number of tenants willing to become purchasers of their holdings. If you stopped there, I think it would be a very wholesome power to give to the Land Commission. But superadded to that there is a clause of a most extraordinary kind. The 23rd clause says—

“A competent number of tenants means a body of tenants, who are not less in numbers than three-fourths of the whole number of tenants on the estate, and who pay in rent not less than two-thirds of the whole rent of the estate.”

Now, what chance is there of a scheme of that kind working? How can you expect to find so large a number of tenants as three-fourths of the whole number ready and willing beforehand to purchase their holdings without even knowing what the purchase money will be? There are many estates in Ireland with 100 or 150 agricultural tenants, on which there is a hamlet with about as many tenants with small houses and small patches of land. These latter tenants will not want to purchase; and, if they did, they are not the class you want to purchase. Yet they will swell the number of tenants, and perhaps render it impossible that the necessary majority willing to purchase can be made up. I mention this to the Government, therefore, and earnestly entreat them, if they do not wish these clauses to fail, to adopt one of two courses—to consider whether they would not be content to leave it to the Land Commission to decide what, in each case, should constitute a competent number, or, if not, to say that if one-half of the tenants display a willingness to purchase, that shall justify the purchase. But I pass from that to make a few observations on that great division of the Bill which has been most subjected to criticism. My noble and learned Friend who spoke last was not at all pleased with the language which has been used with regard to this Bill. He says that the vocabulary of vituperation has been poured out upon it, that it has been spoken of as confiscation, and other things, which, to his ears, are vexing. Well, my Lords, I am not going to use any language which would deserve the character or have the appearance of that vituperation which my noble and learned Friend so much deprecates; but I wish to quote some language in which I must express my concurrence, and which comes from a quarter which my noble and learned Friend will see has no prejudice against himself or any Member of the Government—I mean the very eminent person who lately represented Her Majesty as Special Ambassador at Constantinople, and who was lately a Colleague of noble Lords opposite, and of my noble and learned Friend himself. That right hon. Gentleman is in their confidence, and they possess, to a very great extent, his confidence, and I am not sure that he does not use language with regard to this Bill which he would willingly soften if he could honestly do so. What does Mr. Goschen say? He says—

“The Bill imports experimental principles foreign to all precedents of previous Liberal legislation, and is itself a kind of Coercion Bill—a Bill for the coercing of landlords to fix a fair rent.”

Then he goes on—

“These are new ideas which would sap the prosperity of this country if they were transferred to English legislation.”

Well, how ideas which would sap the prosperity of England can be sound in principle for Ireland I do not at this moment understand. Then he says—

“I cannot forget, and statesmen must not forget, that the Land Bill has been in a measure due to successful agitation. It is a dangerous thing in the history of a country when agitation is successful.”

Those are the words of a right hon. Gentleman who is as friendly as anyone can be to the Government. I will not use any vituperation; but I adhere to that description of Mr. Goschen. It is a perfectly true description of the Bill, and I hope my noble and learned Friend will not think that I have called a witness against him who represents the views of that side of the House on which I sit. Well, now, I am anxious not to delay your Lordships by any words of mine in description of the Bill. But I do hope your Lordships will distinctly understand that whatever course we take with regard to this Bill, we shall be quite clear in our own minds upon what the Bill really turns. Do not let us deal in generalities such as we have heard from my noble and learned Friend. Let us see exactly what the provisions of the Bill and the circumstances of the case really require; whether we ought to, allow the Bill to pass into law, or reject it, or modify it. What the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) said simplifies the case very much. He said he was not ashamed of the "three F's," and did not desire to shrink from them. Now, my Lords, it does not require any very elaborate examination of the Bill to discover them, for the Bill itself is purely and simply the "three F's." The matter lies in two or three sentences. Now, of the "three F's" two are free sale and fair rents. Free sale, in so many words, is given on the face of the Bill; so are fair rents. But the question is—Does the Bill grant fixity of tenure or not? In order to answer that question, let me ask your Lordships to consider what is the position of what are called "present tenants" under this Bill. As I understand it, the present tenant has the right to become, at his own option, a tenant in perpetuity for 1,000 years, or longer, if the world lasts so long. That is to say, he comes to the Court, gets his rent fixed, and thereupon holds it at that rent for 15 years; at the end of the last year of the first term he repeats the operation. He lives 15 years more, and he repeats the operation as often as he pleases at the end of every like term. Therefore, I say, he is a tenant in perpetuity. What is the explanation of those—the Prime Minister in particular—who wish to deny that this is fixity of tenure? It is said that it is not fixity of tenure, because the holding may be forfeited on non-payment of rent by the tenant and other counts. But, my Lords, the fact that a holding may be exposed to forfeiture does not interfere with its being a perpetuity. Copyholds are subject to forfeiture, and are they not perpetuities? Leases for lives renewable for ever, which in Ireland are usually known by the name of perpetuities, are forfeitable. Then, again, it is said that the landlord may buy the holding; he has a right of pre-emption, and my noble and learned Friend referred to that as a great benefit bestowed upon the landlord. But what is this right of pre-emption which is said to be a benefit to the landlord? Is it the right to buy something at something less than its full value? No; the landlord, no doubt, has the right of buying the holding, if he pleases, on a change of tenants; but he must do it at the value to be ascertained by the Court.

Karl Cairns

And how is the Court to ascertain the value? The value can only be ascertained in the same way as the value of any other article is ascertained, by what it will fetch in the market—that is, by auction. Therefore, the landlord can only have a right to purchase the holding at the market value. That is the right which is conferred on the landlord. There are in this Bill, my Lords, the "three F's"—fixity of tenure, fair rents, and free sale. The next point which your Lordships will have to consider is, What does this Bill propose to confer on the present tenants now in possession, and also on the other persons in the country who wish to acquire holdings? The Bill gives them the same right in their holdings which the Ulster tenants have in their holdings. Well, but what does it give? How does this Bill shower down benefits upon that large class of persons—the hungry persons in Ireland, the people who have an earth hunger, who want to become possessors of farms? I doubt, when they have got to understand this Bill, that they will find that it confers much benefit upon them. They may expect some of them, when there is a change of tenancy, to become possessors without paying for it. The landlord has now the right to put in a candidate for a tenancy. But under this Bill that large class of persons, who are to be called "future tenants" of the country, will have to pay a very considerable price in place of coming in, as they are now entitled to do, without paying anything at all. I will illustrate this in this way. We have an Army without the right of purchase. Suppose that suddenly we were to pass a law that the present officers were to have a property in their commissions, no doubt you would confer a very great boon on that class of officers; but what sort of a boon would you confer on those who expect to become officers? And that is what you are going to do in Ireland. You are going to confer a property which I admit will be of very considerable value to the tenants, wherever that value may come from, but which others will have to pay for before they become possessors. Now, I want your Lordships distinctly to understand how far it is the case, as we have been told more than once, that something was done in 1870 which, by inadvertence, embarked us in a course of legislation under which we created for the first time a right of property in holdings out of Ulster, and that we have no choice but to follow up that course. I wish to protest against this doctrine in the strongest terms. It is not the fact that anything was done in the way of legislation in 1870 which created any property in the tenantry of Ireland outside Ulster and the Custom of Ulster. It is said that payment by way of compensation was created by the Act of 1870; but the mode in which compensation was given was a sufficient answer, and it negatived altogether the right of property. It was compensation not given to holdings according to their value, but given arbitrarily—given to some and refused to others—or a certain percentage given to one class and a different percentage given to another class. It was utterly impossible if that payment proceeded on the footing of property that it could have been made in the way it was. What was the declaration of the Prime Minister on this question? Nothing could be more unqualified than the way in which Mr. Gladstone spoke on the Bill of 1870, in asking Parliament to consent to it. Mr. Gladstone then said—

[Second Night.]

“The aim of this Bill is to secure him in that position—to secure him, not by giving him a property in the soil.”

He said, further, that the object of the Bill was to shelter the tenant from eviction, “but not upon the footing of a joint property in the soil.” Here we have the clearest intimation of the intention of the Government. It was not an inadvertence. The Government had considered the matter, and the result was that they determined that legislation should not proceed upon the footing of giving the tenant a property in the soil. Why do I refer to it now? I think your Lordships will see that I do so for an important reason. I protest against the idea that the Act of 1870 had the effect attributed to it. It is said that in that year we proceeded by way of inadvertence. Well, if that is thought to be the case, it is a warning to us not to proceed by way of inadvertence a second time. I find that the clause which repeals the scale of compensation which was provided by the Act of 1870 substitutes a new and larger scale. If it is the case that in providing the scale in 1870 Parliament inadvertently created a right of property in the soil, I hope now that the question is re-opened Parliament will take care not to create a further right of property in the soil by inadvertently passing another and larger scale of compensation. We have had fair notice, and it will be our own fault if there is any inadvertence on this occasion. But with the changed provisions of the Bill what is the purport and meaning now of a new scale of compensation at all? I can understand that when the Act of 1870 was passed, it was necessary to have a scale of some kind or other. I can understand adhering to it when it is once adopted; but what I cannot understand is upon what principle it is to be argued that the scale of 1870 was wrong, and that the scale in the present Bill is right. The argument adduced by the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal was that some of the County Court Judges had stated in evidence that notwithstanding the scale of compensation in the Act of 1870, there had been cases in which the landlord had found it worth his while to evict a tenant and pay the compensation, as he found he could get a new tenant to take the holding, and reimburse him the compensation thus paid. The suggestion is that if you make the payment larger that could not take place. Assume that such cases have occurred, they have no bearing when you introduce free sale. If the holding is worth so much, and a new tenant can be got to pay compensation to the old, of course he will pay the same sum now that the old tenant is armed with the right of free sale. Therefore, the necessity for the clause giving the altered compensation entirely disappears. I understood the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal was of that opinion. He said he believed this compensation for disturbance would sink very much into the background. I agree with the view of the noble Lord; but the legitimate conclusion is that this clause ought not to be in the Bill. There is no necessity to re-open the question of compensation; it is merged, it is absorbed by the higher question of the right of free sale, and having fallen into a trap on the former occasion by inadvertence, I hope Parliament will take care to avoid it now. I now come to the most important question in the Bill—to the effect of free sale on tenancies in Ireland taken in relation to the valuation of rents, or rather, to the valuation of rents taken in connection with free sale. I understand that the ground on which you interfere in the valuation of rents is this. You want to protect the tenant against extortionate payment, due to the competition arising out of the great land hunger existing in Ireland, and which destroys freedom of contract. What is the position of the tenant now that a custom like the Ulster Custom will be extended to the rest of Ireland? There are two elements in what the tenant pays for the land, one the element of rent, the other the gross sum which he pays for the goodwill of the holding. If he pays for the goodwill out of money he has saved, he loses the interest which he might otherwise have. If he borrows the money from a money-lender or a bank, he pays a high interest for it. Therefore, in estimating what the tenant has to pay, you must put together the rent and the proper interest of the sum he pays for possession of the holding. So that what he pays for the land is not the rent alone, and not the interest alone, but it is the aggregate of the two sums. These things are spoken of sometimes as if there were a juggle in the figures, and as if you could get rid of the rules of arithmetic by saying that these two payments have no connection whatever. What does this Bill propose to do? Founded on the theory that the tenant must be protected against extortion arising from severe competition, the Bill proceeds to curb, fetter, and confine one payment—namely, the payment which he makes to the landlord—but you leave perfectly free and uncurbed the other payment, which he makes for getting possession of the holding. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal says that this is a pure evasion, and that if you go to an Ulster tenant and tell him that he pays a sum for rental and another sum for interest of the money he has paid for the tenant right, and that he is consequently rack-rented, he will laugh in your face. But, my Lords, that is not so. The Ulster tenant perfectly well understands that the land costs him the aggregate of the two payments, and that if you protect him in the payment of his rent, you leave him unprotected as far as the other payment goes. I am not going to argue the point whether the payment for goodwill has or has not a connection with the payment which the landlord receives by way of rent. I am not going to argue whether the payment for goodwill comes out of the interest of the landlord; but what I am going to ask your Lordships is this—that you ought to be very careful that whatever theory is to be held on this point should be very clearly expressed on the face of the Bill; because the fear is, that by reason of any ambiguity on the face of the Bill, and notwithstanding the declarations on the part of the Government, it should come to pass—say, by inadvertence, that when the rent of some of these holdings comes to be valued, notwithstanding the declarations of my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal and the Lord Chancellor, this triumvirate of respectable gentlemen may take up the idea that there is some connection after all between the payment for rent and the payment for interest, and may make the landlord suffer for the payment for tenant right. Suppose there is a holding in Ulster for which the tenant pays £50 rent, while he has paid £500 for the goodwill, and that he comes to the triumvirate, and they say—“We are to fix a fair rent and nothing more. We are to have regard to the interest of both the landlord and the tenant.” Then suppose the triumvirate say—“What is the interest of the tenant? He has paid £500, and invested that capital. That is his interest, and we are to have regard to it.” But suppose by mistake the triumvirate reason thus—“The meaning of our considering the tenant’s interest is this—we are to see whether the rent of £50, which, looking to the absolute value of the holding, is a fair rent; but having regard to the fact that the tenant has paid £500 on coming in, we do not think it is. The rent is £10 too high, and, therefore, we reduce it to £40.” [“Hear, hear!”] Well, they may be right; but suppose they are wrong, what then? Why the consequence will be this—that during the 15 years when the rent is £40, the tenant will say—“I have paid £500; but I have now got the rent reduced to £40, and my tenant right is, therefore, now worth £600.” And if he wished to, he would sell it in the open market for that sum. Then comes the end of that period, and these respectable gentlemen say—“Well, we must go over this process again; we must have regard to the interest of the tenant; but as the tenant’s interest has now risen to £600, and as we reduced the rent to £40, when the interest was £500, we must now further reduce the rent to £30. And so the tenant will start again with a £30 rent, and will ask £700 for his interest; and so it will go on, and the rent will be reduced each time, having regard to the increasing interest of the tenant." Now, is that a mere supposition of mine? Is that the idea of a person wholly unacquainted with land in Ireland? These are the words of the Devon Commission on this point, of persons who certainly take a most favourable view of the question of free sale—

Earl Cairns

"It is difficult to deny that the effect of this system is the assumption by the tenant of a joint proprietorship in the land, and that the tendency is to convert the proprietor into a rent-charger having an indefinite and declining annuity."

Now, I am not concerned to argue whether the triumvirate would be right or wrong in doing what I said; but I do maintain that the most honest men in the world may do this under the Bill as it stands, and that, with the most perfect desire to do justice, the result would be such as I have described, and I must say that it would not be surprising if they did. What I want to know is, are you going to leave this matter in doubt; are you going to content yourselves with the declaration made in this House that the tenant right and the rent have no connection, that nothing is taken out of the property of the landlord; or are you going to put something into the Bill which will remove all possibility of its being done in the future? I do not say this merely in the interests of the landlord, but in the interests of the tenant also. Remember, you are creating a property which is to come into the market. You are dealing, not merely with educated landlords, but also with a tenantry of whom many are uneducated. Let it, then, be known what is the thing to be bought and sold, and do not let there be any ambiguities, doubts, and uncertainties which would lead to renewed agitation, heart-burning, and new legislation hereafter. The noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal said that it was not intended by this right of free sale to diminish the fair rent of the landlord, and I ask him if he will put words to make that perfectly clear in the Bill; and, if he will, every criticism I have to offer on this point is at once answered, and is at an end. I should be sorry to believe that the Government would use in this House any word that they did not mean sincerely; but if so, what is their objection to put those words on the face of the Bill? There were words left out in the other House as to the valuation of rent, words to the effect that the Judges were to consider the element of the tenant right in fixing the amount of rent, and only those who apprehended their effect advocated their omission; but that is not enough when there is a possibility of doubt, and I ask you by all means to put in words to say what is the real principle of the Bill? Now, what does the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal say?—

Earl Cairns

"As to the other portion of the tenant right, is it true that the occupation element, the goodwill element, must be taken out of the landlord's fair rent? I utterly deny that. We do not admit it for a moment. We believe that the goodwill element of tenant right grows up inevitably, side by side, in conjunction with, and outside of, the landlord's rent; that it is not carved out of the landlord's rent; and that it does not cut down the landlord's rent."

Now, I wish to know whether the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal adheres to that view of the case. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor said he would rather have the responsibility of this measure than be in the position of the Opposition to criticize a measure which they do not reject. The Opposition are quite able to judge for themselves of the course it is their duty to take without my noble and learned Friend's advice, and without his sympathy. Therefore, we are quite satisfied with his view of the matter, and perhaps I may be allowed to return his compliment, and say I prefer the position of the Opposition to the position of those who have the responsibility of this measure. I am not going to prophecy, but I know what are the natural results of a measure of this kind. Human nature will be changed in its course if it does not stop all improvements made by landlords in Ireland. Human nature will alter if this measure does not build up a wall of separation between the landlord and the tenant. I do not know whether it will turn landlords into rent-chargers; but it will at once put an end to every motive which has hitherto existed for a kindly interchange of kindly feeling, good-will, friendship, and fellowship as between landlord and tenant. Another result of the measure does not require prophecy; for we have had so much proof of what has happened since 1870 that we know the same thing must go on. Up to 1870 tenants had no legal property in their holdings that creditors could touch; but after the passing of the Land Act in that year, the tenants found that they could give security for money, and the result was that many of them got over head and ears in debt. Still larger numbers will get into debt when this Bill is passed. In Ulster, where this custom has grown up, and where they have had to pay for it, the tenants know the value of money and of their holdings; they are careful and thrifty men, and they do not get into debt; but when you suddenly throw this valuable property at the head of all the tenants in Ireland, they will be intoxicated with the possession of that security, which they never had before, and they will fall still more into the hands of the money-lender and the usurer. You know also that those who emigrate now are the best men. What are you going to do? You are going to give them a property which they can at once convert into money for the purpose of taking them away. I say that the effect of this Bill will be to make changes which will take some of the best men out of Ireland. Errors and mistakes are made frequently which cannot be remedied. We, however, are not the Executive Government. The Executive Government have the confidence of the House of Commons, and, having that confidence, they have partly encouraged and partly supported the system of agitation which has prevailed, and they have failed to suppress that agitation by the means which they could command. In fact, they have brought about a state of things which we all deplore, and they have thought it right to attempt to satisfy agitators by presenting them with this Bill. That is a heavy responsibility. But once this has been done by the Executive Government, possessing as they do the confidence of the House of Commons, the case becomes one in which, if this House were to take upon itself to reject the measure, it would, in its turn, assume the responsibility which at present rests with the Government, and which is a responsibility which I do not envy. It is for these reasons that I am glad your Lordships are not going to come to an issue upon the second reading of this Bill. I have no wish to see the Bill amended in any way which would alter its main lines and features; but it now contains excrescences and inconsistencies which mar the regularity of those features. In these respects, then, there are important Amendments which I would be glad to see introduced into the Bill; and when that has been done I believe that this House will have taken a course which is consistent with the dignity of the House, with our duty as public men, and with the best traditions of the Constitution of this country.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it is not necessary that I should detain your Lordships at this late hour (1 o'clock) for any long period, as my noble Friend the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has so fully stated the case of the Government in connection with this Bill. On reviewing the whole of the debate, I think we have no reason to be dissatisfied; but, at the same time, some things have been uttered by the noble and learned Earl who has just sat down (Earl Cairns) which it is my duty on behalf of the Government to notice. It seems, judging by the tone of this debate, that it is admitted on all sides that there is a very grave emergency in Ireland, and that it is absolutely necessary that some measure of this kind should be introduced and passed, and I think that the Bill is founded upon the only lines which the circumstances of the case justify. The noble and learned Earl opposite, who made a very moderate and wise speech, indulged at the end of it, as was natural, in some slight Party recrimination. The noble and learned Earl said, in effect—"Here is a Bill the necessity of which is admitted; but whence arises the necessity?" And the noble Earl answers—"From the conduct of the Government." I undertake, however, to demonstrate to your Lordships that to say that this measure has been rendered necessary by what has taken place in Ireland during the last few months is perfectly preposterous. What did the noble and learned Earl himself say in this House on the 3rd of August last year? He said that any statesmanlike measure introduced for the benefit of the people of Ireland would receive his respectful consideration. [Earl CAIRNS: Hear, hear!] The noble and learned Earl added that he thought a measure for the encouragement of emigration was very desirable, that a measure for the establishment of a peasant proprietary would deserve consideration, and also one for the extension of the Ulster Custom to the other Provinces of Ireland; and he added that "all these, whatever view we may take of them, are projects worthy of a statesman."

EARL CAIRNS: But I did not express any opinion as to their merits.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have not said that the noble and learned Earl expressed any approval of any particular scheme. All I can say is that we who sat on this Bench, when that speech was delivered during the discussion on the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, said—"Earl Cairns perceives that there must be a large land measure for Ireland, and knows that it must be based upon an extension of the Ulster Custom"—the principle of the present Bill, for from it flows the greater part of its provisions. The noble and learned Earl now says that "After all, this Bill is an embodiment of the three F's;" and as regards two of the "F's" I quite agree that it is. But fixity of tenure is not in this Bill. The noble and learned Earl compared what is in this Bill with copyhold tenure; and, if I did not misunderstand him, he said that in copyhold tenure there is forfeiture. Now, of course, the noble and learned Earl knows well what copyhold tenure is. But my understanding of it was this—that the landlord may recover his just dues from the copyholder; but so long as there is an heir, there can be no forfeiture, as a copyhold is an estate of inheritance. In the absence of an heir to take, the copyhold escheats to the lord. I always supposed that what constituted the fixity of tenure in copyholds was that the heir has an absolute right to be admitted on the Court rolls. But under this Bill there are distinct cases in which the landlord will recover possession of the land—e.g., upon a breach of a covenant, and the landlord recovers absolute possession without any power in the tenant to regain possession. Then the whole class of future tenants will be in a different condition from the present tenants. When we come to discuss the Bill in Committee I think we shall find that the Bill does not contain fixity of tenure. I must say I was somewhat surprised at the attitude now assumed towards the

The Earl of Kimberley

Bill by my noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll); and I must, therefore, take occasion to refer to what was said by my noble Friend in the year 1870. The noble Duke had not then the same objection to the extension of the Ulster Custom which he has since so strongly expressed. The noble Duke, in a speech on the Bill of 1870, used these words—

"The noble and learned Lord (referring to Lord Cairns), who assents to the Ulster Custom, protests violently against the 3rd clause of the Bill, which gives a position to tenants outside Ulster precisely the same in character as that of tenants in Ulster."

Now, it is curious that upon this subject there is a great deal of discontent in Ulster, and exactly in proportion as the landlords have been able by rules to curtail the Ulster Custom is there dissatisfaction among the Ulster tenants. So much discontent, indeed, prevails that towards the close of the last Parliament a measure was brought forward by Mr. Macartney, which contained three remarkable clauses. The Bill proposed to abolish office rules altogether, and it actually provided that leases should be dealt with. My noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) is not present, or, no doubt, he would be surprised to make that discovery. My noble Friend said that no attempt had been made to interfere with leases until it was attempted in that Bill. He evidently never heard of this Bill. It is rather remarkable that an Ulster Member should bring in this Bill. The Bill was read the second time in the House of Commons just a month before the Dissolution, and with the concurrence of the Government; and so important did they think it that, at the time of the General Election, a letter was addressed by Sir Stafford Northcote to Viscount Castlereagh on the subject. In that letter, the then Leader of the House of Commons said it had been reported to him that the Government was hostile to Ulster tenant right, and that they were not wholly disinclined to support it, but, if possible, disposed to reverse that policy. A direct contradiction was given to this, and it was stated that the Land Act had been accepted, as they were bound to accept it, honestly. We imagine that we have sufficiently guarded in this Bill the fair and just privileges of the landlord quite as much as they would have been by the Bill which was approved by the late Government. It has been suggested by the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns) that the Bill can be so administered that the landlord's interest may gradually disappear; but that could not be unless the Court utterly disregarded the interest of the landlord, and the Bill says that the Court shall have regard to the interest of the landlord as well as that of the tenant. It may be possible to make the duty of the Court more easy by instruction, if words can be found; but if the Court were to act in such a manner as has been suggested, it would be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. Tenant right in this case is no landlord's wrong. I would ask those noble Lords who have property in Ireland, and who have spoken in such strong terms of this Bill, whether it is not obvious, when you have found a principle which, whatever may be said against it theoretically, has worked for a long time with, I will not say perfect, but with considerable success in a particular part of Ireland, that we should extend that principle to the rest of the country? If we had a tolerable state of things in the rest of Ireland, I should not say—"Let us extend the principle;" but the state of things in the rest of Ireland is perfectly intolerable. The relations between landlord and tenant, who are the principal classes constituting the great mass of the population, are such that no Government which had any regard to its duty could shrink from bringing in and asking Parliament to pass any measure likely to create a better state of things. A noble Marquess, not now in the House (the Marquess of Salisbury), said that this was a measure of pure and simple confiscation. But when they knew that what the majority of the House chose to call confiscation was inevitable, what was the use of calling it by such a name? The noble Earl the late Governor General of India (the Earl of Lytton), in the long essay he delivered last night—and it was the only portion of that essay which was remarkable—said—

"This may be largely beneficial. I do not regard it with misgiving, because it is confiscation, because confiscation may be necessary."

Now, I think if this measure could be proved to be confiscation all the hard words applied to it would be justified. But the fact is that "confiscation," as used in debate, is a Parliamentary term, and does not mean what it professes. There are many other matters which have been referred to, but on which I need not touch; but I must allude to the speech of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), who took so completely a landlord's view of the situation. I suppose many of us were astonished that anyone, much more a great Irish landlord, should say that the question of improvements was a vexed question, except, of course, in the sense that it is vexatious to hear it so often argued; for the fact is beyond all dispute that by far the most of the improvements in Ireland have been made by the tenants. It is astonishing to me that the Bill should have been branded as a monstrous attempt to confiscate the property of the landlord, when the fact is, as has been shown by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, that the very essence of the measure is an attempt to save the landlord's property, by rescuing it from the peril with which it is threatened. I heard my noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) say—"You think, by a measure of this kind, to quell agrarian rebellion." Well, we do. You may either quell it by the bayonet and grape-shot or by remedial measures. I have said so much about the noble Marquess's speech, because I regard him as one who has great knowledge of the subject and great ability, which I much regretted to see applied as he has applied it to this subject. He throws great light upon it; but he does not bring that fair consideration of the matter on both sides which is more necessary in Ireland than anywhere else, if you are to have good relations between the two classes. Criticisms on a measure of this kind we must expect, and hard words will be lavished on those who have this most responsible and, in some respects, most ungrateful task imposed upon them. The Government, however, have no reason to complain of the general tone of the criticisms to which the Bill has been subject, and we only ask the House to admit that there is a necessity for passing the second reading of a measure based on these principles, and I hope the House will also be guided by the wise advice of the noble and learned Earl who has just sat down, not to interfere in Committee with the main lines of the measure.

[Second Night.]

LORD DENMAN, amid considerable interruption, said, that if he did not speak against the second reading, he would be under the imputation of agreeing to that stage of the Bill. He would give Notice that, on the Motion for going into Committee, he would move that the House should resolve itself into the said Committee on that day three months.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for providing funds to defray certain of the expenses of the Royal University of Ireland—Was presented by The LORD PRIVY SEAL; read 1^a. (No. 194.)

House adjourned at half past
One o'clock, A.M. till
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 2nd August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement [No. 358].

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions [August 1] reported—Ordered—First Reading—National Debt [236]; Indian Loan of 1879 [237].

Ordered—First Reading—Corrupt Practices (Suspension of Elections) * [238].

Committee—Report—Petroleum (Hawking) [222].

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Wild Birds Protection Act (1880) Amendment [226]; Superannuation (Post Office and Works) * [228], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

MERCANTILE MARINE—LIGHTSHIPS AND LIGHTHOUSES—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the present want of telegraphic communication between lightships and lighthouses and the shore; and, whether he will consider the desirability of establishing such telegraphic communication if possible before another winter?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, his attention had been directed to the subject referred to by the hon. Member, and as to which communications had for some time been going on between the Board of Trade and the Trinity House. He was informed that the Trinity House hoped to be able to make a satisfactory Report on the subject in a short time.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—MAJORS.

MAJOR-GENERAL BURNABY asked the Secretary of State for War, If existing Colonels who were Majors before the 1st of October 1877, and who were eligible for promotion to Major General until the age of fifty-eight, but who under paragraph 77 (2) of the New Royal Warrant, are rendered ineligible for such promotion, and who furthermore thereby will be compulsorily retired at the age of fifty-five will be allowed "to serve and be eligible for promotion until the 1st of July 1885, up to the age of fifty-nine years, and afterwards up to the age of fifty-eight years," as in the case of Colonels who were Lieutenant Colonels before the 1st of October 1877; and, if this relaxation is not granted to all such Majors, whether it will be granted to Colonel Marter of the First or King's Dragoon Guards, who, being a Major, captured King Cetshwayo, and to any other Officers, who, being Majors before the 1st of October 1877, were also promoted for distinguished service in the field?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; I have no intention to relax the rule under which Colonels who were Majors only before October, 1877, will retire at the fixed age of Colonels' retirement—that is to say, at 55. Nor can I see any grounds for a special exception in Colonel Marter's favour. He is apparently only 48 years of age.

ARMY REGULATION ACT, 1871—PURCHASE OFFICERS.

MAJOR-GENERAL BURNABY asked the Secretary of State for War, If "purchase" officers who wish to retire from the Army and realize that value of their Commissions guaranteed by the State, are (although the purchase system is abolished whereby promotion to a death vacancy has ceased to be a financial benefit to those in whose favour it existed) required to furnish a medical certificate of good health; failing which they are required to pass a quarantine of six weeks, in order that the State may benefit by not having to pay them should they die within that period; and, if such is the case, whether this procedure may at once cease, and all moneys derived thereby since the abolition of purchase may be paid to the executors of any officer who, having made application to retire, may not have survived the six weeks' quarantine in question?

MR. CHILDERS: This is a matter entirely beyond my control. It is governed by the 3rd section of the Army Regulation Act, 1871, and no change in the rule could be made without an Amendment to the Act, which I see no reason to propose.

CHINA—THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to a letter from the Chinese Grand Secretary Li, in the "Times" of July 29th, stating—"That the single aim of his Government in taxing opium is to repress the traffic. Never the desire to gain revenue from such a source ;"

and, whether the Indian Government is taking any steps thoroughly to review our position with regard to the opium revenue, according to the promise of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for India?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have seen the letter referred to from the Chinese Grand Secretary Li in the papers, and I must say that a great many statements and arguments contained in that letter appear to me to be open to very great question. It is impossible for me to reply to those statements in the course of an answer to a Question, and I am sure that my hon. Friend would not wish me to do so. In reply to the latter part of the Question, I have to state that a despatch has been sent to the Government of India on the subject of the opium revenue, which I think contains all the instructions necessary in support of the statement which I made during the course of a debate here two months ago.

IRELAND—THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ALLEGED BREACH OF THE PEACE BY A SUB-INSPECTOR.

MR. FINIGAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Young, Sub-Inspector of Constabulary, Raphoe, County Donegal, who has recently been placed in charge of an extra Constabulary force in Gweedore, in the same county, on 28th June, when driving through the townland of Meenanilla, in company with Mr. Ramsay, Solicitor, Letterkenney, and Mr. Robinson, Head Bailiff to Captain Hill, provoked a breach of the peace by calling on Mrs. Gallagher to come out of her house and stab him with a grape; and, if so, whether he approves of such conduct by an officer of the Constabulary?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he understood Mr. Young and some men were passing the house of Mr. Gallagher with a prisoner. A crowd collected on the road to the barracks, and Mrs. Gallagher shouted some words in Irish, and took up a grape, an instrument used in potato digging. Her husband disarmed her. On a subsequent occasion the Sub-Inspector, with some men, passed the cottage, but neither saw nor heard anything of the woman.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)— POISONED EGGS.

MR. FINIGAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the fact that eggs poisoned with strychnine have been placed, for the preservation of game, in a wood the property of Mr. Richard Longfield, Boherbee, County Cork, within three hundred yards of the houses of some of his tenants; whether the wood, containing a well from which these people are supplied with water, may be entered by several open gaps; whether four children belonging to one of Mr. Longfield's tenants, a widow, on finding one of those poisoned eggs, ate it, and were instantly seized by an attack of cramps and vomiting; whether three of them were dangerously ill for many days, and the fourth for many weeks; whether the police authorities, as well as the dispensary doctor of the district, are not acquainted with this case; and, whether the statutable notice required was given in this case?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he found, on inquiry, that the statements contained in the Question of the hon. Member were true. Poisoned eggs for the preservation of game were placed within 300 yards of the houses of some of the tenants of the estate; and four children who, on finding one of the eggs, ate it, were seized with cramp and vomiting. He was glad to say, however, they had recovered. Mr. Longfield had caused every attention to be paid to the children, had paid the doctor's fees, and sent money to the parents. It appeared that notices of the eggs were posted in the wood, but were not sent to the Constabulary until after the accident. He had no doubt that what had occurred would be a great lesson to Mr. Longfield and to other persons; and he hoped and believed that such a thing would not occur again.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

MR. ROUND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he proposes that Adjutants of Militia who attain the rank of Major should have precedence over Majors of Militia Regiments?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; not for regimental purposes.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—PURCHASE CAPTAINS.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is obligatory upon the Purchase Captains to accept promotion to the newly-created majorities under the provisions of the recent Royal Warrant; or, can they elect to serve on until compelled to retire, under the Age Clause, at forty-two?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that, in making the promotions on the 1st of July last, when the Warrant of the 25th of June came into operation, we gave captains who had reached the reduced age at which retirement was compulsory, and who were also eligible and recommended for promotion, the choice between promotion and compulsory retirement. But I see no reason for extending that option to officers who have not reached the age for compulsory retirement.

Mr. Finigan

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS — SUS- PENSION OF CORRUPT BOROUGHES.

MR. T. COLLINS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill to suspend until the next Session of Parliament Writs for the cities of Canterbury, Chester, Gloucester, and Oxford, and for the boroughs of Boston, Macclesfield, and Sandwich?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, it was his intention to ask leave to bring in a Bill such as that referred to in the Question of the hon. Member that evening.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

KNARESBOROUGH COMMISSION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. T. COLLINS rose to call attention to the following statements in the Report of the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into alleged Corrupt Practices in the Borough of Knaresborough:—

"We find that corrupt practices did not extensively prevail at the election of 1874. We find that corrupt practices did not extensively prevail at the election of 1880. We cannot close our Report, having regard to the conclusions we have arrived at, without expressing our regret that the expense of this inquiry should, under the 31st and 32nd Vic. c. 125, s. 15, fall on the ratepayers of the borough of Knaresborough;"

and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, having regard to statements of the Royal Commissioners, it is not in accordance with justice nor with the policy of the Act of 31 and 32 Vic. c. 125, that the cost of this inquiry should be borne by the ratepayers of the borough of Knaresborough."

The hon. Gentleman said, he had no desire to delay the taking of Supply, and would not have brought the subject forward on the Motion for going into Supply if it were open to him to do so on another occasion. What the ratepayers of Knaresborough complained of was that their borough being pure—as boroughs went—had been saddled with a rate of some 4s. in the pound. He thought this was a case in which the old maxim, De minimis non curat lex, would have applied; and if the rate had been not more than 6*d.* in the pound he should not have brought forward his complaint, although the principle was the same. Election Commissions dated back as far as 1850, when, under the Premiership of Lord John Russell, a Commission was appointed by Act of Parliament to inquire as to the proceedings at an election for St. Alban's. Two years later another Act was passed which practically perpetuated and made general the St. Alban's Act, and by that Act the cost of Commissions was defrayed from the taxes of the country. This state of things went on until 1867, when a Committee, comprising many of the experts in matters of electoral law, then sitting in Parliament, sat; and, on the Motion of Mr. Whitbread in that Committee, it was determined that in cases where corrupt practices had extensively prevailed the expenses incurred in holding the inquiries should be paid out of the county or borough rates of the localities. This seemed to him to be a very fair proposal; but he would remind the House that in the following year the scope of the Motion of Mr. Whitbread was enlarged, and provision was made that payment of the cost of inquiries should be laid upon the rates in all cases where the Judges reported that, in their opinion, this should be done. He could not but think that, in comparison with the other places in which Commissions had sat, Knaresborough was very badly treated. The object of the Legislature had been the prevention of corrupt practices, and they had refused to allow a Commission to be issued, where the Judge had reported that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed, merely because a Member had been unseated. It was quite true that in this instance the Judge had reported that he believed that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed; but the inquiry had shown that that belief was not well founded. In such circumstances, it was contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the Act that the borough should be called upon to pay a rate of 4*s.* in the pound in establishing its virtue. He might quote many cases in which the Government had awarded compensation where they were satisfied a miscarriage of justice had taken place. The case of Habron might be mentioned, as well as that of Barber. The issuing of the Commission was an act of inadvertence. The intention of the Act was never to fine the electors for merely isolated cases of corruption, such as was the case at Knaresborough, and therefore it no more fell within the spirit of the Act than the cases of Gravesend or Evesham, where the Members were unseated. He knew that at this period of the Session he was quite in the hands of the Government. It was impossible, without their assistance, to make any headway. He regretted, however, that the Prime Minister was not in his place, that he might make his appeal to him on the subject. He knew that, technically, he had no defence on the question of statutory liability; but he must say that the constituency had suffered from an accident, and this being a wrong created by an Act of Parliament, it was the business of Parliament to find a remedy.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, having regard to statements of the Royal Commissioners, it is not in accordance with justice nor with the policy of the Act of 31 and 32 Vic. c. 125, that the cost of this inquiry should be borne by the ratepayers of the borough of Knaresborough,"—(Mr. Thomas Collins),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sure the House must feel that the hon. and learned Member had very fairly stated the case to the House, and that he was fully entitled to bring the exceptional circumstances under the consideration of the House. He also felt that there was a substantial grievance to bring forward; but, at the same time, it was impossible to give way to his Motion. The substantial Motion of the hon. and learned Member was that the expenses of this Commission should be borne out of the Imperial taxation of the country. He did not suggest any other means by which it could be met. In the first place, that could not be done without an Act of Parliament. Therefore, he asked the House to agree to a declaration, which must, of necessity, be fol-number of the ratepayers. It appeared to be generally admitted that the state of this workhouse was extremely unsatisfactory, and yet the inquiry was allowed to prove abortive. In reference to the specific charges which he had made, the charge of immorality was fully borne out by the facts which had been placed in his hands. There were cases of women who had been in and out of the house 60 or 70 times, and who were simply living upon the ratepayers, whilst they led abandoned lives. In other cases women who remained in the house became mothers under circumstances which showed that immorality prevailed in the workhouse. Touching those serious charges hardly a question was asked at the inquiry except one or two questions put to the officials, who could not be expected to give disinterested evidence. On the 14th of April, 1879, the matron complained that paupers were going about the house in possession of pass keys, and doing what they pleased; but not the slightest heed was paid to that charge at the inquiry. The matron was examined, but the question was not even put to her. Then it was alleged that there was a great deal of drunkenness in the house, and the way in which that was accomplished was that, by a combination, property of the Union was sold and disposed of in various ways—in this case surreptitiously introduced into the house. One of the magistrates at Belfast stated that in 1878 no less than 99 cases of drunkenness were brought before him from the workhouse. Yet there was not the slightest cross-examination on this point at the inquiry, nor any attempt made to account for and explain how that drunkenness took place. Another charge was that the old men in the house were put in the same rooms with young, idle, and evil-disposed vagabonds, who treated them with violence, and robbed them of the few coins that they brought into the house. On many occasions these old men had been subjected to the greatest insolence; but no such case was even alluded to at the inquiry. Of course, he knew that anyone would be resisted by the officials who tried to reform any department, and that was what had been done on the present occasion. The officials had endeavoured to cloak over the misdeeds at the workhouse and the remissness of the chief authorities in Dublin. He hoped that public opinion would rise to the occasion, and that the Chief Secretary would give him some hope that sooner or later, when weightier matters had been disposed of, he would try to reform Irish Poor Law administration. It was quite hopeless to expect any improvement as long as all investigation was to be hushed up and to be set aside. As his Motion was generally directed against the Irish Local Government Board and the administration of workhouses, he would just give another instance of the policy of the Board. Owing, perhaps, to the attention which he had had the honour of exciting with regard to workhouse management, the Limerick Guardians took the matter up very warmly and determined to improve the condition of the children in their workhouse, and they spent a large sum of money in building a new school and decided to place the religious instruction of the children under the supervision of a number of ladies. The Local Government Board were perfectly aware of what was intended from the outset, and gave no sign of interfering with the plans of the Guardians. They waited, in fact, until great expense had been incurred, and then they came down with their obstructive policy and put their foot upon the introduction of these ladies to take care of the school. They put forward the reason that the proposed arrangement would interfere with the religious liberty of the Protestant children in the school. As a matter of fact during three years there was only one Protestant child in the whole school; and, therefore, that objection of the Board was simply frivolous. What would have been said if the managers of a Protestant school had been deprived of these advantages simply because one Catholic child might be affected? The fact was that it was not an honest excuse, but mere hypocrisy on the part of the Local Government Board, who professed to be so anxious with regard to the religious sentiments of a solitary infant in a Roman Catholic school, whilst in other parts of the country where Catholic children were in the majority Protestant teachers were imposed upon them without compunction. He had only to say that there was no Minister before whom he would sooner have the question brought than the Chief Secretary, for he believed that Gentleman was one of the few men who would give his time and attention to so small a matter which was consistent with his humane and kindly career. He trusted before the right hon. Gentleman left his present post, and accepted some other Department, that he would take some decided steps with regard to the subject at issue, and would endeavour to remedy the evils complained of.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the hon. Member had rather under-estimated the difficulties which the Local Government Board had to deal with in making the inquiry referred to. He did not understand that the line taken by the Local Government Board was that they would not allow the children in Limerick Institution to be taught by Sisters of Mercy. What was objected to, as he understood it, was that the Sisters of Mercy should be appointed by an extraneous authority, and the matter had since been settled on the basis that the Sisters of Mercy should be appointed by the Board of Guardians, subject to the veto of the Local Government Board. That was acknowledged by almost everybody to be fair; and, therefore, he did not think the hon. Member was justified in blaming the Local Government Board. With regard to the workhouses, if the hon. Member meant to have brought the subject forward he ought to have put the matter on the Notice Paper, and then he (Mr. W. E. Forster) would have been aware of the intention, and would have been able to look into the subject. Instead of that what appeared on the Notice Paper was simply that the hon. Member intended to call attention to the administration of the Irish Poor Law. With regard to the inquiry referred to, he must say that he had read the Report which was drawn up on the subject, and he must say he thought it was drawn up very fairly, and that the inquiry appeared to have been conducted in a proper manner. The Local Government Board sent down two most able men—Mr. Robinson and Dr. Mackay—and full notice was given of the inquiry. Therefore, those who sympathized with the hon. Member ought surely to have come before the Commission, and given evidence in support of his case. All he could say with regard to the statements made by the hon. Gentleman was that he hoped they would be fully reported somewhere, as some of them were much stronger than he had seen elsewhere, and he thought having been made in that public way they did require to be again considered. But when the hon. Member said that the Local Government Board ought to have sent down perfectly independent persons to make inquiry, he forgot that the case was one in which the action of the persons connected with the Local Government Board was complained of; and if the Board was worth anything at all it should be able to inquire into the fitness of the persons connected with it. He did not find that in Belfast there was any strong opinion in regard to the officials referred to, nor did he find that the hon. Member's opinions were strongly sympathized with in Belfast itself. With regard to sending down Inspectors to make the inquiry, it must not be forgotten that those persons under the statute had power to take evidence on oath, which other persons had not; and he must say, in justice to Mr. Robinson, that it would be impossible to find a gentleman more thoroughly impartial than he was, for he had no bias one way or other. On looking at the evidence he found Mr. Smith, the chaplain, stated that he was in and out of the workhouse daily, and he observed no improper conduct, or immoral or irregular association. It appeared that the evidence quite justified the finding of the Inspectors, who by no means wished to whitewash the Guardians, or anything like it. They also expressed their dissatisfaction with the relieving officer. After all it was a sort of trial, and it often occurred that when there had been a trial one side was not satisfied with the verdict.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought in such a case it would be very difficult for a Commission to get at the facts of the case, as they would not know what question to ask, and how they were to find out what it was desirable to know. Knowing something of these matters, he was clearly of opinion that a great deal of mischief arose in such cases from the action of the ex officio Guardians. He contended that the ratepayers should select persons to represent them, while ex officio Guardians should not be allowed on any Board. In his own county (Cavan) he remembered a case where a coal contractor was convicted of a gross fraud in connection with his dealings with the workhouse. An inquiry was ordered; but the ex officio Guardians taking his part prevented his punishment. He thought such proceedings ought to be put a stop to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £330,173, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation."

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, he rose to move the reduction of this Vote by £20,000, part of the sum of £139,500 which was allowed for medical relief grants in England. He was sensible that the course he was taking might, at that period of the Session, be regarded as very inconvenient and unsatisfactory; but, at the same time, it was the only way in which he could give public expression to the very widespread feeling in Scotland that in this matter of grants in aid of medical relief, England and Scotland were placed in an unfair and unequal position. That matter had been so often under the consideration of Parliament that it would not be necessary for him to enter into details; but he asked the attention of the Committee for a few minutes while he recalled the leading circumstances of the case, and the principles on which he ventured to think these grants ought to be regulated. The facts of the case were few, and the principles were simple. When in, or immediately preceding, the year 1845 the attention of Parliament and the country was directed to the question of the Poor Law, nothing attracted so much public sympathy as the question of medical relief. The state of matters then brought to light—the deplorable condition of the poor with regard to medical relief—was almost inconceivable at the present day, and constituted a disgrace alike to civilization and humanity. Without entering into particulars with regard to that point, which would be found in the Report of the Commission that sat at the time he had referred to, it would be enough for him to say that in 1848 the sum of £85,000 appeared for the first time in the Estimates as a grant in aid of medical relief to the poor. Of that sum, £75,000 was allocated to England and Wales, and £10,000 to Scotland; and at the time the grant was made it was understood that the latter represented one-fourth part of the total sum necessary to put the grant in a satisfactory position. But during the 33 years which had elapsed, although the amount allocated to England and Wales had risen to the alarming sum indicated in the Vote before the Committee, the amount allocated to Scotland remained the same—namely, £10,000. Now, he pointed out that if the principle of a fixed sum being given to Scotland was a right one, the same principle ought to be applied to England and Wales. On the other hand, if the principle applied to the latter of increasing the grants in accordance with local circumstances and taxation were a right one, then he failed to see any reason why it should not be applied to Scotland. He did not ask that the amount granted to England and Wales should be the same as that granted to Scotland, but that these grants should stand in reasonable and proper proportion to each other. There were several bases which might be taken with a view to adjusting that proportion. First, there was the basis of population. And it would be seen by a comparison of the population of England and Wales with that of Scotland, either that the grant to the former ought to be reduced by a sum larger than that by which he was now moving the reduction of the Vote, or that the grant to Scotland ought to be materially increased. Secondly, there was the basis of property and profits. But with regard to that he would remind the Committee that a large portion of the profits returned under the head of England and Wales really belonged to Scotland, because it was a fact that much of these profits belonged to businesses founded and managed with Scotch capital, the proprietors of which preferred to make their returns in London, Manchester, and other large cities.

However, it would be seen that, taking profits as a basis for the proportion, the same result came out. Either the grant to England and Wales ought to be reduced, or that to Scotland increased. Again, the sum paid by the two countries respectively into the Imperial Exchequer might be taken as a basis of proportion; and that view had been forcibly urged on the Committee already upon a former occasion by the late Member for the City of Edinburgh (Mr. D. M'Laren), who, for his services in this and other matters, deserved the thanks of all interested in the subject. Mr. D. M'Laren laid down that, according to the Returns of 1877, the amounts actually paid into the Imperial Exchequer for England and Scotland respectively were to each other somewhere in the proportion of £51,000,000 to £7,750,000; and although since the year 1877 there may have been some changes, the proportion remained substantially unaltered. In the last place it was possible to fix the proportion of the grants on the basis of the amounts locally raised for medical relief; and here the result came out even better than in the other cases, because in Scotland the total amount raised by local grants for medical relief was four times as much as was received from the Imperial Exchequer. Therefore, he submitted that whichever of these bases was taken, a sum would be brought out which ought to be deducted from the grant to England and Wales, or paid in the case of Scotland, considerably greater than that by which he was moving the reduction of this Vote. The House had had this claim for equalization so frequently before it that he and his hon. Friends were prepared for the arguments that would probably be urged against it. One of these had commonly been, that, admitting that this medical relief grant to Scotland was unfair and unjust, other grants in aid of local matters were in excess of what they ought to be. In respect of lunatics, for instance, Scotland received a larger sum than was strictly proportionate; but to this he demurred.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that this was purely an English Vote, and that only by way of illustration could the hon. Member refer to the Scotch question.

MR. COCHRAN - PATRICK submitted, of course, to the ruling of the

Mr. Cochran-Patrick

Chairman. He was merely about to urge that the argument he had referred to might be an excellent one for some purposes, but that it was by no means applicable to the case of medical relief. Then another argument was that the circumstances and conditions which existed in England were different from those in other parts of the Empire. But he was bound to point out that, with respect to the proportion of the English grant, it was regulated by the proportion paid by the locality. That sum in England was indicated by the Vote; but in Scotland it was four times in excess of it, and Scotland, therefore, stood in that respect in a better position. Now, while he was not prepared to say of the system of grants in aid that it was the best or most satisfactory that could be devised, still it was the system that was in operation at the present moment, and until the House and the country had before them the details of any future measure that might be brought forward, he thought he was entitled to ask that the same principle should be applied to both England and Scotland. He hoped that the reply of the Prime Minister would not be put into the ordinary official and stereotyped phrases which for the last 12 years had been so often heard in connection with this subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £310,173, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in Aid of Local Taxation."—(Mr. Cochran-Patrick.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member in his concluding remarks had referred specially to himself, and had made an appeal which he was perfectly justified in making. For these reasons it might be convenient that he should at once give the explanation which the hon. Member had solicited. He must accompany that explanation, in some degree, with an apology to the Representatives of Scotch constituencies for his having been unable, owing to what he would call the abnormal circumstances of the Session, to take any steps in the direction indicated. Had the circumstances of the Session been of a normal character, the Government would have had more to say, and more to propose, in this matter than he could now suggest, as he had nothing to propose except the Votes as they stood before the Committee. It must be remembered that those Votes were prepared and agreed to by the Treasury at least seven months ago, when it was impossible for them to anticipate the state of things experienced during the Session. He did not wish to enter upon that subject, but was describing why they had been able to take no steps for the rectification of this particular anomaly. He would not follow the hon. Member through the details of his speech; but he might say that the subject was not new to the Government. A great number of Gentlemen representing Scotch counties and burghs took great interest in this matter, and had on former occasions raised and gone through the whole of the points connected with it. The Government certainly quite agreed that one of two things must be done. Either there must be some comprehensive measure which, while introducing a change in the method of granting subventions for local purposes, would absorb that and other questions in an extended plan; or, if that should not be the case, they must look to a plan of equalization, such as that suggested by the hon. Member. Of those two plans he would greatly prefer the former, because his impression was that it would be accompanied by very great public advantages, and by something of a decentralizing process, which would tend to an enlargement of local powers that would be exceedingly useful in all the Three Kingdoms, but in regard to which the people of Scotland, he might fairly say, were not, at any rate, behind those of any other portion of the United Kingdom in their capacity for administration. Any plan of that kind would probably be not only a fiscal plan, but it would have to be associated with measures for the complete establishment of representative local government throughout the country. However, he entirely agreed—and he came now to the more definite portion of the plan—that if they could not have the more general plans there must be equalization adaptable to this and some other particular Votes, but that adoption must be immediate. He meant that they must not again present the Votes in the shape in which they now were. To that proposition he quite agreed. He accepted much of what had fallen from the hon. Member on this subject, that the anomalies were too considerable, and that public opinion had been too much drawn to them not to allow of their removing of a great deal of the substantial dissatisfaction which justifiably existed upon this subject. He did not venture to look with any confidence to the course of Business, or to the proposals which it might be the duty of the Government to make in the next Session of Parliament. That would be premature, and he did not think it would be wise for him to indulge in prophecies of a definite character; but, with the feelings the Government entertained, he would not abandon the hope that they would be able to approach this subject with the more comprehensive views to which he had referred; but should they not be able to approach it with those more comprehensive views it would be their duty no longer to postpone particular equalizations, but to make careful examination of these Votes, and to establish real and substantial equality in the treatment of the two countries North and South of the Border. That, he believed, was what the hon. Member expected of him; and it was with a certain amount of satisfaction to himself that the hon. Member and his Colleagues had, in his position as a Member representing a Scotch constituency, an additional pledge, if such were requisite, that he was in earnest in the engagement which he now made.

MR. COCHRAN - PATRICK said, after the very satisfactory statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the Committee must have listened with the greatest satisfaction to the remarks which had fallen from the Prime Minister, because while the hon. Gentleman opposite might have just and reasonable ground for complaint with regard to the grant in aid of medical relief for Scotland, English Members had also ground for complaint that the Vote before the Committee had increased enormously year by year. He hoped, after the statement of the Prime Minister, that hon. Members might, upon the lines indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, look forward to the whole question of local subventions being dealt with.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had for the last two years called the attention of the President of the Local Government Board to the subject of workhouse schools. There was no doubt that pauper children were not receiving the education which they ought to have under the present system, and he had always urged that they should be allowed to go to the schools in the district, instead of remaining in the workhouse schools. He was glad to hear that this would be done wherever it was practicable. Hon. Members knew very well that the present system tended to keep children as paupers, and to make them feel that they were paupers, while the true object was to encourage feelings of an opposite kind, and to teach them that they must hereafter support themselves. This matter was one which undoubtedly ought to engage the attention of the President of the Local Government Board; and he would take the opportunity afforded by the present Vote of asking the right hon. Gentleman whether any steps had been taken to secure accommodation for children outside the workhouse schools, and what arrangements had been made to enable them to attend the schools in their various districts and localities?

MR. DILLWYN pointed out that there was a great increase in this Vote for the present year. The Committee were asked to vote £2,949 more than in the previous Estimates for salaries and wages, £100 more for a number of smaller items, £650 additional for a national vaccine establishment, £550 extra for incidental expenses, besides £2,300 additional for teachers in the Poor Law schools, and £4,300 for Poor Law medical officers. These items made up a total increase amounting to the very large sum of £10,556, concerning which he hoped that some explanations would be forthcoming. For his own part, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in saying that he would rather see the people themselves manage their affairs than that they should be managed for them by central offices; and he would like to see the central departments act as courts of appeal, instead of, as was too often the case, courts of interference. For these reasons he regarded the increased expenditure of this Department with jealousy, and trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to state the reason for the large addition to the Vote of last year.

Mr. Rylands

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he should like to supplement the remarks of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) with reference to workhouse schools. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend was justified in saying that this was a matter which ought to engage the attention of the Committee and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. But he wished also to say a word or two upon a matter cognate with that to which the hon. and gallant Baronet had referred. Something had been done in recent years in the way of boarding out pauper children. That was undoubtedly a most interesting experiment; but it was also one which required to be worked with great care and supervision. The large pauper establishments for the education of children in London, and which, he supposed, also existed in the large Provincial towns, were, he thought, necessary evils. They were certainly a step in advance of the workhouse schools referred to by the hon. and gallant Baronet; but, at the same time, he did not think they were as entirely free from the pauper taint as they ought to be. In his view, the better system would be to bring up the children entirely out of the atmosphere of pauperism. The boarding-out system he had alluded to was one that ought to be closely watched, in order that it might not degenerate into a system of farming out, which, as the Committee were well aware, was open to great abuses. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would state how far that system had been applied, and whether he could see his way to extend it in the urban and rural districts of the country?

MR. RAMSAY said, he had on several occasions drawn attention in Committee of Supply to the subject adverted to by his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). He had no wish to detain the Committee by discussing the merits of the case, but would remark that the grounds on which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had founded his reasons for placing pauper children in other than workhouse schools were sufficient to satisfy the Committee that the present system ought to be brought to an end. He trusted that an effort would be made to bring about a proper system of education for pauper children, and that the right hon. Gentleman would explain whether any progress had been made in that direction or not. This subject had been talked about for many years past; but nothing had been done in the way of carrying out the views of those who felt that the education of pauper children should not be conducted in establishments specially provided for them, where they became a sort of caste, but in the ordinary elementary schools, where they would learn to depend upon their own exertions for support, and not look to the workhouse as their home.

MR. T. COLLINS said, it was only to be expected that there should be an increase in these grants, seeing that, during the last decade, the population of the country had increased by 4,000,000. He believed everyone would agree that, if possible, the children of paupers should be educated in the nearest elementary schools.

MR. DODSON said, in reply to the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that it was the policy of the Local Government Board to encourage the transfer of pauper children from workhouse schools to ordinary elementary schools. The number of those transferred in this way was steadily increasing, and he might add that the standards were now assimilated in workhouse schools to those of the schools under the Privy Council; while the number of children boarded out under the system referred to by the hon. Member for Oxford University (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was between 700 and 800. He quite agreed with the hon. Member, and the authorities were quite alive to the fact, that the system of boarding out required that great care should be exercised to prevent its degenerating into one of farming. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had drawn attention to the increase of the Vote; and with regard to that, he was afraid he must say that, unless and until the grant in aid was taken in hand, when possibly some reduction might be effected, the increase would continue. The principal heads of increase were those of wages and salaries in connection with Poor Law schools and infirmaries. The former would be accounted for by the fact that the teachers were of a higher class than formerly, with higher certificates, and were entitled to higher pay in consequence. Precisely the same reasons operated in the case of the Vote for Medical Officers, who were, year by year, becoming men of a higher class, and, therefore, entitled to increased pay. To a certain extent, the growth of the Vote was owing, as the hon. Member for Knaresborough (Mr. T. Collins) had observed, to the growth of the population.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the Vote included a sum of £350 for analysis of water. He thought that was one of the most important subjects that could come before the Local Government Board. It was notorious that the water supply in many parts of London was extremely bad, and only recently there was an apprehension that the gravest consequences would result from its actually "giving out," to adopt an American phrase. There was a very good letter in the newspapers the other day upon that very point, in which it was suggested that the only remedy was to provide a continuous supply. Where there was a large, overcrowded population, there was always a chance of neglect, and the present system of providing only an intermittent supply worked very badly, and might, in cases of extreme drought, produce highly injurious consequences. The want in London of a continuous supply was a very serious one. Such a supply was given in a good many Northern towns of the Kingdom, and was found to work with great satisfaction; and he certainly failed to see why a supply of the same kind should not be provided in London. Of course, it would involve additional expense; but in a city like London that ought not to be a matter of consideration. He believed that the Water Scheme of the late Government included a provision for a continuous supply; and he hoped, now that they were under a Liberal Government, that there would be no occasion to regret that the policy of the late Government had not been carried out. He trusted to hear from the President of the Local Government Board that the question was seriously under the consideration of the Government, and that they were endeavouring to provide some means for securing a better, a more regular, and in every way a more satisfactory, supply of water for the inhabitants of London.

MR. DODSON: The hon. Gentleman has called attention to this item, which has reference solely to the supply of water for the Metropolis. The Vote is for a monthly analysis of the water supplied by various Companies in different districts of the Metropolis. These analyses are published monthly, and are very valuable, affording, not only information to the householders who consume the water, but also to the different Companies which supply it. It is highly desirable that both should be regularly informed of the nature and condition of the water supply. With regard to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to legislation on the subject, I would remind the hon. Gentleman of what I said the other night in answer to a question that was put to me. A Bill on this subject was introduced by the late Government, and it was only interrupted by the Dissolution of Parliament. That Bill was in the hands of the Home Office of the late Government; and my right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary, when he took Office, found the subject was being dealt with there. Accordingly, it was taken up by him last Session, and he had a Committee to inquire into the subject. The necessary Notices were given in the Autumn for the introduction of a Bill dealing with the establishment of a Water Trust for the Metropolis in the present Session; but a Bill of that kind necessarily touches very large pecuniary interests, and the Government felt that it was undesirable to introduce the Bill unless they saw a reasonable certainty of being able to carry it through. The prospect of Business this Session, I regret to say, has been such that they have not felt themselves justified in the circumstances in presenting that Bill to the House; but I can assure the hon. Member that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has not lost sight of the subject.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he rose to submit the Motion which stood in his name in regard to Vote 16—namely, to move that the Inspector's salary, and the travelling, personal, and incidental expenses connected with highways in South Wales, amounting to £844, should be disallowed. The Committee would remember that last year he took exception to this Vote. He felt that it was unjust to the taxpayers of England that they should have to pay for the inspection of roads in South Wales, whilst the ratepayers throughout the Kingdom in every other part had to pay for the inspection themselves. There might be some explanation required to show why this anomalous state of things existed. It would be in the recollection of all the old Members of the House that some 40 years ago there was a very great disturbance in South Wales in consequence of the closeness of the different toll-gates on the turnpike roads. That dissatisfaction resulted in the destruction of the gates in different parts of the Principality. The Government then appointed a Commission to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case. That Commission reported in favour of many of the gates being removed, also in favour of no gates being allowed within less than seven miles of each other, and recommended that a Superintendent of Roads should be appointed by the Government, and that the sum of £225,000 be advanced from the National Exchequer to pay off the mortgages upon these turnpike trusts. That sum of £225,000 was to be repaid at the rate of £5 5s. per cent, the repayment to extend over a period of 30 years. Sir James Graham, who was then Secretary of State for the Home Department, recommended the adoption of the Report of the Commission, and the result was that an Act of Parliament was passed appointing a Superintendent of Roads. The money was advanced, and, to secure its repayment and the proper maintenance of the roads, the Exchequer had to pay the annual expenses of their inspection. But the money had now been paid off for upwards of five years. On the 9th of March, 1876, the final balance of the debt due to the Public Works Loan Commissioners was reported to be paid at once. Therefore, it appeared to him that, the money having been refunded, there was no necessity for the continuance of an Inspector at the expense of the National Exchequer. If such an Inspector was to be continued in South Wales, he thought the ratepayers of England and of North Wales had a right to complain, or to require that the Inspectors of their roads should be appointed by the Government and paid for by the National Exchequer. Either one course or the other should be taken; and, therefore, he begged to move that the allowance of £844 for the inspection of the South Wales roads be discontinued, and that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £844, that being the amount at present paid to the Inspector of Roads.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the Question having been put from the Chair to reduce the whole Vote by a certain sum, it is not competent now to move the reduction of the Vote by any particular item.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if it was not competent to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £844?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is perfectly competent for any hon. Member to make a Motion to that effect, but not to move that the Vote be reduced by a specific item.

MR. DUCKHAM said, that, under these circumstances, he would move the reduction of the Vote by that particular sum.

THE CHAIRMAN: By what amount?

MR. DUCKHAM: By the sum of £844.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £329,329, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board, including various Grants in aid of Local Taxation."—(Mr. Duckham.)

MR. PUGH said, the South Wales Turnpike Act provided that the Superintendent should be appointed and paid by the Secretary of State, with power to remove him and appoint another in his stead, if necessary. The further provision that the Act should expire at the time the money was paid off was not made. He thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) was in error as to the date on which the money was paid off. The whole, he thought, had not been paid off as long as five years ago; but he believed it was paid off now. Perhaps the grant might be wholly indefensible in principle; but, looking at the circumstances as they stood, he thought he should be able to show the Committee that there were good reasons for not withdrawing the grant at the present moment, even if they had power to do so under the terms of the Act of Parliament, which he doubted. He understood that the Government were coming forward next Session with a Bill which was to make a substantial contribution, in one way or another, towards the expenses of main roads. Whether that contribution would be made in the shape of giving up a certain portion of the assessed taxes, or in what other way, he was not able to say; but he gathered from what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and also from the Prime Minister, that there were good grounds for expecting a measure of that kind next Session. If that were so, it was not improbable that Superintendents or Inspectors employed by the Government would be required in order to see that the roads were kept in proper order. What had occurred in regard to the county which the hon. Member (Mr. Duckham) represented (Herefordshire) would prove his case. The roads there, formerly maintained as turnpike roads, had been made over to the different local authorities, and the various districts were now required to support their own roads; and in consequence of that they found it necessary to employ someone to superintend and inspect the main roads, in a similar manner to the officer who, in this case, was paid by the Government. The only difference was that in the case of South Wales the inspection of the roads was paid for by the Government, whilst in Herefordshire it was paid for by the local authorities themselves. No doubt, that appeared a hard case; but, looking at the fact that the whole question must necessarily form the subject of legislation next year, he thought the best course would be to leave the matter alone at present. He might remind the Committee that in the early part of the Session he had a Motion on the Paper, asking for an inquiry into the management of all the roads in South Wales—highways as well as turnpike roads. He had no doubt that inquiry was urgently needed. He believed every hon. Member would agree with him that the Highway Act at present in force in England was most unsatisfactory. There was a great deal to be said both for the South Wales Turnpike Act and also for the South Wales Highway Act; and if an inquiry were made into the working of these Acts it would be of assistance to the Local Government Board with a view to legislation next Session in regard to England. Such an inquiry should be not only undertaken, but should be complete; and he believed it would be found that a great deal of injustice was produced in consequence of the existence, at the present moment, of a kind of dual management. For instance, they had a turnpike road running one way, and a highway road running alongside of it, or branching off from it. The turnpike road had one set of clerks and trustees, and the highway road had another set of officers altogether. In the interest of South Wales and the country at large he hoped the President of the Local Government Board would be able to say that the Government proposed to initiate an inquiry into the working of these Acts during the coming Recess.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought that the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) had done good service in bringing this question before the Committee, because there could be no doubt that it was one of those matters which showed the unsatisfactory working of the Highway Act as it at present stood. They had been long promised that that Act should be amended; and he ventured to hope that his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board would be able to do something in that direction in another year. But, assuming that nothing was done, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Herefordshire would then be able to come with far greater force and ask that the people of England should have the same advantages extended to them as were now given to South Wales, and that their Surveyors should be paid in the same way as the Surveyors in South Wales were now paid. The right hon. Gentleman would then be on the horns of a dilemma. It would either be right that South Wales should have this privilege, in which case it would be right also that it should be extended all over England, or it ought to be discontinued in South Wales. The question was one which deserved the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. Many promises had been made that assistance should be given to the county rates in the direction of highway expenses.

MR. DODSON: I hope that it will not be necessary to enter into a discussion of the Highway Acts, or generally as to the mode of maintaining the highways. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) says that I may be placed on the horns of a dilemma, and that we should either provide Inspectors for all the different counties in England, or withdraw the Inspector for South Wales. The hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) has moved a reduction of the Vote; and, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, I must say that we cannot assent to it. In the first place, the Vote is for the salary and expenses of a gentleman who holds the post of Inspector during the present year, and who has been hard at work up to the present time in the discharge of his duties; and, moreover, if we were suddenly, and without notice, to get rid of his services, the county authorities have no power to appoint an Inspector in his place. Therefore, it is obvious that, for the present year, this Vote must be allowed to stand. My attention was called to the matter last year, I think by the hon. Member for Herefordshire. [MR. DUCKHAM: Yes.] I should have dealt with the matter this year, but for the circumstance that a Committee of the House of Lords had been appointed to inquire into the whole subject of highways, and that I understood they would extend their inquiry to the South Wales district. Under those circumstances, I abstained from making any proposal to the House this year. I understand that the Lords have taken evidence with regard to South Wales, and I think that next year one of three things will happen. Either the House of Lords will have presented to us some recommendation on the subject, which we may think so valuable that we may adopt it, or the subject of highways in England may be legislated for generally, in which case this South Wales district would be included in the measure, or the House of Lords will not offer us any suggestion which we think ought to be adopted, or we may find ourselves, from the circumstances of the Session, unable to legislate for the highways of England and Wales generally. In that case it would become the duty of the Government to deal with South Wales by itself, and it will be necessary to amend the South Wales Act so as to enable the County Boards in South Wales to provide for the payment of their own expenses.

Mr. Pugh

MR. DUCKHAM accepted the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and, at the same time, confessed that he was disappointed that no steps had been taken in the matter. He had hoped that, having brought the question clearly before the Committee last year, something might have been done this year to alter the position of affairs. The hon. Member for Cardigan-shire (Mr. Pugh) said that he was wrong in his dates. He believed his hon. Friend was mistaken, and that, on inquiry, he would find that his dates were perfectly correct.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he rose to call the attention of the President of the Local Government Board and the Committee to a serious grievance arising under the present administration of the Poor Law Department of the Local Government Board. He had intended to move the omission of the item for the inspection of Workhouse Schools; but as he was now too late to do that, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500. The grievance he had to lay before the Committee arose out of the manner in which the Act for the transfer of pauper Catholic children in the workhouse to certified Catholic schools, fitted for the reception of such children, was carried out. Down to the year 1862 the Catholic pauper children, the miseries of whose parents had forced them to go into the workhouse, were brought up absolutely as Protestants. There was no provision made whatever for their transfer to any schools in which they could be brought up in the Catholic religion. However, in the year 1862, an Act was passed enabling Boards of Guardians to transfer to certified Catholic schools Catholic pauper children; but as the onus of doing a duty of that kind was thrown on the Boards of Guardians, the Boards of Guardians throughout England were rendered arbitrary in the matter, and, with a few honourable exceptions, they had declined to avail themselves of the powers of the Act, the result being that nearly all the Catholic children were still kept in the workhouse schools, which were, to all intents and purposes, Protestant schools. Upon complaints being made, a further Act was passed some years later, by which the Local Government Board was empowered, if it thought fit, to transfer Catholic children to Catholic schools. There had been placed in his hands proofs of the manner in which the Local Government Board was discharging the duty laid upon it by the Legislature. He had a statement made by the Rev. B. Wrigley, of Stratford, respecting the religious education of Catholic children at the West Ham Union Schools from 1874 to 1881. These children were, to a very large extent, of Irish extraction, and the Reports showed how they were treated in the West Ham Union Schools. He found, in regard to the opportunities of instruction afforded there, that children were permitted to attend Mass on Sundays, except in wet weather, or from any cause such as the prevalence of small-pox, or any other epidemic in consequence of which it was considered necessary to prevent them from attending. Such a cause was considered quite sufficient to prevent Catholic children from going out of the workhouse and attending any course of Catholic religious instruction. The result was that sometimes for a period of two months Catholic children in the West Ham Workhouse had been unable to attend Catholic worship. If they had been in the Catholic certified schools, means would have been provided for them to allow them to attend the worship prescribed by their own religion. The only opportunity of instruction given to the Catholic school children was on Wednesday, from half-past 10 until 12 o'clock in the morning—only an hour and a-half a week. No Prayer Books were provided by the Guardians for the use of the children on week days; but on Sundays those who were allowed to go to church were supplied by the Board with Prayer Books for their use during Divine Service. No Catechisms were provided by the Guardians, nor was the Catholic priest allowed to provide them himself. The Catholic priest made an application to the Board on November 29, 1879, to be permitted to provide Catechisms for the use of the Roman Catholic children while the Protestant children were receiving religious instruction; but the application was refused. All Catholic children were required to be present at prayers daily. The priest objected to this; and, for a time, his remonstrance prevailed; but now they were all obliged to assist in these prayers. The children had thus only an hour and a-half during the entire week for religious instruction, and they were deprived of every opportunity of studying their own religion during the rest of the week; and, the priest being forbidden to provide books for religious instruction at his own expense, the result was that when the priest met his flock on the Wednesday for an hour and a-half, he found the children thoroughly imbued with those anti-Catholic prejudices which little children, mixing all the rest of the week with Protestants, were certain to imbibe. The most obsolete trash of bye-gone times, so far as religious prejudices were concerned, and which now only survived in the lowest classes of society, were instilled into the minds of these poor children. He might add that, for two years from 1874, the Guardians of the West Ham Union invented the most peculiarly ingenious system of religious persecution against these poor Catholic children that it was possible to devise; and he was sure that every Member of the House would be ashamed to think that any body of Englishmen could be guilty of such petty and wretched intolerance. From May, 1875, down to the year 1877, an alteration was made by the Guardians in their regulations, by which the Roman Catholic priest was only allowed one hour weekly—namely, from 8 to 9 in the morning, for the instruction of Catholic children, and as that was the time set apart in the school for recreation, these poor little children had the alternative given to them either of giving up their recreation or their religious instruction. The consequence was that, knowing they were shut out from the playground when their Protestant companions were enjoying recreation, they bitterly resented the regulation, and if they came in at all, they came in as mutineers, full of the worst feelings towards the priest, whom they regarded as solely to blame. That miserable persecution was kept up for the space of two years, and even now only an hour and a-half was given in the whole week for instructing Catholic children in their religious duties. The result was that these children, though still on the books as Catholics, were, without exception, anti-Catholic. They refused to say their prayers when they came in for instruction, or to answer any questions with regard to their Catechism. They were deliberately deprived by the Guardians of the Poor of every opportunity of being brought up in the religion of their parents; and they were exposed during the whole week to the anti-Catholic influences which were brought to bear against them. The consequence was that although they were nominally Catholics until they reached 14 years of age, when they attained that age they preferred to rank themselves as Protestants. Every effort had been tried to remedy this grievance. Deputations of Catholic ratepayers had waited on the Board of Guardians; but all to no effect. But the Local Government Board had it in its power to provide a remedy. It was empowered by the Act of Parliament, wherever it thought fit, to remove Catholic pauper children to certified Catholic schools, and there were abundant schools of that character provided by the Catholics all over the Kingdom—infant schools, schools for children of more matured years, and schools in which, in addition to religious instruction, they were taught carpentry and many other useful professions. But because they were Catholics their rights were destroyed, and their parents' rights were destroyed in their persons, all because the Local Government Board refused to exercise the powers conferred upon them under the Act. Of course, the words of the Act said that the Local Government Board were only to exercise this power "if they thought fit," and this latitude had been exercised in a way which was highly detrimental to the interests of the Catholic children. The same complaint might be made with regard to the district school of Forest Gate, in Essex. There the children were allowed to go to Mass on Sundays according to a general rule; but, for religious instruction, the priest was only allowed to visit them one day in the week—on Monday, from 2 to 4 p.m.—and as he had to visit first the boys over seven years of age, and then the girls over seven years of age, there was only one hour for religious instruction to any single Catholic child. No Prayer Books or Catechisms were furnished, and those which were furnished by the Catholic clergy were soon destroyed or lost. The children themselves said that they were torn up by their Protestant playmates. In November, 1876, an application was made that Catechisms should be supplied by the Roman Catholic priests for the use of the children, to be distributed by the schoolmaster and mistress to the children at stated times, when Protestant children were receiving their religious instruction; but the application was refused by the Board. With regard to receiving the Sacrament and the administration of the Eucharist, it was the law of the Catholic Church that the Eucharist should be received fasting. That ordinance differed from that of the Protestant Communion. An application was made that at Easter time, when all Catholics were bound to receive Communion, a certain number of the children should be permitted to fulfil their Easter duty. It was necessary that in order to fulfil that duty they should go to Communion fasting on Easter Sunday morning; but the Board refused to allow the privilege, and one poor little girl who tried to refrain from taking breakfast, so that she might fulfil her duty, was forbidden by the schoolmistress, and even beaten with a cane until she did eat her breakfast. It was humiliating to have to relate to the House these miserable little stories; but the result in the Forest Gate School was just the same as in the West Ham Union School. The promise made to the Roman Catholics of the country was being kept to the ear, and broken in every other sense. There were not sufficient opportunities for bringing up Catholic children in the religion of their parents; and, of course, being continually in contact with Protestantism of the most coercive and ignorant kind, and being constantly bullied by Protestant children—for in Forest Gate the Catholic community only numbered 90 out of 650 children—and being subjected to raillery and abuse of every description, both boys and girls, long before they came to the age when they could decide for themselves what religion they would adopt, got ashamed and discontented with their own religion, and represented themselves to be Protestants. Even those who attended the religious instruction provided for them maintained a hostile attitude during the religious service, and treated it with contemptuous derision. He would mention only one case, that of a girl 12 years of age, who was sent to the school by the Guardians of Whitechapel. She had been well instructed in the Catholic school in Spitalfields; but after a very short experience of her new abode, she found that she did not dare make the sign of the Cross, even when the nuns were present. She found, further, that the other children ridiculed her in the dormitory when she attempted to say her Catholic prayers at night, and that she was so laughed at and derided that she very soon abandoned all religious ideas. The general result was that these children soon picked up all the stupid stories about Catholicity which were instilled into their ears, and when brought up for Catholic instruction they turned round and positively insulted the priest, saying that the Catholics worshipped images, that they adored the Virgin, and making use of all the other rubbish which in bye-gone days had been applied to the Roman Catholic religion. With regard to Forest Gate, he had with him a list of the Catholic children who were brought up under these anti-Catholic influences, and he found they included the names of Barrys, Sullivans, O'Connors, and others. That showed their Irish extraction. They were evidently the desolate offspring of poor Irish Catholic parents who came over here under the ægis of British toleration, and this was the manner in which they were brought to deny the faith of their forefathers. It was very pitiful and very wretched, and if the Boards of Guardians had any idea or knowledge of what was going on, the fact that they took no course to stop such a system of persecution was most astounding. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that the Local Government Board had the power to transfer these children to certified Catholic schools; and, therefore, the whole responsibility rested upon the Local Government Board. Thousands of applications had been made to the Local Government Board for the admission of pauper Catholic children into certified Catholic schools; but they had been left entirely without answer. It could only be said of the Local Government Board that the steps they had taken certainly tended to nullify the benefits which were proposed to be conferred upon the Catholics by the Act of the Legislature. When an application was made to them for the removal of a Catholic child to a Catholic certified school, they required not only that the child should have been entered upon the books of the workhouse as a Catholic, but that the parents should also be so entered upon the workhouse books. Further, they insisted upon a certificate of the child's baptism; and in some cases a certificate of the marriage of its parents. If the parent was dead then they required a certificate of his burial, and so forth. These regulations involved an enormous amount of trouble and expense, and the trouble and expense were thrown upon the Catholic body in order to satisfy the requirements of the Local Government Board. It was the only case in which he believed such excessive precautions were taken. On all ordinary occasions the Register of the workhouse was allowed to be proof, and it certainly ought to be allowed as prima facie proof, pending the bringing forward of some strong case to show that the child was not a Catholic. In this case these requirements were enforced when there was really no denial whatever of the Catholic religion of the child. The religion was admitted for all ordinary purposes; but whenever it was proposed to transfer a Roman Catholic child to a Catholic certified school then all the ingenuity of red tape was brought into requisition, and certificate upon certificate was required to be piled up before the Local Government Board would consent to look at the application. For years and years past, to all intents and purposes, the Local Government Board had declined to carry out the will of the Legislature, and in the hands of the Local Government Board the Act of Parliament remained a dead letter. Hundreds and thousands of applications had been left altogether unattended to. The list of Catholic children, who between 1871 and 1880 had attained the age of 14, and had received nothing but Protestant education, was very large. They had been induced to give up the religion of their parents rather than struggle with the school authorities. He had given an idea of the manner in which the Local Government Board construed their duties. What was going on in the West Ham and the Forest Gate schools was going on in scores and scores of other schools; indeed, he was afraid that the same thing was practised in hundreds of Unions throughout the country. Every year applications were made to the Local Government Board for the removal of these onerous restrictions and precautions with regard to the multiplication of certificates; but the Local Government Board, relying upon their own interpretation of the words of the Act, which allowed the Local Government Board, "if they thought fit," to transfer the children, had simply not thought fit, and had left the Catholic children without Catholic instruction of an adequate kind, keeping them in a flagrantly aggressive anti-Catholic atmosphere under the influence of the worst kind of proselytism. By this means the faith of these poor little children had been stolen from them simply because they were the children of poor paupers whose circumstances had placed them under the Poor Law system of tolerant England. In formulating this grievance he was only able to lay the broad facts before the Committee. He had confined himself to as few points as he thought would be sufficient to establish the case. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board desired more proof he would undertake to occupy a number of continuous Sittings of that House with the enumeration of cases of hardship of this kind which had taken place all over England. In conclusion, he would say to the Members of the House that it was not merely the grievance and the injustice that these children were deprived of the Catholic instruction to which they had a right, but they were not even brought up as Christians, because while they were nominally on the rolls of the workhouse as Catholics they were really receiving no Catholic instruction whatever, and not being Protestants they received no Protestant instruction, although when they reached the age of 14 years they generally declared themselves to be members of the Church of England. That was merely the formula adopted for showing that they had ceased to be Catholics. The fact of the matter was that these children were without even Protestant Christian education, and they were turned out upon society without having received any religious instruction at all. The result was that they were constantly found in the police courts, and it would be seen from the cases that occurred there that the major part of them were of Irish extraction. The result of this was that the Irish nationality suffered the blame for the misconduct of these children, who, really out of hatred of Catholicity, had not been allowed to receive a Catholic education, and, at the same time, had received no moral or religious instruction whatever. The list he held in his hand contained the names of hundreds who had been deprived of every kind of religious instruction and turned into the gutter of sin and vice because the Local Government Board, in 99 cases out of 100, declined to carry out the munificent intentions of the Legislature, and to place these children in a position in which they could receive religious and moral education. It had been suggested that one of the reasons why the Local Government Board no longer attended to the applications for the transfer of Catholic children was, in fact, that some of the officials of the Local Government Board had grown weary of the multiplication of applications. These applications were originally enforced in order to prove that it was a Catholic child who was being transferred; but the multiplicity of certificates now required to be produced was most obstructive to the interest of the Catholic claimants, and it turned out to be extremely worrying and unpleasant to the Local Government Board officials, who, in the first place, had insisted upon them. In point of fact, the very multiplicity of the restrictions and precautions required to be observed by the Catholic body had grown distasteful to the Local Government Board, and in order to get rid of the burden they refused to pay any attention to the applications. He could give instances in connection with schools in the Metropolis to justify this assertion. He hoped the present head of the Local Government Board would give the Committee some assurance that he would take immediate steps for the transfer, from one end of England to another, of every Catholic child in regard to whom due application was made for such transfer so as to insure that he should be brought up in the religion to which he belonged. No claim was made which would involve any increase of money or increase of charge; in fact, he believed there would be a saving; but, at any, rate nothing more was demanded in any case than that the child should receive as much as a scholar would cost in a Protestant workhouse school. The Catholics were willing to take the children upon any terms if the Guardians would name their own figure. They were anxious to stand by these poor little ones and obtain for them a moral and religious training, and that freedom and liberty of conscience which ought to be respected in such poor helpless human beings.

Mr. O'Donnell

Mr. O'Donnell

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has not concluded with a Motion.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had intended to move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he had no desire to prolong the discussion; but the subject was one of great interest, and he had been for some years a Guardian in the parish of Marylebone. Some time ago he moved for a Return for the purpose of showing the cost of maintaining these children in the workhouse and in the certified Catholic schools. He believed when that Return was laid on the Table—and he was surprised that it had not yet been produced, as it was many weeks since he moved for it—that it would astonish some hon. Members of that House. As far as he remembered, there was one workhouse in London in which the average cost of each child maintained in the workhouse was very nearly £60 a-year; and yet the same workhouse authorities would only allow a starvation price to a certified Catholic school. There was a school in the East End of London where a large number of children were received. It received at this moment a very large number of very young children, and the sum paid by the Guardians was not sufficient to give them bread and water. The consequence was that the persons in charge of these children were continually begging in order to obtain sufficient means to feed the children without coming upon the rates of the Metropolis. As the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had pointed out, the Catholic authorities were willing to take the children for nothing sooner than their faith should be perverted in the workhouse in the manner which had been described; but he was sure it was not the intention of the Legislature, or the wish of the President of the Local Government Board, that the expense should be entirely thrown upon the Roman Catholic population in order to save the Metropolitan rates. When the Return he had moved for was produced, he meant to ask the right hon. Gentleman to use the legal powers of the Board as far as possible in requiring Boards of Guardians to pay the whole expense which was legitimately chargeable upon them, and to compel the Boards of Guardians to pay for each child what the cost of its maintenance would be in the workhouse. The hon. Member for Dungarvan complained that the children were not transferred, and he thought the hon. Member had made out a strong case against the authorities. He did not see why the Local Government Board should allow any Catholic child to remain in a workhouse school at all. The Board had absolute power to command the Guardians to transfer such children; but nothing except the exercise of the arbitrary powers possessed by the Board would induce the authorities to put in force the powers they possessed. It had been a great scandal and a shame for many years. He knew a workhouse school where the Catholic chaplain had to trudge two or three miles two or three days a-week in order to teach the children who were in the school, and who the Guardians refused to transfer. The Guardians thought that they were doing the chaplain a great favour when they allowed him to go in and give the children two or three hours' instruction a week for nothing. Such was the extraordinarily perverted view they took of their duty in the matter. They seemed to have no religious ideas in the matter at all, nor to desire to do unto these children as they would be done unto themselves. Men who were perfectly fair on every other subject were blinded by prejudice and ignorance when this question of religion came up. He had no doubt, as the hon. Member for Dungarvan had pointed out, that the result was most injurious to the State, because the effect was to turn out a large number of children who were neither Catholics nor Protestants, but who were simply nothing more than half-educated heathens.

MR. HIBBERT said, he thought the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) was in error in supposing that the Local Government Board had power to transfer all Roman Catholic children to Roman Catholic schools. They had, however, the power of transferring Roman Catholic children on the application of certain persons; but it was impossible for them to override the wishes and decisions of the Guardians in respect to Roman Catholic children. He did not deny that there existed among many Guardians in this country a great amount of prejudice, and even intolerance, with respect to this question; but the Local Government Board would be glad to see all these cases treated in a broad spirit, and, as far as possible, in the spirit of the Act, which was framed so as to do justice to the Roman Catholic sentiments of the people. He denied the statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that there was a great number of applications for the transfer of Roman Catholic children. If the hon. Member could substantiate what he had said he would have made out a strong case not only against the Boards of Guardians, but also against the Local Government Board; but he thought there was great exaggeration in the hon. Member's remarks. He had stated that from 1871 to September, 1880, there had been hundreds, and almost thousands, of cases in which application had been made for sending Roman Catholic children to Roman Catholic schools. He could not say what took place between 1871 to the time when the present Government took Office; but he did know that in the last 16 months there had not been before the Local Government Board more than 12 or 14 such applications. He quite admitted that there had been a great amount of dissatisfaction on the part of the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church as to the way in which Roman Catholic children were treated at Forest Gate School and at some schools in the Metropolis. [MR. CALLAN: Every school.] He could not admit that, because, in a recent conversation with a very high dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church, that gentleman said that with respect to several schools there was no complaint at all. [MR. CALLAN: Name, name!] The conversation was a private one, and therefore he did not think it right to give the name.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order, and protested that if a Roman Catholic dignitary was to be referred to in that way his name ought to be given.

Mr. Macfarlane

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a question of Order.

MR. HIBBERT said, he should be glad to give the name outside.

MR. CALLAN: It should be given here.

MR. HIBBERT, resuming, said, that with respect to some of the cases that had been brought before them, the Local Government Board had so far overridden the wishes and decisions of the Guardians as to recommend that children should be sent to Roman Catholic schools; and in other cases they had recommended the transfer of Roman Catholic schools. In some cases the Guardians had shown that every arrangement was made for the religious instruction of the Roman Catholic children, that they were visited by Roman Catholic priests, and were able to attend services in their own churches; and, in such cases, if the Guardians had expressed a decided objection to those children being transferred, the Local Government Board had not overridden their wishes and decisions. For himself, if he found in any case that the children were being treated as the hon. Member for Dungarvan had stated, he should consider that the Local Government Board would be justified in overriding the decision of the Guardians and transferring the children to Roman Catholic schools. The hon. Member for Carlow said that in many cases the amount paid for Roman Catholic children was very low; but he (Mr. Hibbert) believed that in every case in which an order had been issued by the Local Government Board for the transfer of children they had required payment to be made equal to the cost of the education and maintenance of the children in the workhouse. An inadequate amount might have been paid where the Board had no control; and they had no control when the Guardians had themselves agreed to transfer children. In such cases they paid what they liked; but he thought the spirit of the Act was that an equal amount should be paid. Then, again, the policy of the Local Government Board, at all events since he had been there, had not been antagonistic to the Roman Catholic children or to the wishes of the Roman Catholics who desired to protect those children. They had desired, while, of course, taking notice of the wishes of the Guardians, to make every allowance for the strong feeling of the Roman Catholics themselves. They wished to do fair justice between both parties; and, if they had any leaning at all, it was rather to carry out the desires and wishes of the Roman Catholics.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he could scarcely think the answer of the hon. Gentleman quite satisfactory. With regard to the powers of the Guardians, the Act declared that any Board of Guardians might send any poor children to any school properly certified and supported wholly or in part by voluntary subscriptions, and the managers of which were willing to receive them, and might pay for the maintenance of such children a sum not exceeding the total sum which would have been charged for their maintenance in the workhouse. And the 2nd section of the Act provided that, on the application of the parents or other persons specified, the Guardians might send the children to some school. There had been several discussions in the House as to the difference between "may" and "shall" in Acts of Parliament, and all the lawyers had agreed that "may" was practically "shall;" and he, therefore, thought the Local Government Board should regard the word "may" in this case as "shall." He thought, further, that the Guardians ought to be compelled to do these things, because they were recruited from the ranks of the shopkeepers who were remarkable for bigotry. They were of all classes of society the least capable of appreciating the fact that, as a governing body, they had nothing to do with forcing their religion on anyone else. The Local Government Board represented a higher class of society and of feeling on religious questions than the shopkeepers, and they should encourage religious toleration. He did not think they would have any difficulty, if they took strong action in the matter, with the conviction that they had the moral authority of Parliament with them; and he hoped they would, in all cases which came before them, interpret the clause to mean "shall." The next question was as to expenses. He might be inclined to agree that the Guardians could not be asked to send these children to Roman Catholic schools if they caused greater expense than they would at the ordinary Board schools; but there was in England and Scotland a Roman Catholic population, which, though for the most part poor, had been generous enough to endow a certain number of Roman Catholic schools. That was a thing which, as a matter of interest and of duty, the Government ought to encourage. Then, as to the question of facts, as between the hon. Member for Dungarvan and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert), the hon. Gentleman said there had been only a few applications to the Local Government Board during his presence there. Of course, that statement would go forth to the proper authorities; the authorities of the Catholic Church would be able to see whether there had been sins of omission in this matter, and if they found there had been, their efforts would compensate for lost time. He wished the Local Government Board also to consider another point. The hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct in saying that applications should precede directions by the Board. That was evidently the intention of the Act. But he found in the Act the words "God-parent of such child;" and as a large number of these children were orphans, he thought it would be well if the Government would accept applications for the transfer of children from the pastors of the districts.

MR. HIBBERT: They do that.

MR. BIGGAR urged that the Local Government Board should apply a little more pressure to Boards of Guardians, in order to turn the balance in favour of Roman Catholic children. He did not desire to see them act unfairly towards the Guardians; but when it was found that the Guardians were disposed to favour Protestant children, he thought the Board would be justified in acting determinately against the Guardians. With regard to the religion of the pauper children, he knew that in Belfast, which was a very non-Catholic place, and where there had never been more than one Catholic Guardian on the Board at any time, a child was assumed to belong to the religion in which it was entered on the books until the contrary was proved, and the result was that in some cases, where there was room for controversy, fights of words took place. The Guardians in those cases gave a decision according to the evidence; but, as a rule, they threw no obstacle in the way of children being educated in the religion entered in the books. He thought that in England the statement of the person who brought a child to the workhouse as to the religion should be accepted as sufficient, without the registration of birth or of baptism being required.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was not at all surprised at this question having been raised, for there was a large amount of needless suffering endured by poor people in London, because they dreaded the danger of having their children proselytized if sent to the workhouse. He knew of numbers of children in London who ought, owing to the condition of their parents, to be in some institution for the relief of the poor, but who, because of that dread, were dragging out a miserable existence in the slums and pur-lieus, aided by such charity as the poor Roman Catholics could afford. He thought the words of the clause should be mandatory on the Guardians, and that was the interpretation put upon them by the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) when he was President of the Local Government Board, and by Lord Devon. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), when he was at that Department, said he did not think he ought to interfere with the Guardians on that matter, and the consequence was that the numerous applications made to the Guardians and to the Local Government Board were found to be a waste of time, and the great body of poorer Catholics became despondent and ceased to make applications. Of late the applications sent to the Board had, in a large number of cases, been treated with a fairness which could not be denied, and he wished to thank the President of the Board for that; but he hoped that an assurance would be given that in future every such application would be treated with the same amount of fairness. If that assurance could be given this discussion would not have been thrown away, and would be agreeably looked back to by the great body of Catholics throughout the country. He did not blame the Guardians or the Government, but he thought the Catholic bodies were to blame. The English Catholics were, in matters of this kind, more apathetic than any other body in the country, and they saw injustice inflicted on the poorer classes of their co-religionists in England without any reasonable effort to put an end to it. If they had taken the trouble which other religious bodies had taken to secure representation on Boards of Guardians, he was satisfied that one-half the complaints that were being continually dinned into the ears of the Catholic Irish Members would never be heard at all. When he first became a Guardian of the poor in London he found that the Catholics in the workhouse of the Union to which he belonged had not been allowed to go to Mass for five months; and the admission of a priest was so arranged, once a week, that it was a perfect farce for him to pretend to administer to the religious requirements of the inmates. There were no Catholic Prayer Books issued to the Catholic paupers, although Prayer Books were supplied to the Protestants, and many Catholic children were being sent to Catholic schools. Well, he had not been on the Board a week before the Catholics were allowed to go to Mass, and he had not been there very long before Prayer Books were issued to them, and before the priest was permitted to attend the paupers at reasonable times. Every reasonable facility for continuing the observances of their religion which he could possibly have desired was granted to the poor Catholics, notwithstanding that he was but one Catholic against 19 Protestants on the Board. He was bound to say this—that in this Union, which, before, had been noted for its bigoted treatment of the Catholic children, directly there was a Catholic on the Board all the difficulties disappeared. The Catholics, he thought, were themselves to blame for what occurred in connection with Boards of Guardians. They did not attempt to obtain representation on them as they might and ought to do. He was very well satisfied with the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson); and he sincerely trusted that after to-night the grievances under which Catholics had suffered in this respect would gradually disappear. But there were certain other points connected with the administration of the Poor Law which he would venture to submit to the right hon. Gentleman, and they were points which came under the item referred to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). As to the old people in the workhouses, they had a right, if they were over 60 years of age and married, to have separate quarters; but he was perfectly certain that there was not a single workhouse in which the poor people were even acquainted with that right. He remembered when he, very rashly, as it was supposed, asked the poor people in a workhouse he was visiting if they knew of the existence of this right, the master and matron and one or two Guardians with him expostulated, and said this was a thing which ought to be kept from the knowledge of the poor people, because it would be such a terrible nuisance to have them in the married quarters. Then, as to the little children in the workhouses—children who were too young to be sent to school—their condition in some cases was most pitiable. He could take the right hon. Gentleman to a workhouse in London in which there were a considerable number—some 13 or 14—little children, too young to be sent to school, who never left the yard in which they were cooped up. The yard was not more than twice the size of the House Table, there was nothing to break the monotony of the children's lives, the toys which had been given to amuse them being carefully packed up and put away on the top of a cupboard. The children were not looked after as they should be, and the consequence was that they grew up delicate and unhealthy and utterly unfit to bear the rough life that was inevitably their lot. Then there was another thing that the Inspectors of these schools would do well to inquire into. There was a practice amongst bandmasters of regiments to go round to the different workhouse schools belonging to the Metropolitan district for the purpose of selecting therefrom for enlistment into the Army for their bands the most promising boys. Some of these boys were induced or allowed to join the band when they were very young—eight or nine or ten years of age—at a time when they had no idea what enlistment into the Army meant. They were taken into the band on condition that they would afterwards go into the Army, and this was done without any real opportunity being afforded to the relatives of the boys of expressing their wishes on the subject. The relatives—and on this matter he was speaking from experience—were not given to understand that the law required that they should have the power of going before the Boards of Guardians and expressing their desires and wishes as to the employments to which the children should be put. The Inspectors of the Department, he thought, would do well to look into this matter. He wished now to refer for a moment to an observation which fell from the Prime Minister, in reply to an hon. Member sitting near him, when this Vote first came on. The Prime Minister had said that he proposed next year to bring on this Vote in a different shape. He had gathered from the right hon. Gentleman that it was his intention to recast it. He would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it was desirable that it should be considerably modified. As would be apparent to everyone who had listened to the debate that evening, the Vote was of a very heterogeneous character. The discussion commenced with some observations about medical relief in Scotland, then it went off upon the analysis of water, then they heard about roads in Scotland, and so on. Each of these subjects was sufficiently important to occupy a separate Vote; and he would venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote that it would be desirable, if it could be done, to split it up into two or three different sub-Votes, in order that, in future, there might be something more like logical sequence and consistency in it. This would help to give hon. Members a clearer understanding of these matters, and, probably, to economize time.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to ask a question in regard to this Vote with reference to the payment of the analyst of water. He should like to ask to what extent analysts were employed by the Department? Personally, he thought it would be very desirable to extend the system of analyzing. Many articles besides water should be analyzed by some analyst who should be more or less responsible. The matter, he (Mr. Biggar) understood, was very much, if not entirely, in the hands of the local authorities at present; and he had reason to believe—in fact, he knew—that the local authorities neglected their duty in the most flagrant manner. He wished to know if it was not in the power of the Local Government Board to see that the local authorities employed analysts, and to see that the local authorities made the analysts do their duty, with the aid either of the police or the officers of health in certain districts?

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. DODSON: We have no power either to employ analysts or to compel others to employ them.

MR. HEALY said, there was a certain amount put down for auditors' clerks. How was it that the auditors in England were allowed clerks, when—according to the Votes—none were allowed to auditors in Ireland? Everybody knew that the work auditors had to do was to tot up accounts and check them, and unless they performed the work for which they were appointed it was no use having them. If an auditor threw the work upon another person—upon his clerk—he was not an auditor at all, but the clerk was the auditor. The auditors who were appointed were, no doubt, very experienced men; but if they were unable to do the work, other auditors should be employed to assist them. Two clerks were put down at salaries of £30 a-year. Was it a fact that this small amount was paid to men whose duty it was to check thousands and thousands of pounds? If so, it was a most unsatisfactory state of things. He could speak from experience of the auditors in Ireland. They got through their work in a most conscientious manner, and spent days in checking the accounts of each particular Union. Did the English auditors do the same?

MR. DODSON: The reason the auditors are allowed clerks to assist them, or work under them, is that the work has, of late years, been very largely increased. The auditors had, originally, only to audit the Poor Law Accounts; but now they have the School Board, Highway and Local Board Accounts to go through. Instead of employing more auditors, it has been found cheaper—and, at the same time, to work well—to appoint these clerks.

MR. HEALY said, that surely the right hon. Gentleman did not mean to say that a clerk at £30 a-year should have imposed on him the responsibility of checking accounts amounting to hundreds of thousands of pounds? The thing was preposterous. An auditor who went into a town might be very tired, or unwell, and the whole duty might be thrown upon an unfortunate clerk. The result might be that the ratepayers were not protected; and to tell the Committee that it was better to have these clerks than proper, experienced auditors, was a statement to which he could not subscribe. If the auditors in England required clerks, so did the auditors in Ireland, owing to their duty in connection with the Poor Law having been merged into that in connection with the Local Government Board. They had the Town Clerks' Accounts as well as the Poor Law Accounts to audit. What he wanted was a satisfactory assurance that these clerks were not persons on whom a great share of the work of auditing was thrown—that they had not cast upon them the responsibility of asserting that the accounts of the Unions and Local Boards were correct.

MR. DODSON: The whole responsibility of the work rests upon the auditor. I have never heard of responsibility having been imposed upon the clerks.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that in the matter of workhouse administration there was another point to which he wished to draw attention—one which, he thought, the Inspectors would do well to take in hand—namely, the treatment in the workhouse of the insane and imbecile. The comments of the Inspectors on this subject, even in the past, had been repeated and emphatic. In their Reports 3 and 4 they said they had frequently found it necessary to order the removal of decidedly insane patients, who ought, in the first instance, to have had the benefit of the silent treatment. They said, also, that in some of the larger workhouses they frequently met with patients suffering from long-standing melancholia, when they had reason to believe that if they had been subjected to proper treatment at first it would have resulted in their being cured. It was to be regretted, they said, that false ideas of economy should be allowed to have weight, and that a course should be pursued which could not fail to be prejudicial to the patients, and ultimately lead to the increase of the number of insane dependent on the rates. It did seem to be a terrible thing to think—what, unquestionably, was the case—that there were in the workhouses of this country a number of cases which, if they had been only taken in hand properly, and removed to places where they could receive suitable treatment in time, would have been, at any rate, if not cured, at least greatly relieved, and brought back to such a state that they could have been left in the hands of their relatives during the latter days of their lives. These people, being placed in the workhouses—which were, probably, the very worst places for persons mentally afflicted—were rendered hopelessly insane, and when they were taken to asylums it was found too late to do anything with them. The Inspectors said that it was customary to send to the asylums old, chronic cases, because they were troublesome, and that this often occurred where there were no special attendants for these cases in the workhouses. He would ask the Government to see that the Inspectors further inquired into this matter of the treatment of the insane. They would be astonished to find out how inadequate were the present arrangements. It was principally to country workhouses that objection was made. The Inspectors went on to say that, as to the management of workhouses, although the standard was higher than it was some years ago, yet, in many of the establishments, the treatment provided for imbecile paupers was open to grave objection. They found a want of supervision for epileptic cases, especially when the number of those cases was large.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £8,195, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England.”

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to one or two very simple facts in connection with this Vote, and the first was as to the population and the number of lunatics. In the year 1859, when the population was 19,500,000, the number of private lunatics was 4,900, and the number of pauper lunatics 31,000. In the year 1880, when the population had risen from 19,500,000 to 25,500,000, the private lunatics had risen from 4,900 to 7,600, and the paupers had increased from 31,000 to 63,000, so that where the population had increased 30 per cent and the private lunatics had increased considerably the number of pauper lunatics had more than doubled. That was one fact which he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to. The other fact was this. He knew a case where a man, through reverses of fortune, distress, and poverty, was, for a time, out of his mind. He was treated as a pauper lunatic. He was a man of considerable intelligence, and well educated and quite able to take stock, from time to time, of his own condition, and to appreciate his own advance towards recovery, and also to appreciate the things he saw in the workhouse. This man, whilst he was there, found that the alleged pauper lunatics were remarkable for two things, and two things only—namely, they were incorrigibly idle, and they all had good appetites. When this man was within a week or two of his discharge, the inmates learnt that the Inspectors were coming round. Some 48 hours before the advent of the Inspectors, a number of patients, who, up to that time, had appeared remarkably well, evinced signs of unrest, which went on increasing as the hours advanced. The evening before the Inspectors came they would insist on dressing themselves up in feathers and cutting all sorts of antics. On the morning of the Inspectors' visit they all refused to eat their breakfast, and made use of every sign that their ingenuity could devise to induce every casual onlooker to believe that they were seriously affected mentally. The Inspectors came, the visit passed over, the feathers were dropped, and the appetites revived. The man had not spoken of all, but of a very large proportion of the cases. Well, this little story, he thought, would account, to a great extent, for the enormous increase in the number of pauper lunatics. There were a large number of people in the pauper lunatic asylum who ought not to be there, and who knew perfectly well that they ought not to be there; but the Government gave 4s. a-week for every pauper in the Asylums, and it answered the purposes of the Guardians to transfer people who were a little troublesome in the workhouses to those places. It would be well if the Government would carefully consider what steps should be taken to meet this action on the part of the Boards of Guardians. He must say he was not prepared to suggest any; but it was not his business to do so. But probably the Government might be able to find time to bring about a thorough overhauling of the pauper lunatic asylums, and an investigation into the majority of doubtful cases—cases which were just sufficiently demonstrative to secure the keeping up of a staff which would not otherwise be required, and which gave that staff very little work to do. There was another question, as to the classification of lunatics in the workhouses; but that was a point on which he had already ventured to offer some remarks on a previous Vote, and he would not detain the Committee on it. However, there was one thing he had noticed on visiting more than one pauper lunatic asylum, and it must have struck everybody, no matter how casual their visit, and that was the utter want of occupation for the great majority of inmates. If there was one thing more than another calculated to help the restoration to a proper state of mind of a patient who had been suffering under mental aberration or melancholia, it was occupation. But the great majority of persons in pauper lunatic asylums were absolutely without anything but the merest show of occupation; and he was convinced that the life they led in these Asylums helped to confirm and render incurable any mental affliction from which they suffered. He was speaking only of the slighter cases. Then, as to the treatment of persons who were really fit subjects for treatment at the hands of medical men who dealt with cases of insanity. With respect to Colney Hatch Asylum, the District Visitors reported that the complaints of unnecessary detention were unusually numerous, and there were also very many complaints from both male and female patients that access to the medical staff was practically denied. Some of the patients knew the Chairman of the Visiting Committee by sight, and also the medical staff; but the patients were counted in wards periodically, but had no opportunity of making complaints. Then, again, the Visitors called attention to the method of keeping the case-book in this Asylum, which was certainly open to grave objections. The Act—16 & 17 Vict.—required that the case-book should be regularly laid before the Visitors for inspection; but the Visitors found that the entries as to the admission of patients were made on loose slips of paper, to be copied into the book when time would permit, perhaps after the discharge or death of the patient. The Visitors reported that in regard to the case-book the Act was not complied with, and he would like to know what the Home Secretary thought of Directors who permitted such a system as that. But it was not so much a question of correct record in each case, or of the numbers of patients who were unable to make complaints, but as to the treatment of the patients.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot discuss pauper lunatics generally under this Vote. The proper time will be on Vote 4, Class VI., where there is a special Vote for pauper lunatics.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was showing why the Committee should not vote this money for the Lunacy Commissioners, who, he thought, had not done their duty, for if they had, the Visitors would not have had to report these shortcomings. They further reported that, being present in the women's dining-room during dinner, they were somewhat surprised at seeing many rats sporting about in the hall.

THE CHAIRMAN: That subject does not properly come under the Vote for the Lunacy Commissioners. The subject the hon. Member is referring to will properly come under Vote 4 of Class VI.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked that the first item in this Vote was the salary of the Lunacy Commissioners; and, with all deference to the Chair, he thought he was entitled to question the right of the Commissioners to have this £1,500.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already informed the hon. Gentleman that the discussion as to particular asylums comes on on another Vote, and cannot be taken now.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he should not discuss particular asylums; but he was endeavouring to show why the Commissioners, for whom pay was here charged, ought not to have their pay voted without, at any rate, some explanation of their apparent shortcomings. That was his idea in bringing before the Committee what he believed to be blemishes in the work of the Commissioners. It seemed to him that the Commissioners ought to insist, for instance, on reasonable occupation being given to persons committed to their care. It was their business to see that the inmates of the asylums had every reasonable facility at their disposal for the recovery of their proper mental condition; but that was not done. In one asylum he found that five men out of seven had reasonable and healthy occupation; in another, only one in four. In one asylum six in ten were healthily occupied; but in another, only a short way off, only one in three. But as he failed to convince the Chairman of the propriety of the grounds upon which he made these remarks, he would quit that subject altogether, and say a few words upon the personal duties of the Commissioners. There were two or three things upon which they would do well to furnish information in their next Report. It was impossible, on an examination of the tables and statements given, to arrive at any reliable conclusion as to the rate of mortality in the asylums, although that was a very important matter. The Metropolitan Asylums Board furnished complete details as to the rate of mortality in the asylums under their control, and he would suggest that the Home Secretary should require the Commissioners in Lunacy to furnish similar information. He thought he had shown very good ground for the conclusion that the Commissioners had not justified the remuneration charged in this Vote, and he should therefore move to reduce the amount by £500 each, or £3,000. But as half the year had elapsed, there remained only half the financial year, he would now move to reduce the salaries by £250 each, or £1,500 altogether.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £6,695, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The course taken by the hon. Member is a somewhat singular one. The Lunacy Commissioners have hitherto been trusted largely by the country, and, as far as I know, they have had general confidence. But now the hon. Member comes forward with a series of charges against them of which no Notice is given, and to which, therefore, it is difficult for anyone on their behalf to make any response. Every one of the matters touched upon by the hon. Member is a subject which might occupy the attention of a Select Committee; and it seems to me that the view now taken of the manner of dealing with the Estimates is upon every Vote to enter upon matters with which it is impossible to deal in Committee of Supply. The hon. Member has challenged the whole treatment of the lunatics of England; but is it common sense or reasonable that such a matter should be gone into upon this Vote, when the matter is one which could not be dealt with except by hearing witnesses? This matter has been dealt with in a proper manner by a Committee of this House so lately as 1878. Within three years the whole of this matter has been investigated in the only possible way—by a Committee which went carefully into it day after day, and took evidence; and which, while suggesting that certain minor matters should be attended to, pronounced strongly in favour of the manner in which the Lunacy Laws had been administered. I venture to say that is the only complete answer to the charges made by the hon. Member. This House in Committee of Supply is wholly incapable of discussing this question. It has not the material, and it would be a waste of time to try to arrive at any conclusion. How are you to ascertain what is the cause of the increased number of lunatics? It is suggested that there are persons in these asylums who ought not to be there; but the Committee repudiated such a suggestion. It is also suggested that local authorities desire to fill the asylums with people who ought not to be there; but their object is to decrease the number of inmates. With regard to the Visitors having seen rats at Colney Hatch, I have read that in the houses of some of us—who are not lunatics, nor Lunatic Commissioners—there are rats; and that is hardly to be the foundation of a charge that these Commissioners are not competent for their duties. The hon. Member proposes to diminish the Vote which has for many years been given for these men, who have rendered public service; but to do that without any foundation for the charges made against them seems to me most unreasonable, and I must protest against the raising of questions, of which I do not dispute the importance, but with which it is utterly impossible for the Committee of Supply to deal. If the hon. Member is dissatisfied, let him ask for a Select Committee; and if it appeared that since the last Committee sat any material circumstances had arisen to lead to the conclusion that the lunatics had not been properly treated, I would do anything I could to assist him. But it is unreasonable on the 2nd of August to raise a question with which this House cannot deal in Committee of Supply.

MR. RYLANDS said, he rose immediately after the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, because he wished to say that he was not surprised the right hon. Gentleman should have expressed the opinion he had done as to the irrelevant nature of the criticisms upon the Vote to which they had just been listening. As an independent Member, acting with other independent Members, he felt very strongly indeed that the action of the Committee of Supply was, to a great extent, nullified by the course taken by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). He (Mr. Rylands) would certainly not assist in delaying the Vote further.

MR. J. COWEN said, he thought it was only fair in extenuation of the course pursued by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) to say that hon. Members were placed at great disadvantage in criticizing the Estimates, owing to the inconvenient time and manner in which they were brought forward. At the same time, he thought there was much force in what had been said by the Home Secretary, and he was of opinion that the accusations made against the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums were not at all borne out by the facts. Still, the subject was one well worthy of consideration.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,640, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Mint, including the Expenses of the Coinage."

MR. RYLANDS said, he rose for the purpose of calling attention to an item to which he had directed attention last year—namely, the Charge proposed for supplying silver to the Colonies. The Charge was for package, freight, and carriage of silver for the Colonies. While he did not object, in any way, to the practice of providing coinage for the Colonies, he did object to any charge being made under a Treasury Warrant, which had the effect of imposing the cost of providing the coinage upon the Exchequer of this country. The Treasury, under a Warrant dated June 14, 1871, declared that all the expenses should be paid by the Colonies; but that arrangement was altered in 1878, and since that year there had been a Vote for the freight and package of bronze and silver coin. He wished to point out to the Committee that there was no justification for giving that advantage to the Colonies, because we were allowing a very large amount of coin to be held by the Melbourne and Sydney Mints. He believed that the amount in 1879 reached £187,000, and, in addition, this country took back worn coin to a very large amount. He found that in 1880 the amount of worn silver coin received from the Sydney and Melbourne Mints reached no less than £87,614, and upon it there was a loss of from 12 to 14 per cent. So that in addition to this heavy loss upon worn silver, they were paying all the expenses of freight and packing. And while they were giving these advantages to the Colonies, advantages which, he thought, they had no right to receive, it appeared from last year's balance sheet, that there had been no less than £7,600 loss upon the transactions of the Mint during the last year. He would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, which was the cost of packing and freight, for the supply of silver and bronze coin to the Colonies.

Sir William Harcourt

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £20,640, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Mint, including the Expenses of Coinage."—(Mr. Rylands.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the charge for the freight of silver against the Colonies was only made in the case of Imperial coin sent there. In the case of Colonial coin taken by the Mint, the freight was included in the charge; but it must be borne in mind that there was a considerable profit realized from the Imperial silver coin sent to the Colonies. It was true that they had, by the arrangements now in force, undertaken to recall their old and damaged coin, and pay all expenses; but under ordinary circumstances, even when silver was at its normal value, there was a substantial profit upon the coinage. He did not think that they could insist upon the Colony using our silver coinage and, at the same time, charge them with the expense of exporting it. Silver was now very much cheaper than it used to be, and the profit accordingly was much larger.

MR. RYLANDS said, that what the noble Lord was stating was entirely contradicted by the balance sheet of the Mint. If he would look at the Report of the Mint, the noble Lord would find that there was an absolute balance of loss, without any charge upon the fixed amount of capital employed, of £7,658 upon the year.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that that loss was incurred in connection with the gold coinage, in regard to which no charge was made. It was somewhat curious, but it was nevertheless the fact, that the amount of coin called in bore inversely to the prosperity of the country. At times of prosperity, there was a greater demand for coin, and it was not paid into the Bank, and did not go to the Mint to be re-coined. The charge for re-coining old silver was heaviest at a time when there was not so much coin required for the use of the country. The result was, that in the year 1872, when the country was at the height of its prosperity, the profit to the Mint was £98,000; and at that time the Mint was sending out large quantities of new silver upon which it obtained a profit, while, at the same time, there was a very small amount of old silver paid in. The profit continued for two or three years, and it was not until 1876 that it became materially reduced. In 1877 the profit was only £22,000, and last year £12,858. But in the silver coinage sent out to the Colonies there was still a profit, and a substantial one. He did not think that they should insist upon the Colonies using our silver coinage, and then place them at the disadvantage of making them pay for the carriage of it.

MR. HEALY complained that the Vote included a sum of £5 for an Easter offering to the Vicar of St. Botolph's Without, Aldgate, and another to the Sexton of the Tower. He wished to know what these charges meant?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the Mint was an old establishment, and these were old charges which had always been paid by the Mint.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was sorry that he did not see in his place the President of the Board of Trade, because he would have suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that he should move again what he had once moved before, and what he (Mr. O'Connor), in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, would venture to move now—namely, the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, being the amount charged for freight and packing the supplies of silver and bronze coin to the Colonies.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had already moved the Amendment, and it had been negatived.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had not understood the hon. Member for Burnley to move the omission of this particular item.

MR. HEALY said, he should certainly feel inclined, unless the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury informed the Committee that he would look into the items he had called attention to and give an explanation of them next year, to move the omission of the sum charged for an Easter offering to the Vicar of St. Botolph. They might as well be asked to vote an Easter offering to the Archbishop of Canterbury or Cardinal Manning.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would give an explanation of that item upon the Report.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not understand the course taken by Her Majesty's Government. Only the other night they voted in favour of a proposal which they had strenuously opposed when in Opposition; and now there was another instance of a similar character. The President of the Board of Trade in former years had taken exception to this very item, and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), having put down a Motion for the reduction of the Vote, certainly had moved it, but immediately afterwards withdrew it.

MR. RYLANDS: That is altogether a false statement.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the expression which he had used, and which was quite irregular.

MR. RYLANDS: I will withdraw it at once, and substitute "inaccurate statement." I did not withdraw the Motion for a reduction of the Vote, and if the hon. Member had been in his place at the time, he might have voted for it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR objected to the tone which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) chose to adopt, and which was hardly Parliamentary. It was quite certain that the hon. Member was disinclined now to do that which he and those who acted with him always did when in Opposition—namely, carry their Motion to a division. It was a perfect farce to allow a charge of this kind to be passed quietly over when the Liberals were in power, and to be vehemently opposed when they happened to be out of Office. He would, therefore, move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

THE CHAIRMAN: For what purpose does the hon. Member propose to reduce the Vote by £1,000?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: For the expense of freight and packing.

THE CHAIRMAN: That has been done already, and cannot be repeated.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not repeat the Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member for Burnley, but he asked for a smaller reduction than that which had already been proposed and negatived. He thought he was fully in Order in making that proposition.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not in Order in moving the reduction of the Vote upon an item which has already been disposed of.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wanted clearly to understand that ruling. A Motion having been made for the reduction of the Vote by a certain sum, and that Motion having been negatived, was it not competent for him to move the reduction of the Vote by a smaller sum?

THE CHAIRMAN: I decline to be questioned by the hon. Member as to my ruling. I have ruled on this occasion that a Motion having been made on this particular subject, and having been negatived, the Motion just proposed by the hon. Member for Queen's County cannot be moved.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he merely asked for information. [Cries of "Order!"]

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £10,142, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury a question with regard to this Vote. It contained an item for the Pensions Commutation Board. He wished to know whether all the expenses connected with the Commutation Board were stated on page 123, or whether there were any other expenses connected with the Board? He would also be glad to elicit from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) whether he intended to proceed with the Notice he had given to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH stated that all the expenses connected with the Commutation Board were included in the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £17,438, to complete the sum for the Patent Office.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he had on several occasions when this Vote had been before the Committee called attention to the present state of the Patent Museum at South Kensington. At present the condition of that Museum was disgraceful, and the arrangements and dimensions of the Museum for containing the collection of Patents for objects which had made the country eminent, was altogether unworthy of the Nation. The condition of the Patent Museum had become a bye-word to every foreigner who visited this country. There was scarcely any arrangement for enabling visitors to inspect the Museum and see the models contained in it. The Museum should be of a most instructive character, for the purpose of inculcating technical education; but Reports had been made year after year condemning the arrangements. He held in his hands a Report presented 10 years ago, and almost every year since a similar Report had been made by the Patent Office Commissioners. The Report 10 years ago was to this effect, that it was intended to make the Patent Office Museum an historical and educational institution for the benefit and instruction of skilled workmen employed in the manufactories of the country—a class who largely contributed to the surplus funds of the Patent Office. The Report went on to say that the Commissioners were in the possession of a large number of valuable models which were retained in packing cases for the reason that no room could be found for them in the Museum at South Kensington. This statement had been repeated year after year, and, notwithstanding, the Museum still remained in its present disgraceful position. He had on former occasions, and in former Parliaments, obtained from the Chief Commissioner of Works a promise that this Museum should be really made an efficient one. But from that time to this nothing had been done to improve the condition of the Museum, and it was made a bye-word and a reproach by every foreign visitor to the country. In America the Patent Museum was one of the best institutions of the country, and one of which America was naturally proud. And in Paris there was a most beautiful Museum of Patent Inventions—the Musée des Arts et Métiers—where all the inventions were arranged in a manner that enabled every visitor to see at once whether any invention he was contemplating had been anticipated, and he was thus saved the unnecessary expense of taking out a patent, which was very important and material to him. Both in America and in Paris the Patent Museums were kept up in a manner which did credit to those countries. The difficulty in this country, he was told, was this, that there were not sufficient funds to enable the Government to proceed to the construction of a Patent Museum. That, however, could hardly be correct, and to show that there was no foundation for such a statement he would call attention to the amount of the fees paid upon Patents. There was a surplus fund derivable from fees paid for Patents for inventions every year of nearly £150,000. That, as they all knew, was carried to the Consolidated Fund, and the surplus fees paid in this way had accumulated year after year until they now amounted to nearly £2,000,000. Therefore, he did not see why they should be told that an Institution in which, as the Report of the Commissioners of Patents informed them, the working men of the country were so greatly interested, on the ground of the encouragement it would afford to inventions—that such an Institution could not be provided because there were no funds that could be utilized in constructing it. He would not take up the time of the Committee further than by saying this, as he now saw the President of the Board of Trade in his place, and as he knew the right hon. Gentleman took great interest in the question of Patents for inventions, he hoped to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that he was fully impressed with the necessity of not allowing the question to remain in abeyance year after year, but that something would at once be done to put the Museum upon a proper footing. He might add that, in the Report he had quoted, a very eligible site was recommended by the Commission—namely, the site of Fife House, at the back of the present Board of Trade Offices, in Whitehall Gardens. He believed that this site was very much in the same condition that it was a year ago when this Report was made, and he should have been glad to have put a question to the Chief Commissioner of Works upon the subject, if the right hon. Gentleman had been in his place. He agreed with the Patent Commissioners that the site of Fife House might be rendered available; but under no circumstances should the Patent Museum be allowed to remain in the condition in which it now was any longer. Seeing the large amount of the funds contributed for the Patent Office from the fees paid by inventors, it was, he thought, the duty of the Government to provide, as in the case of America and France, an Institution which should not only be useful, but should reflect credit upon the country.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that before the President of the Board of Trade answered the question put to him, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give an assurance that the whole question of the Patent Office would be considered during the Recess. He knew that a debate had already taken place upon the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and he was sorry the hon. Member was unable to press forward that Bill to its final stage. It had been impossible for any private Member to obtain this Session the necessary opportunities for pressing forward a measure of that kind; but the debate which had already taken place must have shown the President of the Board of Trade how much importance was attached to the question, and the great amount of interest that was felt in it in the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give the Committee an assurance that the whole question would receive careful consideration during the Recess.

MR. WARTON said, he had nothing to state in reference to the Patent Office; but he wished to call attention to the peculiar way in which the accounts included in the present Vote were made out. He thought that, considering the very great importance of knowing what the salaries, wages, and allowances were, they should have some further information than was contained in a total lump sum. He thought it would be better to give the items connected with each respective department. There were three departments included in this Vote—the Patent Museum, the Designs Registry, and the Trade Mark Registry, all of them important departments. He had no desire to carp at the expenditure, or to criticize it at all; but it would seem that there had been a very considerable increase in the amount of charge. He wanted to know whether there had been an increase or not, and it had taken a long time to find where the increase was; ultimately, it turned out that it was in the cost of the special Indexing staff. There had been a total increase of about £2,600, and out of that sum no less than £1,760 was due to this one item. But in consequence of the way in which the accounts were tabulated there was nothing to catch the eye in any particular item. He thought that all important branches of expenditure should be distinctly stated and added up; and he would suggest that, in future, this account should be broken up into the expenditure of the various departments, and that proper totals should be given.

Mr. Hinde Palmer

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it seemed to him a very great pity that all the expenditure in connection with the Patent Office should go to one central establishment in London. When they considered the difficulties which had to be surmounted in introducing any practical improvements in Patent machinery, it was quite plain that no mere casual observer in visiting the South Kensington Museum would be likely to gather ideas that would be useful to him in the development and improvement of any existing machinery or appliances that were used for superseding labour and simplifying mechanical power. Such appliances required a considerable amount of technical knowledge in order to enable a man to understand them and to appreciate the machinery, which was now turned to so many useful purposes. There were dotted over the face of England—he was sorry he could not say the same of Ireland—a number of centres of industry which made use in their peculiar occupations of different kinds of appliances. It therefore seemed to him that it would be a public benefit if the Institution at South Kensington were either duplicated or broken up. If it could be duplicated, one model might be kept at head-quarters, and another kept at those different centres of industry which possessed a technical school, to render such appliances of general advantage. For instance, the machinery used in the cotton trade might be sent to Manchester; at Sheffield there might be a Museum giving models of appliances connected with the trade in steel; and so on throughout the country. He believed that at Portsmouth there already existed a School of Naval Architecture, or something of that kind, which was of great use to those who were learning that branch of industry. He should like to obtain from the Government some expression of their views as to the establishment of local Museums of a special character in connection with the principal industries in England, and whether they proposed to continue the Patent Museum at South Kensington as the only place where the Patents of the country could be inspected. Certainly, in its present position it was almost wholly useless, and those who were interested in Patents for inventions seldom had access to it. There was one other point upon which he wished to ask a question—namely, in regard to the police. He was glad to see that the President of the Board of Trade was now in his place. The right hon. Gentleman would recollect that there was a time when he had questioned the late Government as to whether the police employed at the South Kensington Museum also received police pay, together with the allowance they drew from the Patent Office. The right hon. Gentleman would recollect that, on a former occasion, he opposed the Vote; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would go with him into the Lobby against it on the present occasion?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he did not think that the hon. Member for Queen's County had properly represented the course he (Mr. Chamberlain) had taken on the occasion referred to. [Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said it was reported in Hansard.] He thought not, as the hon. Member had represented the matter. He had certainly misunderstood the question which he (Mr. Chamberlain) had raised. What he was anxious to ascertain was whether the police, while being paid out of the National funds, were simply performing Metropolitan duties. He was answered at the time that the services paid for in the Vote were services wholly performed in connection with the National Museum, and as such were properly chargeable upon the Estimates. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had raised a question which was worth considering, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury would endeavour in the future preparation of the Estimates to give the total amount under different heads, as the hon. and learned Member suggested. The hon. and learned Member was perfectly correct in saying that the main increase in the Vote was owing to the addition made in the Indexing staff. On former occasions great importance had been attached to the rapid preparation of Indexes, and, at the suggestion of the Master of the Rolls, the work was being rapidly proceeded with. That, he thought, would account for the increase in the present year. In answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), he might say that the whole question of the Patent Law would undoubtedly receive the careful consideration of the Government during the Recess, and he hoped that it would be his duty next Session to bring in a Bill dealing with the subject in the spirit of the remarks which he had made on a recent occasion. He now came to the important question raised by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer)—namely, the question of Patent Museums. There was no doubt that the Museum at South Kensington was not altogether in a satisfactory condition. It was so small that the inventions at present sent there could not be properly exhibited, and there was no room for any further extension. He did not think, however, that the reason why better provision had not been made was that which his hon. and learned Friend had supposed. At all events, he (Mr. Chamberlain) did not pretend to say that it was to be excused on the ground of lack of funds, although he might say that the question of funds was one of very considerable importance. He had no doubt that if they were to establish a Museum on an efficient scale, so as to give anything like a complete representation of English inventions, it would involve the expenditure of a very large sum indeed, probably something like £500,000. It was no answer to say that the money could be provided out of the fees paid upon patents. Of course, that was one source of income; but it went to the reduction of taxation generally. If the fees paid to the Patent Office were devoted for the building of a Museum, it would be necessary to increase taxation in some other direction. He (Mr. Chamberlain) was personally much interested in the matter, and he spoke with some practical experience, both of patents and inventions. At the same time, he must confess that if he had a sum of £500,000 to deal with, he would be able to use it with greater advantage generally than in the establishment of a Patent Museum. The Committee must consider, in the first place, what the object of the Patent Museum was to be. Was it to be merely a Museum of archæological and historical curiosities? He did not depreciate the importance of such a collection; but they had the nucleus of one in the present Museum. For instance, it contained an illustration of the invention of the steam-engine; and specimens were given from the time of the "Rocket" down to the present time. No doubt such a Museum was amusing, and, to a certain extent, highly instructive; but he did not think that such a Museum would justify the enormous expenditure to which he had referred, nor did he think that that was in the mind of his hon. and learned Friend, because his hon. and learned Friend said something about the advantage the Museum would be to inventors. It would be of no advantage to see such inventions as the "Rocket" steam-engine, which had been long superseded by other inventions. In order that an inventor should derive real advantage, he must have every important step in every important invention fully represented, and that, he believed, would be found to be a difficulty of first-class magnitude. His hon. and learned Friend spoke as if the problem had been settled in the United States. He could assure his hon. and learned Friend that that was not the case. A few years ago, when a great part of the Patent Museum of Washington was burned down, and a large collection of inventions was burned with the building, there was a general sense of relief and satisfaction, because the collection had already outgrown any possibility of useful reference. It had been laid down previously in America that a model of every invention should be deposited; and, consequently, the Museum was, theoretically, at all events, a Museum which contained every invention upon every subject. But he had seen a Report from the curator of a Museum in Washington to the effect that if the rate of increase continued there was no building in the United States, and no town in the United States, in point of fact, whose area would be sufficient to contain the models deposited. It was found, therefore, that if a Museum was to be of any value at all there must be a careful selection; and, latterly, in the United States the authorities had attempted to make such a selection. He was told only the other day by a gentleman who had recently returned from the United States, that the collection there was so large that there was no possibility of adequate exhibition, and if anyone wanted to see a particular model, it had to be hunted up by communication with the Curators at a considerable loss of time, because the person who desired to see it found it impossible to discover it for himself, owing to the want of room now existing for exhibition. He did not say that that difficulty was absolutely insurmountable; but it showed the necessity of confining themselves to a satisfactory and useful selection. But then arose the difficulty—who could tell what were useful inventions and what were not? Who could tell which of the present inventions would be most useful in assisting further inventions? Yet this was what they wanted in a Patent Museum—namely, that an inventor should be able to go there and gather useful hints and suggestions. It was absolutely impossible for the best expert to decide beforehand what invention should come under the head of the best inventions. He was not now discussing the question thoroughly, but he was only dealing with such points as had been suggested by the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend. He placed these observations before the Committee in order to show the difficulties which surrounded the question. At the same time, he would assure his hon. and learned Friend that during the Recess, when the other questions connected with the Patent Office were considered, the question of a public Patent Museum and a public selection of useful inventions would also receive careful consideration.

Mr. Chamberlain

Mr. DILLWYN said, he was glad to have heard the remarks of his right hon. Friend. He agreed with every word his right hon. Friend had said. He thought it would be absurd to provide an Institution that should contain all the inventions of the country. It was a kind of myth which was never likely to be fulfilled. All that was necessary for any useful purpose was to give a good collection of drawings and specifications. They would be far more useful to inventors than any Museum of the kind suggested. His right hon. Friend said the probable expense of a Patent Museum would be £500,000. Now, he (Mr. Dillwyn) did not believe they would get a site for such a sum, and the total cost would be infinitely more. The expense of an adequate site would be enormous. They all knew what the cost of land in London was, and he was convinced that the mere purchase of the site for such a purpose would cover the whole sum mentioned by his right hon.

Friend. He had been very glad to hear the remarks made by his right hon. Friend, and he hoped they would tend to dissipate the expectations entertained by some persons, that the Government contemplated entering upon this gigantic and useless expenditure.

Mr. E. COLLINS said, he did not think that the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer) had been altogether fairly treated. His hon. and learned Friend had directed attention specially to the Museum at South Kensington, and the tendency of his remarks was to show that that Museum was by no means sufficient for the requirements of the country. His hon. and learned Friend had not attempted to shadow forth the extensive scheme alluded to by the President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). The views of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln were moderate, and his hon. and learned Friend only wished to direct the attention of the Government to the insufficiency of the existing Museum, with the view of endeavouring to induce them to give the subject more consideration than it had yet received. His hon. and learned Friend had pointed out to the Committee that the sum derived from Patent Fees now amounted to £150,000 a-year. The exact sum was £144,000. That was a very large sum; and when it was borne in mind that the accumulation of the surplus fees amounted to £2,000,000, it might naturally be thought that a revenue so large and constantly accumulating would be sufficient to make provision for the proper collection and exhibition of models.

Mr. CRAIG said, he had no doubt that an exhibition of drawings and specifications would be useful, but they would not supersede the exhibition of models. A Model Museum must be of great utility. Let the Committee consider for a moment what the effect would have been upon a mind such as that of George Stephenson, if he could have been brought in contact with a Model Museum. The exhibition of models enabled a man with an inventive genius to mature his own inventions, and thus confer great benefit upon the general public, and every man who was acquainted with the subject must at once see that it was most desirable to have a better building than that which now existed at South Kensington. If the arrangements were more complete many persons would come up from the country for the purpose of visiting the Museum—persons who were accustomed in their daily occupation to see machinery at work, and persons whose ideas would be sharpened by an inspection of the inventions of others. He thought it was incumbent upon the Government of the country, which depended so much upon manufacturing and mining industries, to improve, as far as possible, the tools with which the people worked, so that in the end they might cheapen the cost of production. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had referred to the Patent Museum in America. There was no doubt that that was a very clumsy and heterogeneous collection, which there was no necessity for imitating. What he would advise was that the classifications pursued in the present building should be continued, but that the evils into which the Americans had fallen should be avoided, and we should soon possess a collection of models worthy of the greatest manufacturing country in the world. At the same time, while keeping up the intelligence of our inventors, and assisting the commercial well-being of the country, such a Museum would afford the greatest assistance to inventors in seeing whether the invention that was engaging their attention was already in existence or not. He believed that the idea of establishing a Patent Museum would be most popular, and that if it were carried out it would in many respects be a most instructive Institution for giving expression to the inventive genius of the country. He trusted, therefore, that the question would receive the attention which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had promised to devote to it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was probably right as to the effect of his previous speech. The question then asked by the right hon. Gentleman was whether the police who were paid out of the Vote performed duties exclusively for the Museum, and were paid for the duties so performed, or whether they received their police pay in addition? That was a question which he (Mr. O'Connor) would like to have answered. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be satisfied upon the point now; and he hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee whether the policemen on duty at South Kensington were paid as members of the Police Force over and above the money they drew from the Vote.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he spoke from recollection. The hon. Member seemed to be speaking from a book; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) was quite certain that his recollection was accurate. He had been anxious to know whether the policemen who were paid out of the National funds were doing Metropolitan work, in which case he thought they ought to be paid out of the Metropolitan funds, and not out of the National Exchequer. He was answered at the time, and he believed that it was the fact that they were doing National work. Therefore, he had no objection to the Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if they also received pay as policemen?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: They are amply paid by the Treasury, and they receive no pay from the Police.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £14,277, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.

MR. S. LEIGHTON said, he had a Resolution on the Paper in regard to this Vote, which he regretted to have to bring forward as it might have the appearance of wasting the time of the Committee. This, however, was not his fault, but was the fault of the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury; and when he stated the precise position of the matter he believed that the Committee would see that there was a good deal to be said upon it. The Vote about to be taken was for the Paymaster General's Office. The Paymaster General was the banker to the Suitors in Chancery, and as their banker he had something like a sum of £60,000,000 in his possession. A portion of that money consisted of unclaimed funds, or dormant funds. Several Acts had been passed directing that proper particulars should be given to Suitors in respect of this unclaimed money, in order that they might claim their own. These Acts of Parliament had been violated, and on account of the violation of them, he intended to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500. One Act of Parliament directed that every information should be given to the Suitors in regard to this unclaimed money, and that every three years there should be a list of names published. Now, in the first place, a list had not been published every three years. A list ought to have been published in 1876, 1879, and another would be due in 1882; but, as a matter of fact, only one had been published in 1877, and another a few months ago. In the next place, the Act of Parliament laid down that the list should be alphabetical, and it was not alphabetical. He would take, for instance, the letter "A," and he found an entry to this effect—

"Ex parte Commission for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The account of Mansfield, Harper, &c., infants."

It was impossible for Suitors to find out their claims under such conditions. It might naturally be supposed that the fault was with the Paymaster General and with his officials; but the fault did not rest with him. It rested with the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury and the Commissioners of the Treasury. He found that the Paymaster General had written a letter to the Treasury upon the subject only last year, in which he said—

"I regret that the representations I have repeatedly addressed to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury upon the incompleteness of the audit, and the inadequacy of my staff even for the work now undertaken, and constantly falling more and more into arrear, have not received any response, and I have accordingly addressed a further letter to the Commissioners."

But there was another letter even stronger—

"I will not be held responsible for the possible consequences which may result from the insufficient supervision of pecuniary transactions of such magnitude unless I have further help."

Last year the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said he would give additional clerks; but he now proposed actually to reduce the Vote by £400. The noble Lord had said on one occasion that if he (Mr. S. Leighton) would show him reasons for the publication of clearer lists, he would accede to his proposal. He thought it was very hard that the noble Lord should require a reason for doing what common honesty would suggest. He might almost tell the Government to remember the Commandment—"Thou shalt not steal." He would point out that the other Public Offices, when they had money belonging to the public in their hands, had always given the information for which he asked. The India Office, the War Office, the Courts of Law, all published details of money in their possession, which belonged to others.

THE CHAIRMAN: I trusted to the hon. Member being correct in stating that the Vote he refers to came under the head of the Paymaster General; but I find that the Vote comes under the Chancery Pay Office, Class III, Vote 4; therefore, the hon. Member is clearly out of Order.

MR. S. LEIGHTON said, if the Chairman had made that observation earlier he would have been saved some trouble. He would renew his Motion at the proper time.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £6,243, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, on this Vote he wished to call attention to the West India Islands Relief Commission. He was under the impression that that Commission did not exist, and the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would be able to tell him whether his impression was correct or not. He (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) believed that the Commission was put an end to before the commencement of the period for which this Vote was taken; therefore, it seemed to him to be asking for a Vote which did not exist, and which had not existed during the proper financial period. This Relief Commission was to the West India Islands very much what the Public Works Loan Commission was to the United Kingdom, and its history it would be very useful to remember when they came to consider the value of the Public Works Loan Commission in this country. There was always this great danger, of the money advanced by the Loan Commissioners not being very well looked after—that was to say, the appropriation of it. He found in the Report of the Public Accounts Commissioner on this Vote questions and answers to the following effect. It was asked whether it was intended that the necessary statements should be furnished with reference to the West India Islands Relief Commission Account? And the reply was—“Certainly; and it might be mentioned to the Committee that the work that the country had undertaken as to these loans involved a very considerable amount of labour. The accounts of the loans in arrear had not been examined for a long period, and to clear up doubtful cases extending over many years would entail a large amount of correspondence and trouble. Two Acts had been passed which had cleared off considerable items of these arrears; but, of course, the Treasury had felt bound in no case to suggest a remission or composition of the loan until they were thoroughly satisfied that there was no possible means of recovering the amount due. The Treasury had now the West India Islands Relief Commission under their consideration, and had been in communication with the Commissioners on the subject of their loans. The Treasury had been instructed to offer certain terms to certain creditors, and had further given instructions that proceedings should be taken against them where the debts were not cleared up. The difficulty which arose as to these loans was that they were advanced, in most instances, to individuals. As soon as each of the branches of the Commission had finished its labours, the consent of Parliament would be asked to such remissions of loans as might be considered necessary.”

That was the effect of the answer given before the Public Accounts Commissioner. As he had said, the West India Islands Relief Commission had ceased to exist; but the Public Works Loan Commission still continued, and the way it did its work was very much the same as the way in which the West India Islands Relief Commission had done theirs. The Board was simply a lending Board, and the duty of looking after the appropriation of the money fell upon the Local Government Board, which body had only a limited power of following the expenditure. An Act was passed two years ago enabling them to do what ought to have been done from the beginning, and the consequence of the delay had been that a large amount of money had been mis-spent, and a great deal lost beyond recovery, especially in connection with the different harbours of the country. He would not go into details with regard to the harbours, which were referred to at length in the Report of the Loans Board for 1879-80. Reference was there made to harbours both in Ireland and in England. In the case of one harbour in Wexford, the whole amount of money voted had never been issued to the Harbour Commissioners; yet, in the Report of the Public Loans

Board, he found the harbour people put down as debtors for a certain amount of money. It struck him as a strange thing, if these Commissioners were to receive a certain amount of money on account of harbour works, that they should be put down as being in arrear with their repayment of principal and interest when the total amount of principal had not yet been advanced. Perhaps the noble Lord would give him some explanation upon this point? Another thing he wished to ask was what was proposed to be done with reference to the loans to Harwich Harbour—whether the Government proposed to bring in a Bill to wipe off the loans, as loans in the case of the West India Islands Relief Commission had been cleared away?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, with regard to the last question, it would more properly rise on Class I. in connection with the Harbour Votes. The Treasury hoped to receive back a portion of their money, and, therefore, they did not expect to have to wipe off the debt. As to the other harbour referred to by the hon. Member, the transaction occurred before his (Lord Frederick Cavendish's) time at the Treasury. It had never been brought before him; but if the hon. Member desired it he would make inquiries and give him an answer upon Report. With regard to the Report of the Controller and Auditor General with reference to the audit of these accounts, he was happy to be able to inform the hon. Member that the audit was now more complete and fuller than it used to be, and they might expect satisfactory results from the alteration. With regard to the West India Islands Relief Commission, the Treasury had deemed it advisable, in the public interest, to bring it to a termination some time ago.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £11,567, to complete the sum for the Record Office.

MR. J. COWEN said, he did not wish to delay the Committee by any lengthened observations; but he wished to call the noble Lord's attention to the question of the publication of the documents issued by this Office, which documents were of great value. He desired to ask if some better facilities could not be given to the public for obtaining possession of the very valuable books which were issued here from time to time?

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I am afraid the Financial Secretary will think this matter is a hobby of mine, because I have so often brought it before the House. Hitherto I have been satisfied with the answer he has been able to give me with regard to the course he has taken; but I cannot too strongly press upon the Government, now they have accumulated this great mass of public information in the Record Office, that every precaution should be taken to preserve the documents from fire. One point I am particularly anxious to put before the noble Lord on this question, and it is this, that I am afraid the relations between the Record Office and the gentleman who has control over the Metropolitan Fire Brigade under the superintendence of the Metropolitan Board of Works, are not as satisfactory as they should be. I think in a matter of this kind, he who is looked to for keeping all the fires in the Metropolis down should be one of the parties consulted in the matter of the safe-keeping of the documents in the Public Record Office. As I am informed, the gentleman in charge of the Fire Office has never been consulted in any shape with regard to the records. The Record Office is entirely in different hands, and this gentleman knows nothing about the means to be taken should a fire break out there. He and his men would have everything to learn; and I really would impress upon the Government how desirable it is that Captain Shaw, one of the most valuable officers we have in this particular department, should be placed in the closest connection with the Record Office, and should be consulted about protecting it from fire.

MR. HEALY said, that before the noble Lord rose, he wished to draw his attention to another point, and, perhaps, if he was not able to give an answer off-hand, he would make a point of inquiring into the matter, and giving full information on Report. What he (Mr. Healy) wished to know was what the Government intended to do in the case of the old Irish manuscripts in Italy and Switzerland, which the Italian and Swiss authorities had very liberally offered to give up, on being assured that they would be placed in safe-keeping, either in this country or Ireland? He did not know whether the question properly arose under this Vote; but it was a fact that very valuable Irish manuscripts were in the Library at Rome and in the Libraries of some of the Swiss towns; and they were considered of comparatively little value in these foreign countries. The foreign Governments would be willing to give them up to the custody of such a body as the Royal Hibernian Academy. What he wished to know was whether the keepers of the Italian and Swiss Libraries had put themselves into communication with the Government on this matter? The subject was one of national interest in Ireland, and he trusted the Government would give it the consideration it deserved.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it had not been brought to his knowledge that any offer of manuscripts had been made to any Department of the State by any Italian or Swiss officials; but he would make inquiries into the subject without delay.

MR. HEALY said, he did not mean to say that communications had passed; it was more in the shape of an understanding between the officials of the two countries.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he would inquire whether the matter had ever been under consideration; if it had, at any rate it had not come under his notice. As to the important question raised concerning fires, he fully concurred with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) as to the extreme importance, not only of the Public Record Office, but of every Office of the State, taking the best precautions against the outbreak of fire. Whether or not the best arrangement would be to make the Chief Officer of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade responsible for the documents in the different Departments of the Government, he was not at present prepared to state; but he could promise the right hon. Gentleman that the matter would be considered. With regard to the question put to him by the hon. Member on that (the Ministerial) side of the House (Mr. J. Cowen) as to the facilities to the public for obtaining copies of historical documents, he would inquire whether these facilities could be extended, and whether a list could be prepared of all the publications which could be procured in the Office. The sale price of these documents was always limited to the cost of printing and paper, no charge being made in respect of editing or preparing, or what he might call the mental work in connection with the records. He did not know whether further facilities could be given; but, if they could, he agreed with the hon. Member as to the importance of rendering these documents as accessible as possible to the public.

MR. RYLANDS said, he would like to suggest that copies of the records should be sent to the Libraries of the various Provincial towns in the country where Libraries had been established by Act of Parliament, and were, therefore, of a permanent character. It was a very small thing to ask, and this was not the first time he had ventured to make the request. Considering the large Votes of money that Public Institutions obtained in London, it was a very small thing to ask that the local Libraries should have copies of the Record publications presented to them. Perhaps the noble Lord would undertake that the matter should be considered by the Government?

MR. TORRENS considered the observations of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) were very important, and deserved the careful consideration of the Government. He (Mr. Torrens) had not been aware of the possibility of their being able to obtain these documents from foreign Governments; but he might mention to the Committee a matter which was within his own knowledge. A valuable document connected with Irish history had been allowed to pass out of this country merely owing to the parsimony of those entrusted with the purchase of such things. The document in question had been offered over and over again to public bodies in Great Britain, including the British Museum and the Record Office. Terms had not been come to, and at last it had gone to Washington, and was now in the Museum of the American Capital. The suggestion which had been thrown out was very well worth the consideration of the Government; and he hoped such instances as that to which he referred might not occur again. He would suggest to the authorities of the Record Office, as well as to those of the British Museum, that it would be desirable in the existing advanced state of science that they should altogether dispense with the dangerous system of artificial lighting which was now adopted. He had been struck, both at the Record Office and the British Museum, with the danger arising from the use of gas, and it appeared to him strongly desirable that this mode of lighting should not be applied to either of these places. There were no buildings in which a safe light was more essential than these repositories of ancient records and public documents. Therefore, he hoped before the Vote came on next year that something would be done in the direction of adopting a new method of lighting.

MR. FINIGAN said, he wished to make an observation on a matter which he considered deserved the serious attention of the noble Lord. He wished to ask whether the work of investigating documents in the archives of Venice was commenced in 1862; and whether when it was entered into it was not declared that it would last 13 years, and that the total cost would not exceed £5,000? Was it not a fact that this sum had been exceeded by £1,699? He should like to know how this expenditure was going on, and whether the Government proposed keeping to their original intention or varying from that? If it intended departing from its original intention, he should like to know whether it was intended to ask for further powers?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he thought that the further powers necessary were taken when the Estimates were passed. He believed the result of the investigations in the Venetian archives had been of almost unrivalled interest. The documents obtained had been of enormous value, and he believed that already, in all, 115 volumes of transcripts had been received in the Public Record Office in this way. He did not know whether the hon. Member or the Committee desired that this work should cease.

MR. J. COWEN wished to point out that the documents which had been obtained in Venice had a special reference to the matter the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had mentioned. These documents distinctly referred to Irish history.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £22,943, to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, England.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, with regard to the Report of the Registrar

Lord Frederick Cavendish

General for England, he would ask whether it would not be possible to make it a little more complete on a very interesting point? He noticed on page 146 of the last Report that the record of violent deaths showed that there were of homicide cases 206 males and 168 females in the year, making a total of 374, or more than one a-day. Of suicides there were—males 1,299, females 465, giving a total of 1,764; that was to say, 33 suicides every week in England. That was a very interesting statement, but it did not include executions, which were over and above these figures. These figures included 91 murders of males and 110 of females, 115 cases of manslaughter of males and 58 of females. The figures were simply appalling; and to those hon. Members who came from a nation not given to habits of this kind it was enough to make them feel nervous to know that this was the state of things in the country in which they were obliged to live, at any rate, six months in the year. He had endeavoured to ascertain from the Registrar General how many cases had been brought to justice; but he did not find that the necessary materials were supplied. He believed, however, that 60 per cent of the cases of murder and manslaughter were not brought to justice. But the Registrar General, as he had said, did not appear to give information on that subject. He did not know whether it was in his province to do so; but if he could furnish the details, it would make his Report more complete and interesting.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £295,000, to complete the sum for Stationery and Printing.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT remarked, that this was always a heavy Vote and badly arranged; but he was bound to say that it was this year very much better framed than formerly. There were, however, many items with respect to which the Committee still stood in need of more particular information. For instance, there was a charge of £60,755 for the War Office, of which no particulars were given, the amount being simply put down as a lump sum. Hon. Members would see that this was a very large item, and he thought the Committee might very properly ask that some further information should be given with respect to it than appeared on the face of the Estimate. The want of particulars was not only apparent in the case of the War Office, but there were several Departments for which a charge was made in the same way, and about which much more detailed information was desirable. He had no wish to delay the Vote, but simply rose to ask the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to give instructions that in future further information should be furnished with respect to the charges for the various Departments.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he should be happy to see further information given upon the subject referred to by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite, if it could be done without overloading the Estimates. He was sure that hon. Members would agree that while every possible information should be given, it was by no means desirable that the volume of the Estimates should be made more bulky than at present.

An hon. MEMBER said, he thought there ought to be no difficulty in arranging for more information of a necessary kind, seeing that so much was given that was quite useless.

MR. J. COWEN said, that this Vote was one of the heaviest in the Estimates, and required careful consideration. He believed the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) had on a previous occasion suggested that a Committee should be appointed for the purpose of investigating the whole of this question; and he thought, if that were done, it would have the effect both of simplifying the form and reducing the amount of the Vote. It was difficult for anyone at that time to enter into an elaborate examination of these charges, and he certainly had no wish to do so; but anyone practically acquainted with the matter would perceive at once that on several items a considerable amount could be saved. A good deal of the paper used in the Department was of a kind that in the course of a few years would be found to be useless, while the printing would be unreadable, because the ink on the paper would disappear. The question, therefore, was one which required consideration. To spend money on paper that would not be permanent involved a distinct loss to the nation, and he thought these considerations were such, as amongst others, might fairly justify the Government in acting upon the suggestion of the hon. Member for Midhurst for the appointment of a Committee. With regard to the Foreign Office papers, it must be remembered that the better class of printing in connection with them meant higher wages, and this would account for the increase under that head. And not only was the printing costly, but it was badly done. As a practical printer, he was prepared to say that some of the Government work was printed upon paper and with ink that, in the course of time, would fade, and the reports become wholly illegible.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that this subject had been under most careful consideration for several years. With respect to the appointment of a Committee, he would remind his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle that a Joint Committee of the two Houses had been recently sitting to inquire into the question of Parliamentary printing. The investigation of that Committee would undoubtedly embrace the points raised by his hon. Friend, and in the meantime he could assure him that every effort had been made to keep the expenditure under this Vote within proper bounds.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask the noble Lord for some information with regard to the charge upon page 146 for the Gazettes of London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. He would like to know what became of the £32,000 profit arising from these publications? Because, if it went to the printer, he was at a loss to understand why the money paid to the printer for the publication of the Gazettes was included in the account which resulted in this profit being shown. On the other hand, he did not see why it should be credited to the printer, because the estimated extra receipts amounted to only £4,690. Under the circumstances, it was difficult to see what became of this large sum of £32,000. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord. Of late years the Stationery Office had obtained power to extend its operations to India; and he understood that the Calcutta tradesmen had made representations to the Government upon this subject. They protested against the recent Order of the Secretary of State directing the Stationery Department to obtain its supplies in England instead of in India as heretofore, and they described it as unjust towards India, and inconsistent with the late resolution of the Government, to encourage private trade by purchasing its stores as far as possible in the Indian market. The Order of the Secretary of State had been made apparently in ignorance of the fact that the system of buying Government stationery in India had for some time worked well, and effected a large saving. He must say that, on the face of it, the representation of the Calcutta Trades Association was a reasonable one, and if it was a fact that the system of supplying the stationery from the Indian market had resulted in a saving, as compared with the system of supply from this country, it would be very difficult to justify the alteration made by the Secretary of State for transferring the business to England. There was another point arising on this Vote to which the noble Lord some months ago promised his attention—namely, the amount of money paid for printing in the Foreign Office, the authorities at which Department had a special printing office under their control. He had pointed out on a previous occasion that the rates of payment for work done in that Department were various, and in many cases above the rates at which the work could be done by the Stationery Office. He was certain that the Controller of the Stationery Department had made representations as to the waste of money which took place in the Foreign Office in connection with printing; and he believed the noble Lord had stated that the matter should be inquired into, and the resolution arrived at stated to the Committee.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the explanation of the point of the hon. Member for Queen's County with regard to the publication of the Gazettes was that the money was paid in stamps and not in cash, and did not, therefore, appear in the actual receipts paid into the Exchequer. With regard to the Foreign Office printing, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had stated that the question was under the careful consideration of the Foreign Office; but it must be borne in mind that, although the printing done at the Office related to matters that were confidential, there were some classes of work of a more strictly confidential character than others; and it would, he thought, be very questionable economy to risk publicity by an attempt to get the printing executed at a smaller cost. Nevertheless, every endeavour would be made to see if anything could be saved in the Department in question.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked for an explanation with respect to the increase of £10,000 for printing, binding, &c., for the two Houses of Parliament.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he hoped that before long the Report of the Joint Committee of the two Houses upon the subject of Parliamentary printing would be in the hands of hon. Members. Although the arrangements with regard to stationery were not under his direction, the whole question was receiving the attention of the Government.

Mr. HEALY wished to ask the noble Lord a question with regard to the increase of £1,000 upon the amount paid last year to Mr. Hansard in respect of Parliamentary Reporting—an increase which he was glad to see, and about which he would simply inquire whether it was to become a permanent charge in the Estimates? He observed, also, a charge for a number of copies of the Debates purchased from Mr. Hansard, and presumed that these were distributed amongst the various Public Offices. Perhaps the noble Lord would afford some explanation upon these points? The noble Lord would be aware of the great interest taken by the public in the Irish Land Question, and that a large demand had been created for copies of the Irish Land Bill; and he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord to the fact that what he might call fancy prices were being charged for them. He would therefore suggest that, as in the case of other Parliamentary Papers, the price should be stated on the face of the Bills before Parliament, so that no extra might be exacted from the public. Then with regard to the charge for The Dublin Gazette. It was well known that this was published on Saturdays, and that it had been enacted by statute that proclamations of Irish towns and districts should appear in that Gazette. But, upon a recent occasion, when the City of Dublin was proclaimed—an event followed by the arrest of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon)—The Dublin Gazette was not obtainable on the Saturday, but was kept back from the public until midnight on Sunday. Now it was something in the nature of a public scandal, and one which called for the notice of the Committee, that The Gazette office, which had only to do the cut-and-dried work of publication, should play into the hands of the authorities of Dublin Castle, by delaying the publication of this official record, in order to prevent the citizens of Dublin being made aware of the fact that their city was proclaimed. That act might be held to be illegal; and it might even follow that because The Gazette was issued on Sunday the proclamation was illegal also, and that the hon. Member for Tipperary was now lying in Kilmainham under illegal duress. He trusted the noble Lord would make a statement on this subject on Report.

Mr. LABOUCHERE pointed out that the printing of the House of Commons cost more than that of the House of Lords. Confidential printing, conducted at the Foreign Office, was charged 26 per cent more for than when it was done elsewhere. He also wished to point out that every Member of that House received a ton weight of Blue Books every year. Within the last six years £55,000 had been saved in the expenditure on the Stationery Office, and he believed that a further sum of £10,000 per annum might be saved in that Department.

Mr. J. COWEN said, he thought the increased expenditure with regard to Mr. Hansard's reports was fully accounted for by the increased amount of work done, and that the additional sum paid to that gentleman only compensated, and no more than compensated, for the additional labour thrown upon him. He thought that the House would be compelled very shortly to face the fact that either it must abandon Mr. Hansard's reports or pay him a larger sum of money, or that it must adopt some system of official reporting. Mr. Hansard's reports were admirably done, and the books were exceedingly well printed, and he believed their value was in no way repaid by the amount of this grant. There was no doubt that the late Chancellor of the Exchequer made an excellent bargain with Mr. Hansard, inasmuch as the payment did not at all come up to the expenditure incurred by that gentleman.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) had explained the real reason of the increased payment to Mr. Hansard, to which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had referred. Representations had been made to him (Lord Frederick Cavendish), at the time the Estimates were being framed, that, owing to the increased length of the Session, the arrangements which were made by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) with Mr. Hansard had not been at all profitable to that gentleman—in fact, that the arrangement caused Mr. Hansard extreme anxiety. Mr. Hansard had told him—and he had proved himself a true prophet—that, long as previous Sessions had been, he expected that this Session would be longer, and he had urged that he could not undertake the reporting of this Session unless an addition were made to his usual remuneration. It was in consequence of those representations that he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had agreed to place in the Estimates of the present year an additional sum of £1,000. With respect to the suggestion that the cost of Bills introduced into that House should be printed on the face of the Bills, he regarded it as a very good one, and would inquire whether there was any good reason why it should not be adopted. Then, with regard to the publication of The Dublin Gazette on Sunday—

MR. HEALY: It was delivered on Sunday. There is no evidence as to when it was published.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought it was quite conceivable that circumstances might arise which would delay the publication of The Gazette, and render it necessary even to infringe upon the sanctity of the Sunday by the delivery of the paper on that day. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had asked him whether any further reform could be effected in this Department. But he would remind the hon. Member that the Treasury had a most limited control over Parliamentary printing, which rested with Mr. Speaker.

MR. HEALY wished to give Notice that he should again call attention to the subject of The Dublin Gazette. He regarded the circumstance to which he had referred as raising a very important political question. With regard to the item for reporting, he wished to know whether it was intended that the extra grant of £1,000 would become a permanent charge? In asking that, he did not wish to detract from the value of Mr. Hansard's reports.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH thought this would depend upon whether they were always to have such long Sessions. He believed the original proposal would have been sufficient for an ordinary Session; but if they were always going to have Sessions of seven or eight months' duration, although he was not able to say exactly what would be done, the arrangement would require to be reconsidered.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £13,196, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."

MR. PUGH said, in rising to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £2,000, he should confine himself to matters that were of general interest alike to the people of England and Wales. He had endeavoured to get an opportunity to bring this question of Crown Lands before the House in another form, but had failed in his endeavour, although he could assure the Committee that this was owing to no fault of his own. He was extremely sorry that he had not been successful, because there were many things that he desired to lay before the House which he did not think it would be right for him to bring at length under the notice of the Committee upon the Estimates. For the latter reason he should be very brief in his observations. A Return had been issued in the beginning of the year on the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Radnorshire (Sir Richard Green Price), which showed the area of the unsold Crown Lands in Wales to be 85,000 acres, and the profit derived from them, in the way of rent, to be nil. The Return went on to say that although no profit was received from this source, there were profits received from other sources—namely, the profits of mines, rents for sporting, estrays, &c. Now, with regard to the mines he contended that they should be managed in the way that would develop them most for the good of the country; but his charge against the Department with reference to the management of mines was that their policy tended to retard the development of the mines, and so do a very serious injury to the people and to the country. The terms demanded by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were such as the Committee would see at once no private individual would insert in his lease. It was required that on every transfer of any mine there should be payable to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests not only a quarter of the profits, but one-fourth of the nominal profit on the sale of the mine. The only reason given for that provision was that it put a stop to speculation in mines. But a moment's consideration of this matter would show that the effect was in the contrary direction, because it was no hardship to speculators who received cash for their shares to pay over one-fourth of the money to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The effect, however, would be very different in the case of a man who had discovered a good mine, and who agreed to take no cash at all, but only paid-up shares. Supposing he was willing to sell for £1,000 over and above his expenses, the transaction could not be carried out unless he could and would find £250 in cash to pay to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. He maintained that a provision of that sort was calculated to retard the development of the mining resources of the country. Moreover, he had known instances in which he believed that simply in consequence of the outrageous provisions made by the Commissioners, mines had been stopped, and a large number of miners had been thrown out of work, and anyone living in the neighbourhood of mines would understand the full significance of that fact. Not only were there lead mines in Cardiganshire, which, to a large extent, for this cause remained undeveloped, but there were also gold mines in Merionethshire, from which it was a fact that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests had in one year received no less a sum than £2,000. Here, again, great complaint was made of the conduct of the Commissioners; but he should not trouble the Committee with the details, further than by pointing out that the practice appeared to be to deal with gold and lead mines in the same arbitrary and inconsiderate manner. Now, his proposal was to relieve the Department of all trouble and responsibility with regard to the soil and surface of these 85,000 acres of land, an arrangement that would allow for the reduction of the establishment to about the extent represented by the sum by which he moved the reduction of this Vote. He contended that the present system of control could not be maintained with advantage to the country; and he believed that if the full Return asked for, showing the receipts and expenditure, had been granted, it would have appeared that a large sum of money was being paid for no useful purpose whatever. He challenged the noble Lord in charge of the Estimates to say what the rents for sporting amounted to. As far as his own experience went the Commissioners of Woods and Forests occasionally got an English gentleman to take a lease, and to pay rent for a certain number of years; but although he was aware that such instances had occurred, he had never known or heard of any such lease being renewed. It sometimes happened, also, that a neighbouring landowner took one of these leases for the purpose of better preserving his own adjoining shooting; and they were, perhaps, renewed in cases of that kind. However that might be, he felt certain that the amount of revenue derived from the letting of sporting rights was exceedingly small. Next came the revenue from estrays, the meaning of which was the profit derived from the catching of stray sheep. Upon this subject he would remark that, having gone carefully into the question, he believed that the opinion in the country was that a great deal of wrong went on under the name of taking estrays. He had never been able to ascertain in what way the revenue under this head was made up or collected; but perhaps the noble Lord would be able to say something in explanation of this matter. He believed, however, that the Committee would agree that unless the revenue derived from this source was large and important, the sooner such a system was done away with the better. Now, with regard to the policy of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. He contended that it was, as far as possible, to keep these lands in their present position, to prevent any inclosure or improvement; and he would go to the extent of saying that the Department of Woods and Forests, in preventing improvement, went a great deal further than any private landowner would dream of going. What had been the policy of the Commissioners with regard to the question of inclosure? He could trace it down from the year 1845, and even further back. He would point out to the Committee that several Inclosure Acts had been passed previous to that time, and that the share obtained by the Crown under those Acts was 1-20th. In 1844 a Return was made to the House of the transactions which had taken place between the Duke of Newcastle and the Department of Woods and Forests; and by a reference to the Papers it would be found that they obtained a 20th share in respect of some of the land bought by his Grace, and 1-16th share in respect of other portions. But, coming down to later times, he would mention the case of Borth, a village in Cardiganshire, on the sea, the higher portion of which was much resorted to by tourists and strangers. The lower part was in the occupation of persons of whom he should not be wrong in saying that they were all, or nearly all, the owners of the freehold of their houses, but the possessors of no other property. The village was built on the shingle thrown up by the sea, and behind it was a morass many miles in extent. Now, it was said to be merely a question of time when this village would be washed away, unless something effectual was done to protect it—and something which the owners of the houses were not in a position to do unaided. At the back of the village there was an extent of Crown land; and, a few years ago, a movement was set on foot to get this land enclosed, part of it being set aside and sold for the purpose of raising money to protect the village from the sea. The whole of the facts were put before the Department; but, so far from doing what any private individual would have felt bound to do under the circumstances, the Commissioners simply ignored the danger to the village, and refused to render any assistance, or to permit the inclosure, except upon the most inequitable and unjust terms. Since the time he referred to—1877—things had gone from bad to worse; and, as far as he knew, the Crown, or rather the country, had received no revenue whatever from this land. Then there was another case, in connection with about 2,000 acres of land in Carmarthenshire, called Llanllwin Mountain, which belonged to the Crown, and from which, he believed, no revenue was derived. There had been much correspondence on the subject between the people of the district and the Office of Woods and Forests. This was land much of it suitable for building purposes, and all for cultivation, and which, if so used, he had no doubt, would greatly benefit that part of the country. After the refusal of the Commissioners to accept the proportion of 1-12th, or any fixed proportion at all, they proposed that the people should appoint as arbitrator to decide the proper proportion one of several persons whom the Woods and Forests Department were in the habit of employing. The people selected one accordingly; but that did not suit the Department, who clearly intended that the terms should not be carried out; and they, accordingly, insisted upon giving their own instructions to that gentleman, and refused to allow him otherwise to proceed. Those instructions were most unfair, and conceived entirely in the interests of the Department. It would, he believed, be absolutely impossible to carry out any inclosure upon such terms. The Crown retained the management of the land, and that, he thought, was to be deplored in the interests of the whole country. If the whole of these 85,000 acres were inclosed, the portion allotted to the Crown could be sold in whatever manner the Crown thought proper, and it would be readily bought up by the miners in Wales, for the purpose of building cottages and making gardens, and inclosures for pasturage. The Department, by retaining the whole of this land, could derive no profit—but the result was that no tree could be planted, no fence could be made, and no drain or ditch could be dug. With reference to improvements, if a man wished to put up a fence, the Department acted in a way which no private individual would adopt. The hon. Baronet the Member for Denbighshire (Sir Watkin Wynn) was the lord of many manors in North Wales, and whenever any of his tenants wished to make any improvement upon the land he was prepared to allow them to do so, upon their acknowledging his right and paying a reasonable sum by way of acknowledgment. That was how a landlord should act; but that was not the way in which the Woods and Forests Department acted. What they did in such a case was this. After a long correspondence they would allow two neighbouring owners to put up a fence between them at a nominal rent; and after the fence had been completed they would refuse any longer to receive the nominal rent agreed upon, and insist upon the payment of a rent calculated according to the improved value of the sheepwalks. In a case of which he knew, the rent charged was 2s. 6d. a-year; but before two years expired, after the fence was completed, upon which the owners had expended not less than £100, the Department, in the interests of the country, as they said, refused any longer to accept 2s. 6d. a-year, but demanded £7 or £8 a-year. There was another case where two tenants of one landlord, who had sheepwalks extending over a large tract of country, put up a fence as between themselves, without any help from the landlord. An offer was made to acknowledge the rights of the Crown, and to pay a reasonable sum in acknowledgment; but no acknowledgment was accepted, and the fence, he believed, had to be, and was actually, taken up. Were the Committee inclined to vote for the continuance of that sort of thing? It was a disgrace to any Public Department that such things were allowed to go on. He would not mention names in the matter; but he had a letter from the agent of one of the largest landowners in Cardiganshire—the agent himself also being in an independent position—stating that he had consulted with his employer, and they both felt bound to decline to furnish him with information, lest the estate should fall under the lash of the Department. He hoped some assurance would be given that this matter would be inquired into in some proper manner; and unless such an assurance could be given he should ask the Committee to divide upon his Motion.

Mr. J. Cowen

Mr. Pugh

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £11,196, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."—(Mr. Pugh.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH remarked, that the hon. Member had brought a series of very grave charges against the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The hon. Member argued, in the first place, that £2,000 might easily be saved in connection with that Department. He had no doubt the hon. Member might be an economical administrator; but he had considerable doubt whether the hon. Member would be able to save £2,000 out of £1,600, which was all that was expended in Wales. In 1852 the receipts of the Department amounted to about £6,000; in 1881 they amounted to £13,770; and, in addition to that increase of Revenue, they had derived, from the sale of a large number of quit rents and other fixed rents, to the extent of £135,000, what would amount to over £4,000 in interest. As to the charge of the hon. Member that the Department acted harshly and unjustly towards individuals brought in contact with them, and that the regulations respecting mining leases were such as to entirely check the development of mines, he found that the income had increased from £7,127 in 1868 to over £9,000 in 1881. That did not appear as if the provision with regard to mine leases had entirely checked the development of mines in Wales. With respect to that provision, he was not prepared to say whether it was wise or not; but it was introduced to check speculation in mines. He could not exactly understand the object of the hon. Member's remarks with respect to the sporting rights of the Crown. Did he wish the Crown to give those rights to certain persons free of any charge, or did he think they should obtain, as they now did, the best price they could on behalf of the public? As to sheep straying, the hon. Member seemed to suggest that the Crown appointed men for stealing sheep; but the Crown did not appoint the men referred to. They were appointed by the Commons, in order to prevent sheep getting on to the commons; and if those men did not rightly perform their duties, the people who should complain and deal with the matter would be the Commons who appointed them. Then, with respect to the question of inclosures, the hon. Member said the Crown asked for too large a proportion of the value. There had been considerable difficulty in ascertaining what proportion the Crown should demand, and it was found that the amount had varied very considerably. The Woods and Forests Department had, therefore, recently adopted a rule that before they agreed to any inclosures there should be an arbitration between the Commons and the Crown, in order to ascertain the fair proportion due to the Crown. In all such cases the Department offered to pay one-half of the cost of the inquiry, and it was found that the proportion received by the Crown in such cases had varied from one-tenth to one-half. The hon. Member had referred to one or two particular cases of hardship, and he should be extremely obliged if the hon. Member would give him the particulars of those cases, in order that he might investigate them. With regard to the lash of the Woods and Forests Department which had been alluded to, he did not believe that any such act of tyranny as that suggested would be exercised; and, at any rate, if the hon. Member would give him such information as he wanted upon this question, he would undertake that no one should suffer. Then, with regard to the final charge respecting fences, the hon. Member stated that the Crown had agreed to allow tenants to erect a fence at 2s. 6d. a-year, and had suddenly broken the bargain, and raised the rent to £7 or £8. He was bound to say that that charge was a great surprise to him, and if the hon. Member were to give him the particulars of the case he would have that also carefully investigated. The hon. Gentleman had recently changed the wording of his Amendment, which, as it stood for many weeks, proposed simply to strike off the salary of Mr. Howard, one of the Commissioners; but within the last day or two the form had been altered to a reduction of £2,000. Mr. Howard, even if all that had been said by the hon. Member respecting him was correct, had done a large amount of work outside Wales, and it would not be fair to deprive him of all his salary. He had been suffering from a severe illness, and after he had discharged his duties for many years in the way in which he had discharged them, he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was bound to say that he believed the charge of the hon. Member would be found impossible of proof.

MR. PUGH said, he wished to make some observations upon one or two points in the speech of the noble Lord. A reflection of a very serious nature had been cast upon him with regard to the change in the form of his Motion. The Motion was originally in the form described by the noble Lord; but he was not then aware of Mr. Howard's state of health, of which he was extremely sorry to hear. He assured the Committee that nothing was further from his intention than to cast any personal reflection upon Mr. Howard. He simply put Mr. Howard's name in the Motion as being the gentleman in charge of this particular matter. He had always thought, and still believed, that had Mr. Howard been in proper health and strength these things of which he complained would not have occurred. He had not intended to refer to Mr. Howard's name at all in this debate; but as it had been brought forward by the noble Lord, he thought it right to explain why he had originally mentioned his name in connection with this matter. The noble Lord said that he (Mr. Pugh) had charged the Crown with asking for too large a share of the inclosures. He carefully guarded himself from saying that they asked for too large or too small a share, or from expressing an opinion at all upon the point, because he did not know what the proper share of the Crown was. He had no objection to the Crown having a proper share; but he thought the inclosures should be encouraged rather than discouraged. He did not know why the noble Lord should have put the particular question as to sporting rights; but what he wished was that whatever was done should be done for the benefit of the nation. His own opinion was that if these inclosures were made, and portions were sold, the Crown should not retain the sporting rights in order to harass the people with out receiving any substantial and adequate revenue therefrom. With regard to the question of sheep straying, he was at a loss to know how the Crown derived its revenue in this respect. If the noble Lord was right in saying that these men were appointed by the Commons, he did not know how or when they were appointed; but he would make inquiries into the matter in order to understand how the revenue from this source was collected. He did not think there was anything he had said which constituted a charge against the Commissioners of having decreased the revenues of the Crown; but he did think the Crown were getting a certain sum of money which it was not for the advantage of the State to insist upon, and it would be much better for them to increase the sum which the noble Lord pointed out as the money they obtained from the sale of property, and to cease to get money by the harassing method of catching these stray sheep, and by the other methods he had referred to. As the noble Lord appeared to doubt whether such a reign of terror had been established, he would say that the letter to which he had referred contained this passage—which he would read to the Committee—

Lord Frederick Cavendish

“I am afraid any information I might give you on the above subject might bring me under the lash of the Office of Woods and Forests. Therefore, I think it better not to mention cases. I mentioned the subject to his employer, and he agrees with me.”

MR. CAINE said, he hoped the Government would pay no attention to the arguments advanced respecting the ground leases of mines. He had had great experience in these matters, and he knew that the conditions in the leases had had a wholesome effect in checking unwholesome speculation.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR observed, that there was in this Vote an item of an exceptional character. At page 141, under the heading “Legal Branch,” there appeared £1,200 a-year for the solicitor, and £250 for the clerk, and a further allowance of £1,080 paid by the solicitor as salaries for clerks. It appeared to him to be rather strange, and an unusual system in the Service, to farm out this clerical work, and he wished to ask what was the particular object of introducing or allowing this system in this Department, when it had been swept away in almost every other Department? The clerical work of the legal branch of this Department was farmed out to a solicitor, who employed such clerks as he thought fit, or put the money into his own pocket. Then there was another point to which he wished to draw attention. At the bottom of page 143 there was a note as to the Keeper of Records. He had £550 a-year, and he had also emoluments derived from fees; and there was an arrangement made with him whereby, if such fees fell short of £150, that sum was made good to him from a public fund. It was not made clear from what public fund this balance was paid, and he should like to ask the noble Lord if he could give him information on that point. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) noticed that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster groaned, as only the right hon. Gentleman could groan, when he (Mr. A. O'Connor) had risen. He would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman a question as to another point.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The hon. Member says I groaned. I beg to say that I did nothing of the kind.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he might have been mistaken; but if the right hon. Gentleman would remain in the House a little longer, he wished to put a question to him with regard to the property of the Duchy of Lancaster. He found in the Estimates an item showing that the Duchy of Lancaster had property in the Savoy, and that the Office of Woods was in some manner interested in the re-letting of a portion of the estates. He would ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he could inform the Committee if the arrangements had been completed, and, if so, what they were—whether the right hon. Gentleman knew anything at all about the property of the Duchy of Lancaster in the Savoy, its present condition, and whether there was or was not a rent paid to the Office of Woods? He would not ask more than two questions at once, lest they should be overlooked.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it was found to answer well to make the solicitor responsible for the work which had been referred to earlier on, and to give him power to employ a clerk, making an allowance for such a purpose. As to the other question put to him by the hon. Member, it was arranged some years ago that if the fees of the Keeper of Records did not reach the sum of £150 the balance would be made good. These fees and this arrangement were looked upon as a part of the salary of this official.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was sorry he had not elicited from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster any information as to the property over which he was supposed to preside, and for which his Department sometimes paid rent to the Office of Woods, and sometimes did not, because the item this year was "nil."

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The matter to which the hon. Member endeavoured to call my attention does not appear to me to arise out of this Vote. The Duchy of Lancaster has property in, I suppose, 12 or 13 counties; and it is not likely that, on a summons like this, without Notice, I should be able, or even willing, to go into details with regard to that property. It may be sufficient to say that the income in respect of the property has greatly increased of late years. I do not attribute that in the least degree to anything that I myself have done; but some of my Predecessors have understood the affairs of the Duchy of Lancaster extremely well, and the property has greatly prospered. Hon. Members know that the income the Crown derives from the property is very much larger than it was a few years ago. At the same time, I must say that no one makes any complaint of the management of the affairs of the Duchy of Lancaster. Its tenants all over the country are uncomplaining and satisfied.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had not touched upon this question.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I am asked a general question as to the management of the property, and as to something which is said to be owing to the Office of Woods. I know nothing of that question; but if the matter is one that the Committee thinks it worth while to go into, and upon which the Committee desires information, if sufficient Notice is given I shall endeavour to furnish it. Upon a matter which does not come regularly under a Vote, it is customary for an hon. Member to give Notice of a question, so that a Minister may be prepared to give a satisfactory answer. As the Committee knows perfectly well, the expenses of the Duchy of Lancaster are not voted by Parliament, and do not come under the cognizance of Parliament.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to make an attack on the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but merely wished to know why a certain source of income connected with the Vote had been cut off, that source of income being the payment of rental by the Duchy of Lancaster to the Office of Woods on account of property in the Savoy. The interruption, he believed, was only temporary, depending upon the settlement or an arrangement of the details of the administration of the particular property. He had been anxious to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman who was connected with the property whether the arrangements which were in hand some time ago had been completed, and if so what they were; and also if he could tell them what the property was in the Savoy, and why the Duchy had to pay over in normal years any rent whatsoever. The thing was quite pertinent to this Vote, as the question was one of income. [Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH dissented.] The noble Lord opposite shook his head; but it must be income as it was an extra receipt. ["No, no!"] When money was paid over by the Duchy to the Office of Woods the Office of Woods must be a gainer, and when they were going over this Vote it was perfectly fair for him to ask why a sum which generally came under it did not come under it this year.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(12.) £25,765, to complete the sum for the Works and Public Buildings Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was sorry that he should have to rise so often on these Votes; but he should not do so if other Members would take the same trouble in going over these questions that he did. There was something so patent on the face of this Vote that he could not pass over it. It set forth a comparison between the number of officials in the Office of Works at present and those who had been employed in former years. Although this year there was a Surveyor of Inland Revenue Buildings at a salary of £650, there was last year no officer at that salary; in fact, on looking at last year's Estimates, they found there was no Surveyor of Inland Revenue Buildings, and no charge made for him. There were 10 first class surveyors shown this year against eight last year, and £2,143 charge as against £1,734 last year. But, as a matter of fact, there were not eight last year; there were only seven, and the amount charged was not £1,734, but £1,034. Then, again, lower down, there was one temporary clerk of works shown this year as against seven last year. But there were not seven last year; as a matter of fact, there were only three. Again, for temporary assistance in the Office in China in this year's Estimate £350 was put down as against £330 last year; but there was no such item as £330 charged last year. In the same way the figure put down for travelling expenses for last year was inaccurate, and throughout the Vote all the figures appeared to be wrong and misleading. There was another point upon which he should like some explanation. Under this Vote the Appropriation Account showed that £45,000 was received by the Office of Works for Southwark Prison; but the Finance Account showed the item to be £45,100. It was very unfortunate that such discrepancies as this should occur.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the discrepancies in question were easily explained. There had been a transfer from the Inland Revenue Department to the Office of Works of certain officials. Therefore, whilst there had been no increase in the numbers, the charges were put under different heads, and the account was rendered somewhat complicated.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1882, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."

Mr. GORST said, that if he could get any support at all from any part of the Committee he intended to divide against this Vote. He did not think they could discuss it at any great length at this period of the Session; but they had discussed it some time ago in Committee under a Foreign Office Vote. It seemed to him that the existence of such a Vote as this in their accounts was not at all creditable to the Administration, and it was a remarkable thing to him that the whole of the money granted for Secret Service appeared to be spent every year. He found it very difficult to believe that it could be necessary to spend the whole of this money; but, at any rate, if such a charge was to be made for the Public Service of the country, the Ministers of the various Departments which were concerned in the expenditure ought, at least, to certify that the money had been spent, and that it had been spent on the Public Service. He believed they were told, when the matter was last under discussion, that the money was only accounted for by the Treasury, and that the Ministers of the other Departments were not called upon to certify as to payments made, and that it would be inconsistent with the character of the Service if that was done which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) seemed to think was done.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Ministers of the various Departments do certify.

Mr. GORST said, he did not believe it. The Vote, as it stood, was objectionable; and if it were to be allowed at all, Ministers should be required to certify that the money had been spent in the Public Service. He did not believe the Secret Service money was at all necessary; and if any hon. Members would support him he would take a vote upon the subject.

Mr. BROADHURST said, he wished this Vote could be got rid of altogether. It was a source of great uneasiness and regret to many people that it should exist at all. Many working men believed that a large portion of this money was spent amongst very violent agitators, who were sent to take part in working men's political and other movements for the purpose of leading working men to extremes. ["No, no!"] Well, he was only saying that which he knew to be a very general opinion amongst working men, and he was not stating whether or not that opinion was correct. It was very generally believed that the late Administration was seriously misled as to the state of public opinion by the expenditure of a part of this Secret Service money. This was a very general opinion; and he was bound to say that he, at that time, had himself shared in it. There were men in London who, it was perfectly well known, forced their company upon workmen and pushed themselves into every movement that was started. These people were always making the most extreme and the most ridiculous proposals in order to lead practical men astray, and the opinion was that these persons were very frequently fed out of the Secret Service money. Well, then there was another very general impression abroad amongst a large number of the electors, and it was this—that Members of Parliament received pay for attending and sitting on Committees and Royal Commissions—[Laughter—and this, he could assure the Committee, was really a serious matter, and he, unfortunately, had been a victim to the ridiculous belief. The opinion outside was that Members of Parliament got five or six guineas a-day for sitting upon Committees, and that those who had been unfortunate in not having been placed on a sufficient number of Committees during a year had the deficiency made up to them out of the Secret Service money. [Laughter.] This, no doubt, appeared to be very ridiculous; but he was perfectly sincere in assuring the Committee that this opinion prevailed. Many electors, to his knowledge, had said—“If this man was not going to Parliament to make something out of it, would he come amongst us to spend so much money for the purpose of getting returned?” This was a very general impression, and a very distressing case was brought under his notice less than 14 days back—in fact, it came into his office in the Strand. A friend of his came to him and congratulated him that, since he had been in Parliament, from the various secret modes of paying Members of Parliament, he had received sufficient money to enable him to set up a carriage and pair and four servants. Well, this statement had caused him a considerable amount of regret—in the first place, because of the terrible state of ignorance it displayed amongst a large number of people; but he was bound to admit that by far the greater cause of regret was the fact that it was not true. For these reasons, and many other reasons which he did not consider it necessary to detail to the Committee at this time of night, he would suggest that this very extraordinary and suspicious item in our National Expenditure should be got rid of. If it were absolutely necessary that secret information should be obtained, he would pay for it by some other means than by putting down the lump sum of £30,000 a-year. He hoped the noble Lord would be in a position to tell them next year that he was able to abolish the Vote altogether, so that this great cause of suspicion might be removed from the minds of the electors.

Mr. Broadhurst

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) said that, in his opinion, the Ministers who expended this money ought to be personally responsible, and ought to certify that it was spent in the Public Service. I stated across the House that they do so at present; whereupon the hon. and learned Member, with that courtesy and good taste he always exhibits, replied—“I don't believe it.” I should have imagined that any man who has sat in this House for any length of time could not have been ignorant of one of the most elementary points of detail in connection with the discharge of Ministerial functions here. I should have thought that everyone knew that the Minister who is responsible for the expenditure of any portion of the Secret Service money makes a declaration in writing, stating that he hereby certifies that the actual amount which has been expended by himself for Secret Service is so many pounds; and on the strength of that certificate the Comptroller and Auditor General certifies to the correctness of the account.

MR. GORST asked what the right hon. Gentleman was quoting from?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am quoting from the certificate that every Minister signs, and that which I should have thought would have been a matter of the commonest knowledge in the House of Commons. The Heads of Departments are personally responsible for the appropriation of the Secret Service money. With regard to what my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Broadhurst), who spoke in a very different tone on this matter, said, I am glad that we should have had the opportunity of revealing some popular mistakes with regard to this Secret Service money; and I can only avail myself of this opportunity of explaining to the country; through him, that the method he has described is not exactly the way in which the Secret Service money is employed. I am not here to answer for what the late Government did; and for ourselves I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman what is done with the Secret Service money, because if I did I should destroy the goose that lays the golden egg. The very object of having Secret Service money is that it shall be spent without anybody knowing what is done with it. All Governments have a fund at their disposal for Secret Services, and they spend it, as we do, on the public good and the public safety. The House of Commons places this limited sum at the disposal of the Executive Government, on the responsibility of the Ministers who spend it. All I can say is, and it is all I ought to say under the circumstances, that I believe this is a fund which is necessary for every Government to have at its disposal, and that the public would suffer very severely, and probably very dangerously, if there were no such fund capable of being spent upon the protection of life and property in the country.

MR. DILLWYN said, he regretted as much as anyone the necessity for such a fund as this. He had, it was true, always voted for it, but he had always thought that it should in some way be qualified; and he hoped that in addition to the assurance which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary it would be stated that no part of the fund was expended in raising the salaries of officials as was formerly the case. He thought it most desirable that the Committee should have an assurance that the Secret Service money was expended for purposes altogether outside the Public Service; and if that were added to the declaration which had been made, it would be very satisfactory to himself and many hon. Members.

Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH reminded the hon. Member for Swansea that the Resolution of the House upon the Motion made by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) on a former occasion had been virtually adopted by Her Majesty's Government some years ago, when it was decided that none of the Secret Service Fund should be paid in salaries. Since that time assurances had been frequently given that no official salaries were paid out of the Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had no particular objection to the Vote, nor did he think that the sum of £33,000 was too large to be intrusted to the Government in the shape of Secret Service money. But he would like the noble Lord to say, in addition to his statement that the system of raising salaries had been stopped, that the system of giving pensions from this fund had also been discontinued. He was glad to hear the noble Lord say it had, and he now asked whether the whole of this £33,000 was spent, or whether it did not often occur that a portion of it was returned? It was improbable that the whole of the money was spent, and if it were not so, he thought the Estimates ought to show the amount actually expended.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he believed it was necessary for the Government to have this money, because he thought that the present Government would not have been able to do what had been done in Ireland without it. Of this amount of £33,000, the greater portion was paid over to the Foreign Office, the Secretaries of State for the other Departments receiving portions of it, for which they gave their receipts and certificates. He believed there were instances in which the Foreign Office drew the whole of the money. The year before last there was a sum of more than £5,000 left in their hands which was returned to the Exchequer, and last year there was an amount of between £1,000 and £2,000 left undrawn. But it did not follow that because a Secretary of State drew a certain sum of money in any particular year and certified for it that he expended the whole of it in the course of that year; and certainly in the Foreign Office it was the practice, as disclosed before the Committee of Public Accounts, for the Foreign Secretary to draw what money he thought fit year by year, and to have a constantly increasing balance in his hands, so that at the time he left Office he had invariably a considerable sum to hand back to the Treasury; and it was found useful for that Department to have this money available, because it was always liable to be drawn upon by the other Secretaries of State, as banker for the Secret Service money. He was quite at a loss to understand what was the use made of the Secret Service money abroad, unless it was applied to the manufacture of infernal machines in America. But the Prime Minister had admitted last year that a sum of money was spent in Ireland, although he added that he did not think it was a very large one. Now, he objected entirely to the expenditure of the Secret Service money in Ireland. It was very well perhaps to spend it in America; but to spend it in Ireland was something against which Irish Members might be reasonably expected to protest, because they knew that out of this fund had come, over and over again in past years, the wages of blood, which had kept the regular Corydons and others in the pay of the Government. Of course, the Government would not be likely to allow an investigation to take place as to the amount expended in Ireland; but hon. Members might be permitted to ask them to state, in addition to what appeared on the Estimates as the amount of Secret Service money actually drawn under this Vote and from the Consolidated Fund, what was the distribution of it as between the different Departments. Surely the right hon. Gentleman would not object to tell the Committee what amount was allocated to the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office, and what was the amount which he himself drew for the purposes for which he required it. If this information were given, hon. Members could, by taking into account the money paid back into the Exchequer, ascertain the amount spent for various purposes in Ireland. He had made this appeal last year, and he now made it again, because he did not see that there was any reasonable ground for refusing the information asked for. It was also desirable to know what was the amount of the Secret Service money spent out of the Kingdom as well as within it. The Prime Minister had stated last year that £5,000 of the money had been left untouched, and that the expenditure under the head of Secret Service money was a constantly decreasing item, and he added that he hoped in a short time not only to reduce the amount of the Vote, but to get rid of it altogether, because there would always remain the £10,000 out of the Consolidated Fund. In consequence of that statement, he felt there would be a considerable reduction in the Vote of this year; and he must express his surprise at seeing the same amount asked for now as was the case 12 months ago, when the Prime Minister made the declaration.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. GORST said, it was not an uncommon thing for the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, when he got up to lecture hon. Members, entirely to misunderstand their point. His complaint was not that Ministers did not make a declaration, but that Parliament was not asked to vote the amount required by the various Departments upon the statement of the Minister of each Department that so much was required for the service of the country. The Committee were asked to vote a sum of money en bloc which was not accounted for, the Treasury being in ignorance of the way the money was used by the Ministers of the various Departments.

MR. HEALY asked whether it was out of this Vote or the Metropolitan Police Vote that the money came which the right hon. Gentleman found it necessary to expend in watching the houses of Irish Members?

MR. BIGGAR said, that, speaking as a Representative of the taxpayers of the Three Kingdoms, he was opposed to voting money for Secret Service purposes, because he believed the Government got no corresponding value in return. It was true there were the infernal machines; but these caused only a temporary excitement. The police in Ireland and in this country knew very well that information that was of substantial value could be obtained in the ordinary way; but if special means were taken the information was always of a thoroughly unreliable nature. Therefore, speaking from the ratepayers' point of view, he would say that no fault could be found with the expenditure of this money if true information were thereby obtained; but, unfortunately, the general experience was that the value of information was not in direct ratio to the amount paid for it—the greater the bribe, the greater the inducement to give erroneous information. On the question as to how this money was distributed amongst the various Departments, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accede to the wish expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), because if the information were given Irish Members would be able to make some guess as to the manner in which it was expended, and what was the value or the pretence of value received in return. On the whole, he did not think the Committee would be justified in expending the taxpayers' money upon such a fund.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought the Government were bound to give the Committee some explanation with regard to the allocation of the Secret Service Fund. It was all very well to say that Ministers certified in a certain solemn way the amounts drawn by their respective Departments; but that hardly made the Committee wiser as to the objects on which it was expended. The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had pointed out that the Foreign Office drew by far the largest amount; but he had also added that the Foreign Office in respect of the Secret Service money was a sort of bank on which the other Departments drew. He certainly thought the Government might inform the Committee what the Foreign Office really spent in obtaining information. But, looking to the notorious fact that this Department had had no information on any subject of importance for a long time back, it could not be by the Foreign Office that the Secret Service money was spent. He quite agreed that the Army and Navy were not fitting spheres for the expenditure of the fund; and, therefore, he must come down by a process of natural selection to the Home Office and the Office of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. With regard to the Home Office, did the promotion of bye-elections enter into the question of the allocation of Secret Service money? No doubt, from the point of view of the Government of the day the gaining of a bye-election was a matter of interest, and in the absence of information he certainly did not see why the Home Office should not be suspected of such an application of the fund. Then there was no doubt that a considerable portion of the fund went into the Irish Department; and when they looked on the number of arrests, and the probability that those arrests were purchased for money down, Irish Members had an additional reason for demanding additional information. It was of no use that the Secretary to the Treasury got up in a state of virtuous excitement when he heard these accusations charged against the Irish Department, because that Department had used the money unworthily, and would continue to do so until the connection between the two countries was severed. Under Ministers quite as Constitutional and quite as virtuous as the present Administration Secret Service money had been spent in Ireland in debauching public and private opinion, in the suborning of evidence, and in the entrapping of men by false charges. It did not follow that Gentlemen sitting in that House had any direct hand in transactions of this kind; but as long as every detail was kept back from public men, and as long as every clue was refused to the Representatives of the people, the Chiefs of Departments were exposed to the misuse of this fund by subordinates to which it was now necessary to refer more particularly. They had heard in previous Sessions of Parliament of Sergeant Talbot, the informer, probably rewarded out of the Secret Service Fund, who entrapped Irishmen by scores for the purpose of denouncing them and bringing them to judgment, even adding to the glee of the Chief Secretary of the day, who was regarded as a defender of the Constitution on the strength of the arrests made by Sergeant Talbot and his allies. Again, Mr. Porter, after his 10 years' service as magistrate in Dublin, stated in his reminiscences that one of the stock institutions of the Dublin Castle Administration in Ireland was the maintenance of a mock Court House, in which, before mock juries, the Constabulary witnesses were trained in giving the evidence which they would have to repeat when the real trial came on. In the house near Ship Street Barracks, there were juries, consisting of constables, barristers, informers, and a paid cross-examiner to examine the latter, so that they might have their catechism by heart when they came forward to swear away the lives of Irishmen afterwards. Now, all that must have cost something. The house near Ship Street Barracks was not obtained for nothing. Money must have been spent on the rent of it, and something more in the maintenance of the room which was the scene of that mock tribunal, as well as upon the mock jury and all engaged in the work of priming witnesses. By whom was that money paid? It could not have come out of the pockets of private individuals, because, notwithstanding the affectation of self-sacrifice which persons of that sort were wont to display, no one had ever suspected that class of being profuse of their money in Ireland. The money must therefore have come from another source, and it was inevitable to conclude that it was from the Secret Service Fund, at the disposal of the Castle, that the mock trial, and all those scandalous proceedings, were paid for, which Mr. Porter had described in his reminiscences. There was the notorious fact that the Secret Service money, in the management of the Castle, had been spent for the most abominable objects—the forging of testimony, the maintenance of a system of terrorism by accusations and charges of every kind, and the swearing away of the lives and liberties of Irishmen, for the general purpose of keeping up a rotten system of government in Ireland. It did not occur to any Irish Member to accuse the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) of any participation in such proceedings—his innocence of Irish affairs being sufficient to exculpate him from that charge. But the work had gone on generation after generation, and he was certain it was going on at that moment. The compilation of the famous Circular reminded the Committee of the sort of work that was being done in Ireland. The Chief Secretary felt bound to defend that Circular; but he knew that in his heart of hearts he disapproved it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot discuss Circulars addressed to constables in Ireland upon the Vote for the Secret Service money.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was alluding to the Circular in question as illustrative of the kind of objects on which Secret Service money in Ireland was expended; but if the Chairman thought this reference was out of Order, he would proceed no further with his observations upon that subject. He felt he had more than made out his case for an explanation on the part of the Government as to the allocation of the majority of the Secret Service money, which, he believed, was spent in Ireland. The demands made upon the Chief Secretary had been granted by him in the firm belief that they were required. Sub-inspectors, magistrates, informers, &c., had been paid; and he should like a detailed statement of the amounts expended in maintaining the authority of the Crown in Ireland, an authority which was maintained by such detestable means as those employed.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. HEALY condemned the course adopted by the Government with respect to the Secret Service Funds, and asked, on behalf of himself and his Colleagues, not as pryors or busy bodies, but as the Representatives of a large section of the public, for some satisfactory information on the subject. He did not ask for details, but wished to know how much was spent in England and Ireland and abroad, so that they might be able to judge whether the application of the money was proportionate to the amount asked for. He did not think this was asking too much. He was glad to see the Home Secretary in his place when this important matter was before the Committee, for he felt sure the right hon. Gentleman knew a great deal about the allocation of this fund. They were accustomed to see the virtuous indignation of the Home Secretary; but that was surpassed by his placidity, when he calmly said he could give no information about this matter. He would ask the noble Lord to state whether the Foreign Office did draw upon this fund.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the precise object of the House in granting Secret Service money was that the manner in which it was employed should be kept secret. It was intended that there should be no clue whatever to its application; but the House intrusted the Government with this money, believing that they would not improperly employ it. To give the information asked for would be the first step towards destroying the secrecy of the fund. The Head of the Department was responsible for the proper disposal of this fund, and the Head of the Department expended the money secretly under a high sense of the responsibility vested in him by the House when it voted the money for this fund. j

MR. R. POWER regretted the absence of the support formerly accorded to the protest against this Vote by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and other hon. Members, who, by a curious accident, had been transferred to the other side of the House. The Home Secretary had misunderstood the opposition on this occasion. What they wanted to know was, how much of this money was spent in England, how much in Scotland, and how much in Ireland? He admitted that it was perfectly right for the Government, by a system of spies and informers, to demoralize other countries for the purpose of obtaining information; but he strongly objected to that system being carried on in Ireland, and to the people of his country being demoralized by the amount of Secret Service money which was spent there, when it was only granted for the purpose of obtaining information about foreign countries. They had reason to know what Secret Service money had done for Ireland. They knew the number of men whom it had made dishonest. They knew how it was worked. They had only to look back on the history of agitations in that country to see the way in which every public movement had been destroyed. He need only allude to a man who was referred to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell)—that was Talbot. By professing his anxiety to sever the connection between England and Ireland, he had gained the confidence of the people in Ireland, and by taking the Sacrament of the Roman Catholic Church, and by tearing out of his Prayer Book the prayer for the Queen, he had convinced the people of his earnestness; and yet all the while he was receiving Secret Service money from the English Government. He (Mr. Power) challenged the Government to deny these things. He got the Secret Service money for doing these things; and, if anything were necessary to prove how badly this Secret Service system acted in Ireland, he had only to point to the speech made by the hon. Member for Carlow, who said that in 1847 his father, Sir John Gray, who was intimate with the Young Ireland Party, became acquainted with Barney Malone, who was sanguine as to a rising being effected. He sought to induce Sir John Gray and others to join him; but, on looking through some papers, Sir John Gray found that Malone had been in the receipt of a pension since 1838, and that in 1848 he was doing some work which, but for the accidental discovery of these papers, might have entangled Sir John Gray and others. That was the state of things in 1848. Talbot's evidence had paved the way in which this money was spent in 1867; and, for his own part, he believed that it was spent very much in the same way to-day. He believed there were informers all over Ireland. The Government knew reasonably suspected persons. They thought they had reasonable suspicion, and that they knew more about the movement in Ireland than the Irish people themselves knew; but he challenged the Chief Secretary to get up and say why he had proclaimed Waterford County and Waterford City, when they were declared by the Chairman of the county to be in a quiet condition.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is going beyond the Question of the Secret Service Vote.

MR. R. POWER said, he did not think he was going beyond that question, because Secret Service money had a great deal to do with the proclamation of Waterford. But his principal objection to this Vote was that it created distrust in every official of the Government. The Government seemed to have no confidence in any portion of the people of Ireland, except the miserable wretches who crept into the Castle in Dublin and whispered into the ears of the Government information and statements which they dared not make in public—information and statements which the Chief Secretary would not dare to get up and make, because he knew that abundant proof could be brought that they were false. The Committee was asked to consent to vote this money; but for what? For men who made it their business—and a very good business it was from their point of view—to undermine the nationality of Ireland, and to send up false Reports to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and who, in many instances, sent hundreds of men to prison, and sometimes even to the gallows. If the Chief Secretary could get up that night and state that he had taken the arbitrary course he had pursued—if he could get up and say that it was not from secret information that he proclaimed certain cities, or towns, or counties in Ireland, if he could get up and say that that was not the result of the Secret Service money, he would give the right hon. Gentleman credit for more courage than he had displayed on former occasions.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: It seems to me that a great number of hon. Members from Ireland object to Secret Service money being given at all, and on this ground—that they think part of this money is spent in Ireland, and that it is improperly spent. They have asked a great many questions of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State and of the Chief Secretary. Those are questions which it would be impossible for any Government to answer. If you object to any Secret Service money being given, vote against it; but if the money is voted as Secret Service money, it is absolutely impossible for the Government to answer any questions upon it. And it is not whether it has been spent in this way or in that; but you cannot come to a general category as to whether it is spent and in what way, and thus nibble at the questions which Parliament says cannot be answered. If you cannot trust the Government, vote against the money; but it is absolutely impossible for the Government to give the slightest clue so long as it is voted as Secret Service money.

MR. ANDERSON objected to the Home Secretary's statement that Members voted for this money because they trusted the Government. He took exception to that description of hon. Members' motives for voting upon the question. He had always voted against it, and a great many other Members had voted against it, simply because they considered it a discreditable item in the finances of the country, and wished to see it disappear altogether from the Estimates. He believed he could name five or six Gentlemen who were now on the Treasury Bench who used to entertain that identical opinion, and voted against the money on former occasions. He agreed entirely with the intention of the Irish Members to vote against it, although he did not agree in their reasons for doing so.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was not surprised that no information was obtained from the Government, for, of course, the very nature of Secret Service money was that it should be expended in secret; and he should like to know how the Government could carry on their present system in Ireland if the House knew how the money was spent? He did not think there was a statesman on the Treasury Bench with sufficient courage to defend the expenditure of some of this money. Probably the Ministers themselves did not know, and did not care to know, how it was expended. It was spent by the understrappers, and only on rare occasions was the expenditure made known to the chief authorities. In 1848, it was proved in a Court of Law, on the trial of Smith O'Brien, that Secret Service money was deliberately given to men to induce them to become members of Smith O'Brien's organization, to represent themselves as ardent sympathizers, and to attend the meetings; and part of their plan was to urged the Young Ireland Confederation to change itself from an open Association to a secret Society for the promotion of revolution. One of the leading men in that shameful service had stated upon oath in Court that he rose to great favour with some of the younger men, and endeavoured to induce them to change their organization into a secret Association the better to prepare for armed rebellion, and that it was only through the advice of the leaders that his most odious purpose was not carried out. He stated that he did all he could to urge on rebellion, and mentioned the names of some young men whom he had gained over. He was paid for that out of the Secret Service money by the Government. Then there was the case in which the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland employed one of the most infamous papers to write down the Irish patriots and to write up the cause of law and order in Ireland, and that was a paper which lived by levying black mail on private individuals, and making abominable charges against them if they did not pay. A leading Irish lawyer—afterwards, he believed, Lord Chancellor—was accused of most odious and infamous crimes because he refused to pay. When the Rebellion of 1848 came to an end, a man who professed to be a patriot went round among the young men who were known to have been sympathizers in the movement, in order to get up a sworn secret association for the purpose of rebellion. He succeeded in organizing a very considerable secret association, the members of which he swore in to join him at a given day in rebellion. He was a police spy paid from the Secret Service money; and he (Mr. M'Carthy) thought he could hardly give stronger instances than that of the odious perversion of the funds by the Government to get up a rebellion.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

amongst young and inexperienced men for the purpose of crushing it. No doubt, very much the same thing had been going on ever since. Many other informers were known who, on many occasions, had not only watched what was taking place, but had taken part in the movement and fomented it. Such men were paid out of the Secret Service money. If these were not reasons enough to discredit the whole system in the eyes of the world, he knew of no reasons that could be brought to bear on the minds of human beings. They could not expect the Government to say what they gave these men to get up agitations, or to teach the police how to suspect their neighbours; but if they would state generally how much of this money was appropriated for the benefit of Ireland, even that information would make it more difficult to maintain that system by a Parliament which still claimed to be free.

Mr. LEAMY said, this Secret Service money was the only means by which the Government could maintain its supremacy over Ireland. The present Liberal Government placed more faith in the spy than in honest men; but he could not understand what objection there was to stating how much of the money was spent in Ireland. The Home Secretary said he could not give a clue; but suppose it were stated that £34,000 were spent in Ireland, how would that give any clue to the people who received it, or to its purpose? They who were acquainted with the whole history of the country knew very well how the money was spent. The informers were subsidized, and were living on blood-money, as they always had been, and they were the trusted servants of the Government. Malony, to whom allusion had been made, had, in 1848, been living on blood-money for 50 years, and leading men to the gallows. He did not care to know how this money was spent abroad. The present Government probably required to spend money in foreign countries, in order to overthrow a Power they could not meet in the field. But, surely, there could not be any objection to stating what was now asked. As long as the British Government ruled over Ireland there would, he supposed, be this Secret Service money on the Estimates; but the Irish Members would oppose it, and much more strongly than hon. Members opposite seemed to think.

Mr. CALLAN said, it would be advisable for the Chief Secretary or the Home Secretary to make some statement as to the amount of money spent on these purposes in Ireland. He was one of those who were horrified the other day to read the statement which appeared in the London papers with regard to the bogus explosion business—he said “the bogus explosion business,” in the presence of the Home Secretary, advisedly. The affair seemed to have frightened the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), whose courage evidently was not to be measured by his inches. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman considered himself the most courageous person in the House of Commons; but he (Mr. Callan) did not believe he would be impenetrable if wrapped up in cotton wool, or even in cement. In Ireland they were persuaded that the outrage was altogether a manufactured affair, for the purpose of creating a prejudice against the people of that country in the minds of the English people. But a great deal of the objectionable surroundings would be removed if they had an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that none of the Secret Service money had been spent in America for the purpose of bringing about this mysterious business. The Irish people firmly believed that these outrages were paid for. It was believed that these attempts were a safe investment, and that the money came from England, and was not subscribed by the poor labourers and dairymaids of America. The English Secret Service money was a much safer nest to get the egg from than the pocket of the poor labourer or dairymaid. It would be satisfactory to hear that nothing had been paid for purposes of this kind out of the Secret Service money; and he should think it would be to the interest of the Home Secretary himself to deny that he had ever sanctioned the expenditure of money in Ireland or America for the purpose of getting up bogus outrages. He could not forget the case of the infamous informer Talbot, who went to a Catholic church and absolutely received the Sacrament in order to spy upon the people, and who was paid for so doing by the Chief Secretary. Why should it be thought that it was the landed proprietors who had done that? There was nothing superior, as far as he could see, in a wool-stapler over a landlord—there was no superiority in the decaying trade of a wool-stapler over the decaying trade, in Ireland, of a landed proprietor. They had the case established of a constable receiving the Sacrament as a spy, and there was no reason why he should not have been employed by the Chief Secretary, and not the landed proprietors.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, this was not the first time the matter had been before the House. In 1879 there had been a Motion to reduce the Vote by £5,000, and in the division which took place there voted for the reduction—"Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Leonard Henry Courtney, Sir Arthur Divett Hayter, Mr. John Holms, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Anthony John Mundella, Mr. George Otto Trelveyan," and the Tellers for the Ayes were "Mr. Rylands and Sir Charles W. Dilke." And in the interesting document in which he found these names so placed he failed to find amongst the Noes the name of the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt). [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was out of the House at the time.] One would have thought that a pillar of the Constitution like the right hon. Gentleman would have made it his duty to support the right hon. Gentleman who preceded him in Office in a matter of this kind. But he wished to know whether the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), or the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Trevelyan), or the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Courtney), would go with some hon. Members in opposing the Vote? With regard to the last mentioned hon. Member (Mr. Courtney), he did not know whether his convictions on this matter, as in regard to the Transvaal, were of an equally mutable character; but hon. Members had a right to ask whether he and his Colleagues who had gone into the Lobby against the Vote in 1879 were ready to swallow it now. He had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), and it appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman had altogether wandered away from the question at issue. What he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) wished to ask more particularly was this—whether any of this Secret Service money was spent on elections in England? He did not state that such was the case on his own authority; but he heard it said, on very good authority, that Secret Service money, which was voted in the interest of the State and for the protection of the State, was actually spent at elections. He did not know whether it was spent by both Parties alike. ["No, no!"] Well, if it was not, or if his information upon the subject generally was erroneous, no doubt it would be denied by the Treasury. At any rate, he wished to be satisfied on the point. The noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) said he should not be appealed to for any information on this subject, as it had nothing to do with him; but, as a matter of fact, the Treasury had to give the money to the Heads of the Departments. The Treasury knew how much money it gave to the Heads of the Departments—the noble Lord knew very well how much the Home Secretary, for instance, had asked for. The noble Lord was one of the purse-bearers of the nation, and when the Home Secretary wanted money the noble Lord did not give him a blank cheque. He would give the right hon. Gentleman a certain sum of money, for which the right hon. Gentleman would certify; therefore, the noble Lord could tell them the exact amount which each Department received, if he thought proper. He saw the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was not in his place, and some hon. Members were inclined to regret that circumstance; but, as far as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was concerned, he did not regret it, as he believed the hon. Member, if he had been present, would have opposed the Vote on grounds utterly fallacious. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not oppose it on the grounds stated by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson); he believed that some of that Secret Service money was absolutely necessary. [An hon. MEMBER: There is none spent in America.] Well, he did not know whether or not there was any spent in America, but perhaps America might be able to do without it, as the form of government in America was infinitely better than that in this country. In England, however, they could not do altogether without Secret Service money, as it was part of the paraphernalia of Monarchal government. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could not support the abolition of the Vote, as he did not believe in the visionary schemes which had been referred to by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen. He had a right to ask whether any of that money was spent in Ireland, especially as they knew perfectly well that there was no necessity for the expenditure of a penny of it in that country. Every penny of it spent in Ireland was used dishonestly. No doubt, it was a ridiculous thing to ask the Home Secretary how the money was spent; the right hon. Gentleman was at the head of a Department that had a most serious and perilous responsibility attaching to it, and it would be preposterous for them to demand that he should open to the public eye the secrets—the necessary secrets—of his Office. But he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) defied any Minister to get up and say that he could spend a penny of Secret Service money in Ireland for an honest and legitimate purpose. If they could not establish the fact that Secret Service money was necessary in that country, then they had a right to affirm the alternative proposition—namely, that none of the money should be spent there. Would the Chief Secretary get up and tell them that he did not spend a penny of Secret Service money in Ireland? He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) should not go into the Lobby against the Vote for Secret Service money on general principles. Though he could not support the Vote, he, at any rate, would not go into the Lobby against it.

Mr. LEAMY said, that as they had not received the assurance they demanded from the right hon. Gentleman, and also considering the lateness of the hour, he should move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Leamy.)

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) has put a question to me which ought to be answered—he has asked whether any of the Secret Service money is spent upon elections. I answer that query in the negative. I quite understand the objection some people may have, on general principles, to the voting of Secret Service money. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last but one said that subjected to Secret Service money being spent in Ireland; but that matter has already been discussed in this House, and, therefore, I hope that we shall now be allowed to go to a division. The hon. Member who next spoke moved to report Progress, because no answer had been given to the question; but he must remember that, earlier in the debate, I gave my reasons why I could not answer such a question. The Secret Service money is a Vote on which, from its very nature, no explanation can be given; therefore, no amount of reporting Progress or obstructive divisions will have the effect desired by hon. Members. Either this Secret Service Vote is right or it is wrong. If it is wrong, then vote against it; but if it is right, it is impossible for the Government to give any explanation as to the amount spent by each Department, or as to the places or the manner in which it is spent. I hope, under the circumstances, hon. Members having fully stated their grievances, we may now be allowed to go to a division.

Mr. GORST said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman he had no doubt that no part of the Secret Service money which was spent in connection with his Department was spent upon elections; but did the right hon. Gentleman know how that portion of the Secret Service money which was not spent in the Department over which he presided was allocated? If the right hon. Gentleman did, then he (Mr. Gorst) was perfectly satisfied; but if he did not know how much was spent in other Departments, perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury would get up and give them an assurance, as the right hon. Gentleman had done, that no part of the Secret Service money was devoted to election expenses?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the whole of the allotment was under the direction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am very much surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gorst), whom I should have thought knows as much about elections as anyone, should have asked this question. I should have thought that he would have been able to speak of the practice of the late Government on this matter. For the present Government, however, I will take upon myself the responsibility of saying that in none of the Departments is any Secret Service money spent upon elections. I will go further than that, and say that for many years in this country no Administration has ever spent a single farthing of this money on elections.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR appealed to his hon. Friend (Mr. Leamy) to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress. They had elicited this fact from the Government, that not only was some of the Secret Service money spent abroad, but some of it was spent at home. That, in fact, appeared from the very words of the Vote itself—"foreign and other Secret Service money." On former occasions they had heard that a portion of the money was spent in Ireland. The Government was able to deny that any of it was spent on electioneering; but if that were so, they had all the more money to spend on purposes, perhaps, even worse than electioneering. The right hon. Gentleman said the Treasury knew nothing about the way in which the money was allocated; but, from the document he had in his hand, it seemed that the head under which these payments would be accounted for was the Treasury. Hon. Members had, therefore, naturally addressed queries to the Treasury; but having made the protest which they had made, he thought it was hardly necessary to delay going to the division which must be taken on the Vote. In the division they would be able to judge of the sincerity of certain Members of the Government who, while out of Office, went into the Lobby against the Vote, but who, now that their Party were in Office, would vote in favour of it. The division would be an interesting one, and he could only regret that the Chief Secretary, after sitting in his place and hearing, over and over again, as he had done, most distinct and pointed charges against the Department over which he presided, thought it consistent with his self-respect, and with a proper discharge of the duties of his Office, to sit in silence, and to admit, by his tacit and silent demeanour, that there was really no answer to be made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I hope the Committee will not suppose for a moment that I admit any one of these charges.

MR. R. POWER said, the hon. Member (Mr. Leamy) ought to withdraw his proposal on one condition—namely, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would state how much of this Secret Service money was spent in Ireland. As Irish Representatives, they had a distinct right to know that; and unless they obtained the necessary information, they were quite justified in opposing the Vote by every means in their power.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that during the various discussions that had taken place on this Vote he had been glad to notice that a large number of English Members had alternated with Irish Members in protesting against it. He did not know whether the Home Secretary would appeal to them to have confidence in the Government, seeing that there were so many distinguished Members of the House who opposed the expenditure of this money by the late Government in the present Administration. He supposed it would be argued that now the Government were strengthened by having these Gentlemen in it, there was every guarantee that the Secret Service money would not be expended upon any of the odious purposes upon which it used to be spent. He had been puzzling his brains to find out on what ground right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite would defend their change of front. Although there was some ground for confidence in having these Gentlemen in the Government, those who were still independent Members of the House were not exempted from the duty of protesting against this Vote on certain grounds. It had always seemed to him that a Minister rising to address the Committee on this Vote would do some public service by giving some assurance that the money would not be applied to any of the purposes which had been named from time to time by hon. Gentlemen who had complained of the use of the Secret Service money. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), he thought, was strictly accurate in every one of the statements he had made to-night in reference to the action of those charged with the government of Ireland in past times in reference to the employment of a Vote of this kind. But the question immediately before them was the question of reporting Progress. He thought, if they took a division on this Motion, the strength of the opposition to this Vote would not sufficiently appear. He was not sure whether the hon. Memba for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and the other Scotch and English Members who agreed with the Irish Members, would be disposed to vote with them on the question of reporting Progress; and, as the issue was a very fair and straightforward one, he should be inclined to say that, as a matter of policy, it would be better to withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress, and take a division on the Main Question.

Mr. HEALY trusted his hon. Friend would not proceed with his Motion to report Progress, as the Committee was now perfectly prepared to take a division on the Vote. He could not join with his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in rejoicing over the fact that none of this money, if spent at all, was spent upon elections. If it was not spent upon elections, they might rest assured that it was spent for much more discreditable purposes.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 17: Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 348.)

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

PETROLEUM (HAWKING) BILL—[Lords.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

[BILL 222.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 29th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Regulations for hawking petroleum).

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Mr. WHITLEY said, that the question of allowing pedlars to carry petroleum about in carts had become a very large cry in all the large towns. They were able to carry petroleum about in carts, and to carry on their business opposite the shops of tradespeople dealing in the same article; and so great had the outcry against this become that he had been asked to introduce a Bill compelling those people to desist from that practice. It was very injurious to tradespeople who had to pay heavy rates and taxes; but this Bill proposed to legalize what these pedlars could not now do. These people could only be dealt with by prosecutions for obstruction in the streets; but tradespeople knew that that was an impracticable way of dealing with them. This Bill proposed to extend the provisions of the Hawker's Bill, and allow the hawkers to carry a dangerous commodity through the streets of towns and villages; but he should like to know in whose interest the Bill was promoted? He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that it was in the interest of the poor; but he could assure the hon. Gentleman that nothing could be more detrimental to the interests of that class who had suffered from depression of trade, and who were tradespeople, and he thought those were the people to whom sympathy was due. He could not conceive any class of poor people who were benefited. No one could have greater sympathy with the poor than he had, but he could not see for whose interest this Bill was promoted. He hoped some information would be given as to who the promoters were, and that hon. Members who represented large boroughs would look closely into the provisions of the Bill, which was calculated to do a great deal of harm.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that this is not the second reading of the Bill.

MR. COURTNEY said, the hon. Member had strangely misconceived the purport of the Bill. He seemed to oppose it as though it were a question between hawkers and non-hawkers, and as if it would increase hawking; but it had nothing at all of that character. It did not in any way interfere with the issue of licences or the restrictions applying to hawking. It simply dealt with the hawking of petroleum and not with the licences. No one not otherwise licensed to hawk would be able to hawk under this Bill. It did no more than allow a licensed hawker, having a licence to keep petroleum, to hawk it. The hawking of petroleum went on now; and if the hon. Gentleman had any acquaintance with the rural life of England, and the convenience of hawking petroleum from door to door, he would see that the Bill dealt with the convenience of the poor in the country. By this Bill it was proposed that any person who was licenced to deal in petroleum might, under certain prescribed conditions, hawk it.

MR. WARTON urged that it was not safe to allow people to hawk petroleum, and he would ask hon. Members to consider what would be the result of any damage to a vessel containing 10 gallons of petroleum. He would remind the Committee of the terrible accident which had occurred in Wales some years ago, when a Peer of the Realm and other persons of less consequence were burnt to death; and if such an accident could occur on a railway with all the care taken by railway officials, how could it be said that such an accident would not occur to petroleum hawked about the streets? He begged to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Warton.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 3; Noes 70: Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 349.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Modification of regulations by Secretary of State).

MR. COURTNEY explained that this clause proposed to empower the Secretary of State to alter, repeal, or vary regulations laid down by the Act; but he proposed to move an Amendment by which such alterations should be laid before Parliament before becoming law. The desirability must be recognized of relieving the House of the necessity for entering into matters of detail; and he thought the objections which had been raised to this clause would be removed by his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 8, at end, insert as a separate paragraph,—

"Every such regulation shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament forthwith after it is made if Parliament be then sitting, and, if not, within seven days after the then next Session of Parliament.

"If within forty days after any such regulation has been laid before Parliament either House of Parliament resolves that such regulation should be annulled, the same shall thenceforth become void without prejudice to anything done in the meanwhile in pursuance thereof."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. Courtney

MR. HOPWOOD said, he thought the proposed Amendment itself required amending. It proposed that the regulations should be laid before Parliament forthwith, if Parliament was sitting, and, if not, within seven days after the then next Session of Parliament. That would mean in the Recess. The words should read—"after the commencement of." He was still resolute against the clause, and exceedingly sorry that at that hour in the morning they should have to consider what he regarded as a matter of great significance with regard to legislation. He did not at all agree that the House should abdicate its functions and allow a Secretary of State to exercise them. It was a dangerous doctrine to propound; and dangerous to pass this clause suggested by the growing tendency on the part of Departments to gain extraordinary powers, and so avoid the vigilance of Parliament. This affected a large class of very useful men; they were, in fact, costermongers of petroleum, carrying the article about the country. These men carried petroleum in the country from cottage to cottage, nearly all of which were lighted by it. The hawkers carried on the business with benefit to the community, and were, he thought, in every way to be encouraged rather than suppressed. A case had been made out for supervising the hawking by these men of this rather dangerous material, and the Bill which had been prepared set forth the different regulations which were to be observed. The provisions were drawn with some care, but had been rendered wide and vague in order that there might be no case which would escape the general power of the magistrates to say whether or not a person against whom a charge might be brought was guilty of negligence in the conveyance of this material. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) advocated in Committee the retention of a clause of this sort—a clause which would enable one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State, from time to time, to make, or, when made, to alter, repeal, or add to regulations for the purpose of rescinding, altering, or adding to regulations contained in the Bill with respect to hawking petroleum. The regulations contained in the Act would be part of the law of the land, and the penalty for breaking them would be a maximum of £20. By this clause it was proposed to intrust the Secretary of State with authority to repeal, or abolish, or alter part of an Act of Parliament. What was the use, then, of specifying any of those things which he was to be empowered to do? Why should they not say simply—"Be it enacted that the Secretary of State shall declare what the law shall be with regard to the hawking of petroleum?" The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney), who was repentant rather late, seemed to see that this was objectionable, and endeavoured to disarm criticism by saying that when the Secretary of State had passed new regulations they should be laid on the Table of the House, and not come into force until the expiration of 40 days. After they had been on the Table for 40 days, and no objection was taken to them, they would become law; so that an Act of Parliament might be by them repealed, unless there was a protest made within 40 days. The Secretary of State would be empowered to continue the Act up to, say, next February, and he might then choose to abolish or repeal the main part of it and substitute something else. It might then wait for some time until it should receive the tacit sanction of Parliament; but the moment that he made the regulations the hawker of petroleum might be prosecuted for any breach of them without knowing of the change. Of course, it would be said that, under such circumstances, magistrates would not convict; but magistrates were sometimes led away by evidence that was not quite reliable, and they sometimes were of opinion that a defendant was not telling the truth, and this especially when he said he did not know the state of the law. It would be best to have the law contained in a Statute Book, so that the hawker might have resort to it, or his legal adviser might know where to find it. He (Mr. Hopwood) objected to giving a Secretary of State, however eminent he might be, power to alter or rescind a law. These things always resolved themselves into this. Some official suggested a certain course to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State, who was, perhaps, overworked, would only run his eye over the proposal to see if he could agree to it. If there was nothing very objectionable to his mind in it, it received his sanction.

That was not the way in which they should proceed. If the Act, after it was passed, required amendment, an Amending Bill should be brought in and passed.

MR. BROADHURST said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) would see fit to withdraw this clause. The power given to the Secretary of State to make rules and regulations was a very serious matter, especially on a question of this kind. Under the powers of this clause, the hawking trade of these poor people might be absolutely ruined at the will of the Home Office. Let them, for instance, suppose that a change of Government took place, and the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) was appointed to the Office held by the hon. Member (Mr. Courtney.) He, in the interest of his friends, the aristocratic shopkeepers, would propose at once to annihilate the hawking trade. He (Mr. Broadhurst) was, therefore, considerably alarmed at the proposal of the Government, after the speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool. The fact was, that London would be absolutely starved within a single week if they put a stop to street-hawking. He had in his pocket a letter on this subject from a man at Greenwich, and he regretted very much that neither of this person's Representatives were in their place to look after his interests. The writer said that he had been in the oil trade for eight years, and mainly looked upon that for providing a living for his family, and paying the rent and rates of his shop. He declared that if these extraordinary powers were given to the Department to interfere with his trade it might ruin him. He (Mr. Broadhurst) hoped the Committee would take particular notice of the appeal that had been made on behalf of the large shopkeepers. These people were constantly harassing the costermongers in all their large towns, although the costermongers were a class who made food possible to the poor by bringing it to their doors. The costermongers were constantly being persecuted by these large and, very often, uncivil and high-priced shopkeepers. Whatever the Committee did, he appealed to it to protect, as far as possible, not only the immediate but the future interests of these hard-working and deserving hawkers of food and other necessities of life in their large towns.

MR. DILLWYN said, he looked with great jealousy upon the proposal now made by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, who told them it was desirable to place this large power of making regulations in the hands of the Executive. No doubt, the hon. Member would say there was a precedent for giving that power to the Government. He might say that the Executive had power to regulate the sale of gunpowder; but the two cases were not parallel, inasmuch as gunpowder was in the hands of a very few persons, and was not hawked about the streets, whilst petroleum was used by very nearly everyone, and was taken from door to door for the convenience of the public. He thought the dispensing power which the hon. Member sought to obtain was objectionable, and ought not to be sanctioned by the Committee. In his Amendment the hon. Gentleman proposed that the rules should be laid on the Table of Parliament, and unless objected to within 40 days, should become law; but they all knew, in a Session such as the present, for instance, what difficulties a private Member experienced in bringing forward a Motion, and in getting a question decided. It might be impossible for any step to be taken within 40 days. As the Government would be in favour of the rules they proposed, it could not be expected, if any Member took exception to them, that they would put themselves out of the way to give him an opportunity of making his objection, so that, as he had said, a private Member would have very little chance of bringing forward his case within 40 days. There was a very strong objection to this proposal on the part of many hon. Members, and he earnestly hoped that the hon. Member (Mr. Courtney), who had already objected to certain modifications suggested in the 2nd clause, would make a concession in the present case. He (Mr. Dillwyn) had accepted the hon. Member's verdict with regard to the 2nd clause; but he trusted the hon. Member would himself give way on the point under discussion, yielding to the very strong feeling expressed on every side of the House.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he agreed in the hope that the hon. Member would withdraw the proposal. The result of adopting it might lead to hardships amongst a poor and useful class.

They were dealing with men of a very different class to those affected by the Explosives Act. The proposal affected poor men in a small way of business, who were very useful to a large portion of the community, especially in country districts. If it were accepted, the Secretary of State might make some new regulation; a hawker, without knowing it, might infringe that regulation, and his trade might be immediately stopped. It might be stopped until Parliament met again, and probably for 40 days after Parliament had met, and possibly much longer, because, as had been pointed out, a private Member would experience considerable difficulty in bringing on the question within the specified 40 days. The poor man might, in the meantime, be absolutely ruined, because they would take away from him the power of dealing in petroleum and carrying it about from house to house. He trusted the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department would see his way to withdrawing the proposition.

MR. COURTNEY said, that whilst he must confess he did not agree with many Members of the Committee upon these matters, he could not disguise from himself the fact that the clause was very powerfully opposed. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) seemed to object to the Executive Government having power to administer the details of a measure, and the Committee evidently was insufficiently advanced to accept that doctrine. He would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause negatived.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Definitions).

MR. WHITLEY said, there was a reference made here to the Hawkers' and Pedlars' Act, and he wished to know why only persons hawking petroleum should be allowed to use carriages in their trade? He believed he was correct in saying that in the town of Brighton there were no hawkers at all. The hawking nuisance had risen to such a pitch that the Town Council took means to put a stop to all hawking in the streets. The rich shopkeepers—in spite of what an hon. Member had said—cared nothing at all about it. It was now proposed by a side-wind to give petroleum hawkers a power which no other class of hawkers possessed. If it was desirable to let hawkers generally use carriages, well and good; but it seemed to him highly objectionable that petroleum hawkers alone should be allowed to have this power. He had occasion, very often indeed, as a magistrate, to hear cases against hawkers, and he knew fines to have been over and over again levied upon them for carrying on their trade contrary to the Acts of Parliament. It seemed to him that it would be unwise to allow the clause to pass.

MR. C. H. JAMES said, the Bill seemed to him to be a most reasonable one in every respect, except Clause 3, which they had just struck out. If Clause 6 were struck out half the utility of the measure would be done away with. He had seen petroleum hawked about the streets, and he could assure the Committee it was not carried about in great carts, but in cans fixed upon wheels, just as milk was carried from door to door. If they did not allow it to be taken about in that way it would be necessary for parents to send out children, perhaps 10 or 12 years of age, or even younger, with bottles or small tin cans for this dangerous material; and certainly that would be much more objectionable than the course proposed by this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION ACT (1880) AMENDMENT BILL—[Lords.]

(Mr. Courtney.)

[BILL 226.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he had a new clause to propose for the protection of bond fide naturalists and collectors of birds. He thought it only proper that some distinction should be drawn between these persons and the people who destroyed birds illegally out of season when they were helpless and easily destroyed. That part of the year in which birds were most worth preserving was the spring, and that was the period of the year when they were not allowed to be taken or killed. According to the existing law, a collector of birds, private amateur, or a representative of a museum, could not take birds as specimens without incurring serious penalties. What he proposed was that the Court, before whom a person was brought up and charged with destroying birds out of season, should have a discretionary power in a matter of conviction. If it could be shown that the birds had been taken for preservation in an ornithological collection or museum, the Court should be able to excuse them. In other countries where wild birds were protected the Minister of the Interior himself had power to exempt from the operation of the law persons taking birds for scientific purposes; but after what had just taken place in regard to the Petroleum (Hawking) Bill, he would not propose that method of dealing with the subject in this country.

New Clause to follow Clause 1—

(Reservation in case of birds killed for scientific purposes.)

“A person shall not be liable to be convicted under ‘The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880,’ if he satisfies the Court before whom he is charged that any wild birds which he has killed and offered for sale are intended bonâ fide for preservation in an ornithological collection or museum.”—(Sir David Wedderburn.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. COURTNEY said, that he had had every desire to meet the hon. Member for Haddington (Sir David Wedderburn), but he found it quite impossible to do so. If the clause were accepted, the whole Bill would be shattered, because it would be impossible to prove what the intention of a person was when he took birds when brought up before the magistrates. Nor was the clause necessary. A bond fide ornithologist, when taken before the magistrates, would be able to say that he was in pursuit of scientific knowledge, and, under the power of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, the magistrates would be able to dismiss the case if they believed him.

MR. THOMASSON trusted that the Amendment would not be accepted.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. ROUND said, he rose to move the omission of Clause 2 from the Bill, and what he had to say on the matter he should say as shortly as possible. The clause proposed the insertion of the lark in the Schedule of the "Wild Birds Act, 1880," and he submitted that it was quite unnecessary to include that bird in the special protection provided by the Schedule. He was as much a friend of the lark as any Member of that House; but he thought it quite unnecessary to provide this special protection for it—a penalty of 5*s.* being, in his opinion, sufficient for the purpose. Everyone knew that it was difficult to find larks' nests in the spring of the year, the nature of the ground at that time providing ample cover; and if there was any diminution in the number of larks, he thought it was owing to the severe winters they had had during the last three years. They ought to endeavour to carry public opinion with them in this sort of legislation; and as it was a fact that at certain seasons of the year larks pulled up sprouting corn, if this bird were included in the Schedule, it would make the Bill more unpopular than it was now in the eyes of those people it would mostly concern. This was not the time to introduce new matter into the Schedule. As had been pointed out, the Act of last year gave protection to nearly all wild birds, including the lark, and the present was merely a Declaratory Bill, explaining the construction of a particular clause in the Act of last year which appeared to be of doubtful character; but this new matter, he submitted, ought not to be brought before the House. For those reasons he moved the omission of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, to leave out Clause 2.—(Mr. Round.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLWYN said, he was as fond of larks as the hon. Member who had just spoken; but he had long felt that severe penalties were not the best way of preserving birds. He regretted that in "another place" several small birds had been added to the Schedule. Penalties should be imposed for valuable birds, and not for small birds, and he thought larks were far more likely to be protected under the Bill as it previously stood than by severe penalties. For that reason he hoped the alterations made in "another place" would be omitted.

MR. BROADHURST said, he hoped the lark would not be omitted, for he had an affection for that bird, and he would not bow to the opinion of the hon. Member who made the Motion. With regard to larks' nests, in his opinion the lark's nest was very easy to find, and he had never failed to discover a lark's nest whenever he wanted one. It was only necessary to watch where the lark rose and to see where he settled, for the lark always settled within 20 yards of its nest. The lark was one of the most beautiful wild birds, and was becoming scarcer every year, and he hoped that the House would protect it.

MR. COURTNEY confessed that he had no feeling one way or the other as to the lark, and whether it was included in the Schedule or omitted appeared to him a perfectly open question. But what he had heard privately or in the other House inclined him to adhere to the Act of last Session; and, although he would wish to be respectful to the other House, on the whole he thought it would be better to keep to the original form of this clause.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 29; Noes 25: Majority 4.—(Div. List, No. 350.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SAVINGS BANKS AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS, AND SECURITIES IN CHANCERY DIVISION.—REPORT.—NATIONAL DEBT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Resolutions [August 1] reported.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that on the previous night the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had said that the House was not taken by surprise in regard to this matter, because the Prime Minister had announced the measure in his Budget speech. That was perfectly accurate as regarded the matter of the Prime Minister's speech, but not as regarded the spirit of that speech. The Prime Minister, no doubt, did sketch his scheme in his Budget speech; but he promised not to place it before the House for its practical judgment until after the Budget; and on the 29th of April, in reply to the right hon. and gallant Member for Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), he said he did not intend to bring this scheme in until the Budget was out of the way, and that the necessary information would be in the hands of Members before that time. The Budget Bill was out of the way by the 31st of May, and when the Prime Minister said he would not introduce this scheme until after the Budget Bill was out of the way, that was equivalent to saying that he would bring it in then, or soon after; but it never could be held that the Prime Minister meant not only that the House should wait till the Budget Bill was out of the way, but that they should also wait till the last days of the Session, when half the Members were away, before having the scheme before them. He, therefore, thought the House had been more or less taken by surprise, and the country had had no opportunity of considering the measure in any way. The Prime Minister held out the hope that it would be brought forward and the necessary information given in time for it to be considered, but it was not known that the proposal was to impose £2,000,000 of taxation on the country for 21 years. He believed the country would wish to oppose the scheme; but it was no use opposing it now; and if the Government were determined to carry it through, he could only enter his protest against it.

Resolutions agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 236.]

EAST INDIAN LOANS, ANNUITIES, &C.— INDIAN LOAN OF 1879 BILL.

Resolutions [August 1] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 237.]

CORRUPT PRACTICES (SUSPENSION OF ELECTIONS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Bill to suspend for a limited period, on account of Corrupt Practices, the holding of an Election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for certain Cities and Boroughs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 238.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, 3rd August, 1881.

The House met;—And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at a quarter past One o'clock, till To-morrow,
Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 3rd August, 1881.

*MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee —CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class II.—
SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPART-MENTS.*

Resolutions [August 2] reported.

*PUBLIC BILLS—Select Committee—Report—Poor Relief and Audit of Accounts (Scotland)
[No. 373].*

Withdrawn — Ballot Act Continuance and Amendment [2]; Church Patronage (No. 2)* [175].*

QUESTION.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE CONVENTION WITH THE BOERS.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, to be so good as to furnish the House with the latest information he possesses in regard to the Convention signed with the hostile Boers in the Transvaal; and also to state in particular, what guarantee or security is afforded for the carrying out of the stipulations made on behalf of the Boers; by what tribunal the damages occasioned by the action of the Boers will be assessed, and what security there is for their payment; and where it is intended that the British Resident for the Transvaal will reside, what will be his duties, and how he will, in the event of his becoming unpopular, be protected?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Convention with the Boer Leaders has not been signed; but it is on its way to signature, and, so far as I know, substantial arrangements for that purpose have been made. The Convention will probably be signed within a few days, and it will be laid upon the Table as soon as the Government are in possession of it in a complete form. It will have to be ratified, in order to make it binding, by the Volksraad or Court of Assembly on the part of the people, which will at once be elected, and every security will be taken to make the Convention completely binding on the great mass of the people. The compensation referred to in the hon. Member's Question will be assessed by a sub-Commission, consisting of the British Resident and two Judges of the Transvaal Supreme Court; or, failing the Judges, by two other persons, who will be appointed by Her Majesty's High Commissioner. With respect to the last branch of the Question, I have to say that the British Resident will reside at Pretoria, or, from time to time, at any other convenient place, and his functions will be defined by the High Commissioner. That being so, it is better that I should not attempt to give an account of them verbally, more especially as I hope the Papers will soon be in the hands of hon. Members. With regard to the security of the British Resident, the Government have no more doubt upon that point than they have as to the security of any British Consul or Ambassador to any foreign country, and no special arrangements for his protection are contemplated.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE (MR. BRADLAUGH).

RESOLUTION.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I rise, Sir, on a question of Privilege. I was standing in the Lobby just now, when I saw Mr. Bradlaugh, a duly elected Member of this House, come into the Lobby. He attempted to go into the House. He said he considered he had a right to do so, derived from his being an elected Member of this House. He was then hurried out of the Lobby by the officials of the House; and I am given to understand that he is not to be allowed to re-enter the Lobby. On the 10th of May the following Resolution was passed by this House:—

Mr. Gladstone

"That the Sergeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."

That Resolution was moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), and it will be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman that I asked him if he would be good enough to explain what he meant by "the House." The right hon. Gentleman said—

"I, therefore, by my Motion, proposes that Mr. Bradlaugh shall be excluded from the House—that is, that he shall not come within the door that is kept by the doorkeepers, until or unless he shall undertake to the Speaker that he will not disturb the proceedings of the House."—[3 Hansard, cclxi. 182.]

Of course, that excludes Mr. Bradlaugh from coming within these doors; but I apprehend that it does not exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from coming within the Lobby at the other side of the door, and that, in order to prevent him from doing so, it would be necessary that a Resolution should be passed by the House. Of course, Sir, you will perceive that it is my duty to do all that I possibly can for my constituents in this matter, and I do not wish to do anything that would be out of Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I presume the hon. Member will conclude with a Motion; otherwise he will not be in Order.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Yes, Sir, I will conclude with a Motion; but I want to keep to the Rules of the House, and I wish to know if I can conclude with the following Motion? If not, I will substitute another:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Resolution of the House passed 10th May last, 'that the Sergeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House,' meant that Mr. Bradlaugh should not come within the outer door of this Chamber, and did not give any power to the Sergeant at Arms to hinder him from entering and remaining in all or any other portions of this edifice; and that, therefore, the Sergeant at Arms and the officers of the House acting under him, in excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from such other portions of the edifice, acted without the authority of this House, and in so doing interfered with the privileges inherent in Membership of this House, and from which no Member can be deprived without a Resolution of this House to that effect."

I ask whether, under the circumstances, that is a matter of Privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will proceed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Under these circumstances, I will move this Resolution. I am not entering into the question whether it would be the view of the House that Mr. Bradlaugh, having attempted to come within the door, should be forbidden to come within the precincts of the House; but I apprehend no statement has been made on behalf of the Serjeant-at-Arms to the House of what has transpired just now within the Lobby, or as to whether it is the intention of the Serjeant-at-Arms and the officers to exclude Mr. Bradlaugh henceforward from the Lobby. I venture respectfully to contend that the Serjeant-at-Arms cannot do that without a Resolution of the House. I, therefore, beg to propose the Resolution which I have just read.

MR. SPEAKER: Before putting the Resolution to the House, it is right that I should state that, by a Resolution passed by the House of Commons on the 10th of May, it was ordered—"That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."

This Order I carried out in a manner most considerate to Mr. Bradlaugh, believing that that was the desire of the House. He was admitted to frequent the Lobby and other parts of the building in full reliance that he would not attempt to enter this House. On the 4th July he gave formal notice, in writing, to myself, to the Clerk of the House, and to the Serjeant-at-Arms, that on or before the 3rd instant he would again present himself at the Table, and would resist and endeavour to overcome any physical force used against him. In pursuance of the notice, he has this day come to the door of the House, and has endeavoured to force an entrance. The Serjeant-at-Arms and his officers, acting under my directions, have removed him from the door, and in order to prevent any further attempts to enter the House and restrain disorder in the approaches to the House, have conducted him beyond the precincts of the House. The question raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in his Motion is, whether in so directing the Serjeant-at-Arms I have exceeded, in my capacity as Speaker of this House, the Order of this House issued on the 10th of May? I have felt that I should not be giving full effect to that Order unless I had taken the course which I have taken this day.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

MR. ASHTON DILKE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Resolution of the House passed 10th May last, 'That the Serjeant at Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from the House, until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House,' meant that Mr. Bradlaugh should not come within the outer door of this Chamber, and did not give any power to the Serjeant at Arms to hinder him from entering and remaining in all or any other portions of this edifice, and that therefore the Serjeant at Arms and the Officers of the House acting under him, in excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from such other portions of the edifice, acted without the authority of this House, and in so doing interfered with the privileges inherent in Membership of this House, and from which no Member can be deprived without a Resolution of this House to that effect."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. GLADSTONE: This not being a question, Sir, of altering in principle the Resolution of the House which has been referred to either by extension or addition, I am not sure whether I should have risen at once on the Motion which has just been made. But the question appears to me to be one which the hon. Member for Northampton is perfectly justified in raising, from his point of view, as to your conduct, Sir, as the Chief Executive Officer of this House, in the interpretation you have put on the Resolution and in the performance of your duty. I pass no censure upon the hon. Member for Northampton for his challenge to each Member of the House, and to Members collectively, to declare whether they will support you in the interpretation you have put upon the recent Resolution of the House. And as I have myself objected to that Resolution, I wish to construe it impartially, in the same sense as if I had approved it, or had even been a party to it. Now, Sir, approaching the question in that spirit, I can entertain no doubt whatever, for myself, that you have acted judiciously, and wisely interpreted the Resolution of the House. It appears to me that, however the Mover of the Resolution may have immediately contemplated, if he did so contemplate, the limit to be established by the actual entrance to the House, the clear intention of the House in passing the Resolution was that Mr. Bradlaugh should be debarred from access to the House by whatever means might be found necessary for that purpose. I cannot for a moment conceive it possible that it was the intention of the House to leave it open to the executive officers to debar Mr. Bradlaugh in such a manner and form and under such conditions as to cause disorder in the immediate neighbourhood of the House, and to bar the free and uninterrupted access of Members to the House. That is the point upon which the matter appears to me to turn. I must hold that, above all other regulations, one regulation in particular is necessary—namely, that which is asserted in the Sessional Orders of the House; and the direction given to the Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis speaks, not only of free access from the streets to the Houses of Parliament, but says that no obstruction should be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from these Houses, and that no disorder shall be allowed in Westminster Hall, or the passages leading to the House during the Sessions of Parliament. The grounds upon which the Motion of the hon. Member cannot be sustained are to me very plain; and I think, Sir, that you have properly exercised, as you always have done, the authority reposed in your hands. As to absolute freedom of access by Members to this House, that would have been seriously hindered if the condition in which you are placed by the Resolution were such that you could only contest the entrance of Mr. Bradlaugh at the doors of the House. I think that in the nature of the case, your conclusion is in accordance with the spirit of the Resolution, and that you would not have acted in accordance with the spirit of the Resolution if you had permitted such a contest at the doors of the House. I think, further, that the great care taken by the House to lay down the principle that no disorder should be allowed, in order to secure free access to the House, involves a proposition which applies to all descriptions of disorder, whether that disorder arises from the action of extraneous persons or from the action of any Member of this House who may have been placed by a Resolution of the House—so far as the authority of the House may establish such a Resolution —under a ban precluding him, exceptional circumstances, from free access to the House, and rendering in effect, an extraneous person; and it comes the duty of the Executive to treat him as an extraneous person. Therefore, on all these grounds I think this Motion cannot be sustained. I think you, Sir, have acted wisely in properly construing the Resolution of the 10th of May. It is my duty to say that this matter is quite irrespective of the opinion of the character of that Resolution, which, as I have said, remains unchanged; but the duty plainly is on us to support the Executive action of the House in faithful and full compliance with that Resolution.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHAMPTON shall say only a few words, Sir, in support of the observations of the Minister, and especially I desire to say as little as possible, because I think of great importance that we should altogether distinct questions of Order with regard to the position of Mr. Bradlaugh and questions of Order have been raised by the proceedings to-day. I am anxious that the questions should be kept entirely distinct, and that we should confine ourselves to the consideration of the question, Sir, have felt it your duty to act in pursuance of the Resolution passed by the House on the 10th of May. I think with the Leader of the House your conduct, Sir, has been entirely in accordance with that which the House expected you would pursue; and entirely merits and gains the support of this House. The hon. Member Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) referred to some words I used when I made that Motion, and he has quoted them. Undoubtedly, the words which I made had reference to the exclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh from the doors of this House. The object of that Resolution was this. Mr. Bradlaugh had up to that time been in the habit of doing that which Members have been elected and who have been able to take their seats are in the habit of doing—namely, sitting below the Bar of the House. I felt that if Mr. Bradlaugh remained in that position, and if he exercised discretion, as he had done on previous occasions, to come from below the Bar to the Table to sit take his seat, the House would be subjected to continual interruption of its Business. I therefore moved, and the House adopted, the Resolution to exclude him from the body of the House, in order to prevent a disturbance of our proceedings. Mr. Bradlaugh could at any time after the 10th of May have recovered his right of coming within the doors of the House upon giving an undertaking not to disturb the order of the proceedings; but he did not make any such promise, and was therefore properly, by the Order of the House, excluded from coming within the doors. But I should say he has not only failed to make any undertaking not to disturb our proceedings, but he has attempted by force to override and set aside the Order that was made excluding him from the House. Therefore, the action has been entirely Mr. Bradlaugh's own, and I quite agree that, to give effect to the Resolution of the 10th of May, it was necessary that any attempt on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh to enter the House should be resisted, and resisted in an effectual manner. As I understand, Sir, your directions to the officers of the House and to the Serjeant-at-Arms have been that he should be excluded by force from the House, and that if necessary, in order to prevent further disturbance of that kind, he should be removed from the precincts—from the Lobby. In that course I think you have taken the proper steps for securing the dignity and the peace of the proceedings of this House. I hope the House will unanimously support you in the course which you have thought it proper to take.

Mr. Gladstone

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I wish to ask, Sir, whether an Amendment can be moved to the Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot say until I know what the Amendment will be.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Then I will give my reasons for an Amendment which I think ought to be moved to the Motion of the hon. Member. I think this House is getting into a very awkward position; and I agree with the right hon. Baronet who has just spoken, that with regard to the dignity and peace of this House something must be done pretty soon.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The hon. Member misapprehended me. I dignity and peace of the House something must be done; but I said that in reference to maintaining the dignity and peace of the House the Speaker had acted rightly.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; but I agree with every step which the Speaker has taken in this matter for the maintenance of order. On a previous occasion you, Sir, decided that I should not be justified in saying that the Resolution which was passed by the House on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) was illegal; but I still have a strong idea that the House did act illegally.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I rise to a point of Order. Ought not the Amendment of the hon. Baronet to be read to the House before any speech is made, as the Amendment may be of such a character that it cannot be entertained?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I conclude, Sir, that you are still the authority in this House, and that my hon. Friend is not. I was going to say that although, in my humble opinion, the Resolution which has caused all this trouble, and which, if we adhere to it, will probably lead us into more trouble, was passed unwisely. I think, in endeavouring to exclude a duly elected Member from this House, we are taking one of the most high-handed steps which this House has indulged in for some generations; and it is the more invidious, and has the more excited the country, because you are excluding that hon. Member on account of his theological, or perhaps I ought to say his non-theological, views. I strongly object to such a course being taken, and I hope that nobody will presume to say that those of us who object to that proceeding are on that account allied with Atheists, and are sympathizers with atheistic views. That sort of warfare is striking a foul blow. No one has a right to charge us with being sympathizers with Atheists.

SIR HENRY TYLER: I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Baronet is in Order in going into the whole question?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: It is unfair to charge us with being in sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh. It might just as well be said that those who desired the emancipation of the Jews believed in Jewish faith, or that those who were for Roman Catholic emancipation sympathized with the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. I will not give my opinion on the subject; but I will read what the Lord Chancellor says, and I think you could not have a higher authority. The Lord Chancellor says—

“It does not appear to me to be just to assert against one particular man, however bad he may be, a power in the House of Commons to test the sincerity of an oath which he appears to take in the manner prescribed by law, by an extrinsic evidence of his actual belief or disbelief. No such power has ever been asserted or used against any other man, though other professed and notorious unbelievers have sat, and perhaps may sit there still, and the House of Commons have now chosen, for the first time, to assert for itself and to exercise this power.”

I very much regret that it has done so; and I say most distinctly, that neither by law nor equity are we justified in preventing Mr. Bradlaugh from fulfilling the duty which the law has placed upon him. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has taken one of the most revolutionary courses that has been taken by this House for a long time, and he is setting an example of lawlessness to the Irish Members who sit on the other side. I always understood that the laws of this country were made by the Queen, the Lords, and the Commons, and not by one House alone; and now you are trying to make the law by one Branch of the Legislature. That is a revolutionary course to which I object. What did Lord Chatham say on a similar occasion—namely, in regard to the election of Mr. Wilkes? The noble Lord, in addressing the House of Lords in reference to that matter, said—

“My Lords, I thought the slavish doctrine of passive obedience had long been exploded, and, when our Kings were obliged to confess that their title to the Crown and the rule of their Government had no other foundation than the known law of the land, I never expected to hear a Divine right or a Divine infallibility attributed to any other branch of the Legislature. The Commons have betrayed their constituents and violated the Constitution; under the pretence of declaring the law they have made a law, and united in the same person the office of legislator and of judge.”

Those words apply exactly to the course you are pursuing now. There are, I believe, two sentiments common to most of us in this House—the desire to preserve the law and to preserve the dignity of this House. But by the course we are now pursuing we are weakening the dignity of the law and our own influence in the country. I have no doubt whatever how this contest will end. I have no doubt, I say, that civil and religious liberty will be triumphant, even although it be in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. I do not want this contest to go on impeding Business, and giving rise to angry passions, and popularizing Mr. Bradlaugh.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Baronet that he is going beside the Question before the House. The Question before the House is the conduct of the Speaker. The hon. Baronet is, I understand, going to place an Amendment before the House. If he will do so, I shall tell him whether it is in Order.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I, of course, Mr. Speaker, shall not pursue the subject further. I must explain that I hardly like to vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend as it stands, because, as the Prime Minister ably pointed out, it might look as though we were impugning your conduct in this matter, which is the very last thing I would wish to do. In conclusion, I venture to propose, as an Amendment to the words of my hon. Friend—

“That the Resolution of April 26th, 1881, forbidding Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath, and also the Resolution of May 10th, 1881, ordaining his exclusion from the House, be rescinded.”

MR. SPEAKER: Under cover of an Amendment calling in question the conduct of the Speaker, the hon. Baronet proposes to raise a question which, in my opinion, has no relevancy to the original Motion. If the hon. Baronet desires that the Resolution of the 10th May shall be rescinded, the proper course is to make the proposal to the House, and bring it forward in the ordinary way.

MR. J. COWEN: Sir, I have no wish to prolong the discussion; but I should be glad if the present occasion could be utilized for the purpose of hastening the settlement of a most unpleasant dispute. Into the merits of that dispute I have no intention to enter. I know that nothing I can say, or that anyone here can say, will alter hon. Members' opinions. The views they entertain are too firmly held to be shaken by a House of Commons' debate. Controversy may strengthen them, but will not shake them. But.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

while I am aware of this, I am also aware that we are all anxious to have the unhappy wrangle terminated. It is damaging to the dignity of Parliament to have such scenes as we have witnessed this Session. The vulgar struggle that has just taken place in the Lobby can serve no good end, and will only help to bring our deliberations into disrepute. The questions at issue can be narrowed to a single point. Mr. Bradlaugh is a duly elected Member of Parliament, and is willing to take the Oath. The majority on this side of the House are willing that he should take it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite object to that, because the Oath has not the same binding effect upon Mr. Bradlaugh as it is understood to have upon them. In fact, in the judgment of the Opposition, the Oath Mr. Bradlaugh wants to take and the Oath they take are different. I recognize, respect, and appreciate that distinction. As long as such an opinion is entertained, the only way of settling the controversy is by altering the Oath. That is the simplest, the straightest, and most direct way of dealing with the matter. The Government admit this, and have introduced a Bill proposing the necessary change. While that Bill was under consideration Mr. Bradlaugh never troubled us. Whatever may be his opinions or his wishes, the House will, at least, do him the justice to say that as long as the measure was upon the Order Paper we heard nothing of his claims. When it was withdrawn, and only then, did he renew his personal protests. What I wish to ask the Prime Minister is, whether he will give an undertaking to introduce next Session the Bill that he has introduced this Session, but which, from pressure of Business, he has been driven to abandon? I have no authority to speak on Mr. Bradlaugh's behalf. I have never mentioned the subject to him. But I would almost undertake to say—if the Government would promise that the Bill which has been dropped this year should be re-introduced next—that until such time as the measure has either been passed or rejected, Mr. Bradlaugh would not disturb us. I know it is, perhaps, a good deal to ask the Prime Minister to make such a statement at this time, and without previous Notice; but if he will take an occasion before the Session terminates to give such an intimation, it will go far to allay the threatening agitation that is growing in the country. There is only one way out of the struggle. The House of Commons may prolong it as they like; but, however unpleasant it may be to them, in the end the constituencies will insist upon their right to elect whomsoever they please. It is now the case of Mr. Bradlaugh alone. It may soon be the case of others. At present the agitation is sustained by active partizans for and against the Member for Northampton; but if it is allowed to gather it will shortly embrace in its ranks a large section of the community. Mr. Bradlaugh will disappear from the controversy, and the question will become the right of the constituencies or the right of the House of Commons. In face of this threatening and irritating dispute, I hope the Prime Minister will make an announcement of the kind I have suggested, either to-day or at the earliest possible moment. That will do more to allay the agitation than anything I know of.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: Sir, I hope I shall be permitted to express a very devout wish that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, to whom, in common with most of my countrymen, I feel I am much indebted for the untiring attention he has bestowed on the Irish Land Bill, will not fall into the trap which has been spread open before him by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne.

MR. ANDERSON: Mr. Speaker, I, too, Sir, have a Petition to present from my constituency in favour of Mr. Bradlaugh taking his seat.

MR. SPEAKER: The proper time for presenting Petitions has passed.

MR. ANDERSON: I was about, Sir, to make some remarks on the Motion before the House, and mentioned the Petition by way of introduction. I was a spectator of the exhibition outside the doors of this House this afternoon, and I witnessed it with very great pain for several reasons, and one of these is that I feel very strongly that it will tend to create an amount of sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh out-of-doors that there has never been before. I saw that Gentleman, who has been duly elected by a large constituency, and is as properly a Member of this House as any of ourselves, taken by physical force by the police, and dragged out of the Lobby of this House. This is a proceeding which I am sure will have a most unfortunate effect; but, at the same time, I cannot vote for the Motion before the House, because I feel that you, Sir, being charged with the duty of keeping our proceedings orderly, were justified in giving the order. I rose before with the intention of seconding the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and I regret exceedingly it was not possible to move it, as it might have led to a termination of this unfortunate battle which the House of Commons has entered into with one of the constituencies of the country—a battle which, I feel confident, will bring down nothing upon this House but defeat and discredit.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: I was entirely unprepared for the scene which I found going on on my arrival in New Palace Yard this afternoon, because I understood that merely an application was to be made on Mr. Bradlaugh's behalf for permission for him to make an Affirmation and take his seat. For many weeks past the Business of this House has been conducted in perfect quietude, as far as this controversy is concerned; and I regret to see the multitude of misled and misguided people outside, who have been induced by Mr. Bradlaugh to accompany him down to this House on the ground that he has been ill-used, and has been illegally prevented from taking his seat. In order that the true facts of this case may be made known to the people of this country, I beg to give Notice that tomorrow I will ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the expediency of disabusing the misled followers of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh by issuing a Proclamation to the following effect:—

“That the Prime Minister has declared that taking the Parliamentary Oath in connection with the declaration that the words were of no value was not taking the Oath at all, a declaration in which the Attorney General concurred; that Mr. C. Bradlaugh, having made such a declaration, is, by his own act, disqualified from taking the Oath; that Mr. C. Bradlaugh has been declared by the House of Commons and by Judges of the Law Courts to be incapable of making the Affirmation provided for Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists; that Mr. C. Bradlaugh being qualified to take neither the Oath nor the Affirmation, according to law, the House could not be acting illegally, by preventing his attaining his seat by violence and intimidation, and, finally, warning Her Majesty's loyal subjects to abstain from all tumultuous assemblages, and to lend their aid to the preservation of peace and order.”

MR. BIGGAR: Sir, if I were to go on purely personal grounds, I could not vote for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, for this reason particularly, because Mr. Bradlaugh, when he sat and voted in this House, did not seem to care very much for the rights and privileges of other Members of Parliament. Mr. Bradlaugh voted for a Motion, which, in my opinion, was the most tyrannical ever perpetrated in this House—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the Question before the House is not the conduct of Mr. Bradlaugh, but the conduct of the Speaker of this House.

MR. BIGGAR: I will not, of course, pursue that subject further. My great objection to the course which has been pursued by the majority of this House, or is going to be pursued on this occasion of the expulsion of Mr. Bradlaugh from the Lobby, is that it gives precedent for what I believe to be a most tyrannical action on the part of the majority of this House. If we are to have from time to time every majority of this House saying that a Member shall not be heard in this House on account of his religious or political opinions, and shall not be permitted to take his seat, it will be fraught with great danger to the liberty of Members. The real point, in my opinion, is this—Mr. Bradlaugh has been elected by the electors of Northampton, and I am disposed to think that his electors have fair cause to complain. We know, with regard to Irish constituencies, that the will and wish of the electors has not been treated very tenderly on several similar occasions. At the same time, it would come with bad grace from an Irish Member representing an Irish constituency, as I do, if I did not say, as I do say, that the wish of the electors of Northampton should be paramount upon a question of this sort. This House is not a tribunal to try questions of religion or the political opinions of individuals. The functions in regard to the Oath are simply Ministerial. Political Oaths are an absurdity.

MR. SPEAKER: The question of political Oaths is not the Question before the House.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, without expressing any opinion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton, I think that this is an occasion on which a Member of this House, who feels as I do, may take up two or three minutes in stating a fact, and in making an appeal to the House. I have been outside the House within the last few minutes, and I have heard that Mr. Bradlaugh was refused admission by order of the House of Commons, and by the instructions of the Speaker; that he was taken from the door of the House, through the Lobby, down the steps outside, through Westminster Hall, and so put outside the door of Westminster Hall; that he was reduced to a condition if not of deathly fainting—"Oh!"—I have it on undoubted authority that by the time he arrived at New Palace Yard he was in a fainting condition—those empowered thus to remove him stated that if he had had many more yards to go he must have fallen fainting to the ground. No such case has heretofore been recorded in the annals of the British House of Commons. This thing has been done, not in a corner, because there are thousands of his countrymen standing outside this House who witnessed part of what took place, or who will soon know all that has taken place, and to-morrow morning more than 1,000,000 copies of the newspapers will narrate to the people of this country what has been done. I will not touch upon the original question raised in this case, I will not complain of the Resolution which the House passed on a former occasion, and, least of all, will I complain of the course which has been taken by you, Mr. Speaker; but I will put the question to hon. Members opposite, and also to some hon. Members on this side of the House—Where are they leading us? This is now a manageable affair; there were only a few thousand at the meeting last night in Trafalgar Square, and there are only a few thousands assembled outside this House to day; but this is exactly one of those things which grow, and the House, if it persists in its present course, will bring us into some most unfortunate and calamitous position. Let me remind the House that Mr. Bradlaugh is as fairly elected by the constituency of Northampton as any one of us has been by the constituencies which we represent, and that he has as much right to come to the Table of the House as any one of us has.

MR. SPEAKER: I must interpose, as I have already interposed. The Question before the House is the conduct of the Speaker, and not the case of Mr. Bradlaugh.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I admit, Mr. Speaker, that you are perfectly right, and I am technically wrong; but I asked the House when I rose whether I might be permitted to make that appeal. I will conclude my observations merely by asking hon. Gentlemen who have taken the courses that have led to these difficulties, whether they might not reconsider the question and extricate the House from a position injurious to its own character and wrongful to the constituency.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman opposite has asked Members on this side, and the whole body of the House, to what the course we are now pursuing is tending. I reply, the object we have in view, and which we believe we shall achieve, is to maintain the dignity and the order of this House, and if the right hon. Gentleman has that object in view, in common with the great body of the House, I would respectfully suggest to him that the speech he has delivered and the animus he has shown are not calculated to induce Mr. Bradlaugh to cease from that conduct on his part to which, and to which alone, we have to attribute the scene of this morning. I wish the House to take notice of what the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Bright) stated he had either seen himself or had heard on reliable authority. It was that Mr. Bradlaugh had been removed by force whilst standing in front of the doorway, and hurried by policemen down the steps of this House. I understood the same kind of statement to be made by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and in a more guarded form by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). I witnessed what did occur. Was it the fact that Mr. Bradlaugh, standing peacefully outside, was, by order of Mr. Speaker, seized by policemen and hurried in a fainting condition down the steps? No, Sir; what occurred was this—that Mr. Bradlaugh endeavoured by force, against the decision of this House, and against the orders of Mr. Speaker, to compel an entrance into this House, and it was not until he had set himself in violent opposition to the appointed guardians of order, that that occurred which the right hon. Gentleman has described to this House with melo-dramatic effect. I regret the circumstances, and that Mr. Bradlaugh should have suffered any inconvenience; but Mr. Bradlaugh has no human being to thank but himself, unless it be in some slight degree those indiscreet and ill-advised friends of his who have made such appeals as we have just listened to. I have thought it right to say this much, because, unless someone said it, a totally erroneous impression might have been circulated to-morrow by that million or more of papers to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred—namely, that unnecessary and uncalled-for violence has been perpetrated under your orders by the officials of this House, on a harmless and unoffending Gentleman who was standing meekly outside the door of this House.

MR. BROADHURST: Sir, a large constituency has duly elected a proper and qualified person to represent them in Parliament; and we, as the Representatives of other English constituencies, are bound to do our duty, so far as we can, in obtaining permission for the hon. Gentleman to take his seat. It appears to me that to-morrow this House will appear in a most ridiculous position. You will raise up every constituency in this country. You will, by your action, bring support to Mr. Bradlaugh from every constituency in this country—support which would never have come only for the political martyrdom which he is looked upon as undergoing. Sir, it would be almost beneath one's dignity to stand here and disclaim sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions on religious matters. We have no sympathy with any such opinions. We have a sympathy with this—the indisputable right of an English constituency to elect whomsoever they like—the right of the constituencies of the United Kingdom to elect whomsoever they think proper to represent them in this Parliament.

MR. SPEAKER: I must invite the hon. Member to keep to the Question before the House.

MR. BROADHURST: Mr. Speaker, I am sincerely thankful to you. It is easy on an occasion of this kind for so young a Member of Parliament as myself to travel out of the narrow path of Order in a subject of this kind. I apologize to the House for that little indiscretion. But what I want to point out, Sir, is this—that you are renewing a battle against freedom of election, which is sure to be decided against you. I am willing to forego any further discussion on this subject if some instruction or promise could be made to the House in the direction indicated by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). At present we feel bound—almost bound—if the hon. Member for Northampton goes to a division, to support him, even at the risk of being thought to contest the authority of the Chair on this occasion.

Lord John Manners

COLONEL MAKINS: My opinion, Sir, differs entirely from that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I saw Mr. Bradlaugh removed by a very mild exhibition of physical force, to which he offered a great amount of theatrical resistance, almost as theatrical as the language in which the right hon. Gentleman described it. What is the position now? I wish to ask the Home Secretary, who, I suppose, is responsible for order being preserved outside the precincts of the House, what he proposes to do. Mr. Bradlaugh is now standing in the yard of the House, and states that he will remain there and attempt to take his seat, and that if he has to retire he will return with a large accession of force and again attempt to take his seat. I wish to know, in case that should take place, what course the right hon. and learned Gentleman will take. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster says this matter will grow. I know no better means of making it grow than such a speech as the right hon. Gentleman has just delivered. It will be perfectly understood in the country who is behind Mr. Bradlaugh in his attempt to use force against the House of Commons.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Sir, I believe that a great many Members of this House, though they desire to express approval of the conduct of you, Sir, and of the officers of the House, feel some difficulty in dealing with the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton; and I trust I may be able in some way to assist in shortening this debate, and allowing the House to get to the ordinary Business by proposing, if I am in Order in doing so, an Amendment to the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton. Without any further speech I would propose—

“That this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the Officers of this House acting under his orders.”

I trust that that Amendment will receive the unanimous assent of the House, and I hope may terminate this debate.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the Officers of this House acting under his orders.”—(Sir Henry Holland.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, although there is no doubt that a negative put upon the Motion which is before the House would have distinctly conveyed the judgment of the House in the sense of the present Amendment, yet, viewing the fact especially that the Motion is a Motion which sets out in some detail its own character and grounds, I think not only that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) is unobjectionable, but that, upon the whole, it enables the House to give expression more fully and satisfactorily than a mere negative would have done to the feeling which I think we all entertain. It has not been questioned by anyone, whatever view may have been taken, that the conduct of the Speaker has been eminently considerate and judicious. I have great satisfaction in supporting the Amendment, and I hope it may have the effect which the hon. Baronet is justified in anticipating. I wish also not to appear disrespectful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. J. Cowen), with regard to the question he has put to me. I am not disposed to think that I should be acting in the spirit of the decisions given by the Chair, were I to enter upon the subject of the general solution of the difficulty connected with Mr. Bradlaugh on the present occasion. It is strictly a question of the conduct of the Executive, and I think it is my duty to set an example of close adherence to the question, after the definition you, Sir, have given.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I will not detain the House for a minute. I will only say that I entirely support the Amendment of my hon. Friend behind me. It seems to me distinctly to mark what the question is that is submitted to the House, and to convey the approval which, I think, the great body of the House cordially wish to express towards you, Sir.

MR. O'DONNELL: I rise, Sir, in the first place, to make a protest against the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has deemed it his duty to misconceive the Question before the House. The right hon. Gentleman drew a fancy picture, calculated to impress the imaginations of the classes to whom he appealed throughout the country. I am aware that historical accuracy is not a strong point with the right hon. Gentleman. I may observe that when the right hon. Gentleman, in drawing his picture, stated that the scene to-day was altogether unprecedented, he must have been unaware of the fact that even in the British Legislature no less a personage than the gallant Cochrane—the brave Dundonald—was dragged from this House, clinging desperately to the Benches of this House, and expelled and excluded by a Vote of this House; and that, if the sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was so extensive and so un-discerning as he would wish us to believe, it is strange that in the course of his rhetoric he did not contrive to drop a single regret upon the treatment of Captain Cochrane. I am also anxious to know on what principle the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster hesitates about supporting the authority of the Chair in the case of the excluded elect of Northampton, and the remarkable readiness which he showed to support the authority of the Chair when it was being exercised against Irish Members of the House. Sir, I think that as precedents are of such weight in this House, the precedent which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster himself contributed to make ought not to have escaped his attention. It is true that Mr. Bradlaugh has been removed from proximity to the Chamber—where it appears he was contemplating some scene of disorder—by superior force. I want to remind the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that when Member after Member of the Irish Party was removed from this House by superior force, not a single rhetorical tear welled from the overflowing heart of the right hon. Gentleman. If Irish Members had used physical force to prevent their expulsion, I very much doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman would have made such a speech. I doubt whether he would feel a pang to see Mr. John Dillon dragged from the House. I think his speech eminently calculated to excite thoughtless and uninstructed persons against the dignity and authority of his own Legislature, and the reputation of the right hon. Gentleman will not be improved by the marked partiality he shows on behalf of offenders who are apparently of his own kidney.

MR. BURT: I am quite unwilling, Sir, to enter into the subject; but I cannot refrain, on a question which seems to be unpopular, from saying a word on the unpopular side. I regret that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) cannot move his Amendment, as I feel certain that, sooner or later, some such Resolution must be adopted by this House. I rose, however, chiefly to support the views of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) in his appeal to the Prime Minister. I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman cannot, at this moment, make a definite statement; but I hope, before the Session terminates, he will be able to say that the subject will be dealt with very early next Session. When the hon. Member for Newcastle spoke of the popular feeling which is rising on behalf of Mr. Bradlaugh, the sentiment was met by an incredulous laugh from the other side of the House; but the hon. Gentleman is perfectly right. I have had to attend meetings recently in the North of England, convened without the slightest regard to this particular question, and at those meetings there was practical unanimity in support of Mr. Bradlaugh, although the persons attending the meetings had no sympathy whatever with his special views, and many of them were persons whose leisure was occupied with the advocacy of the principles of Christianity. What we have witnessed this morning goes to show that there is a rising feeling in the country. It is not Mr. Bradlaugh, it is the feeling that the constituencies have a right to elect the man they think proper. Sitting in this House, we might hear the cheers Mr. Bradlaugh received when he was taken out, and those cheers were ominous that the Gentlemen who now ranged themselves against the electors of Northampton are doomed to a speedy defeat.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: Sir, the Question before the House is really whether the officers of the House, in the discharge of their duty, exceeded what was demanded by the necessity of the case. I, for one, do not hesitate a single moment in supporting the view of the case taken by you, Sir, that the action which has been taken was the necessary outcome of the Resolutions passed by the majority of the House, and that you, Sir, in the discharge of your duty, have not exceeded the necessities of the case in ordering the removal of Mr. Bradlaugh; but I feel some difficulty in supporting the Resolution which has been proposed on the other side of the House, because an obligation has been cast upon you, Sir, by the passing of these two Resolutions of the House, both of which, to say the least, I believe to have been great blunders. I am not going to say that these Resolutions are illegal. I believe that it is the opinion of the great mass of the people of this country that they are not legal; and it is impossible to prevent the great majority of the people of this country entertaining this opinion, and taking consequent action, from the belief that bigotry has shown itself.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the question of the Parliamentary Oath is not the Question now before the House.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I can only say that I find it impossible to vote either for one Motion or the other. With all respect to you, Sir, I wish to say that I regret exceedingly what has taken place; but I regard it as the consequential outcome of Resolutions passed by the House at an earlier stage of the Session.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON: Sir, I feel I cannot vote on either side of the question; but I wish to say one word, as I have been an eye witness of the scene in the Lobby to-day. I stood within three feet of Mr. Bradlaugh, in front of him, between him and the door; and I heard him, in a perfectly quiet manner, claim what he maintained to be his legal right, to enter the House. He then endeavoured to make his way into the House, and was prevented by certain officials and police. I do not say whether they were right or wrong, but am merely giving a statement of what occurred. Mr. Bradlaugh was impeded in taking that action by a line of men who are not Members of this House, but who were drawn up across the portal of the House. That is to say, that to-day a Member who has been duly elected by a constituency, and whose return has not been impugned, has been prevented from entering the door of the House by those who are not Members of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh used no force except that he endeavoured to push his way into the House—not in a violent way at first. ["Oh!"] I pledge my honour that is so. I saw it all. Mr. Bradlaugh did not act in a disorderly manner. He tried to edge his way through those people who barred his progress; and was then seized, pushed forcibly, and hustled across the Lobby and expelled, expostulating the whole time with those who held him, and maintaining the course which they were taking to be illegal. It is not for me to say whether it is so or not. [Exclamations.] Well, I am a Member of this House, and I have a right to express my opinions. There is a higher tribunal beyond the walls of this House which will probably decide that point. I say for myself I have no sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions, social or political. I think he has been ill-advised in endeavouring to take the Oath after what he has said; but it is very doubtful whether the House is doing that which will conduce to its dignity in encouraging at the door of the House a scene of violence so unseemly as has just taken place. I am sure that when the people of England read the words of the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham they will thank him for his speech. ["Oh!"] They will thank him heartily for having had the manhood, in the difficult position in which he is placed, to stand up and give utterance to the opinions which he has expressed, which are in accordance with those which he has constantly expressed during the whole course of his political life. I cannot vote for the Resolution of my hon. Friend, because I do not wish to do anything which seems even to impugn the authority of the Speaker when carrying out the mandate of the House. I cannot forget that Mr. Bradlaugh can at present enter the House if he refrains from attempting to take the Oath and imitates the example of Alderman Salomons and Baron Rothschild, who contented themselves with sitting below the Bar, and by their silent presence there ultimately brought Constitutional pressure to bear on the Houses of Parliament, and thus, in the end, succeeded in obtaining the repeal of the law which excluded Jews from the House of Commons. I am extremely sorry for what has taken place throughout with regard to Mr. Bradlaugh, and in saying what I have I believe I have expressed the wishes of my constituents, none of whom, however, have spoken a word to me of pressure on the subject, although they have said they believed it would be impossible permanently to exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House of Commons.

MR. ASHTON DILKE: I wish, Sir, to ask you whether it is possible to move an Amendment to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland)? If not, I will take the opportunity of moving it when the Amendment becomes a substantive Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: That cannot be done, as it would re-open the whole question.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 191: Majority 184.—(Div. List, No. 351.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the officers of this House acting under his orders' be there added."

MR. ASHTON DILKE: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to ask, for the benefit of a large number of Members who do not wish to cast any blame on the action taken by the Chair, but who simply wish to register their protest against it, whether I should be in Order in moving an addition to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) of the following words:—

"But is of opinion that the regrettable proceedings attending the expulsion of Mr. Bradlaugh prove the necessity for legislation on the subject."

MR. SPEAKER: The Original Question before the House involves the conduct of the Speaker, and the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member is altogether irrelevant.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Before the Question is put, I should like to ask whether this is irrelevant? May I move to add the words—

“That this House regrets that Mr. Speaker has been placed in a position which rendered the course which has been taken unavoidable.”

That expresses sympathy with you, Sir. If I am in Order, I shall move these words.

MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment of the hon. Baronet opens up the whole question of Parliamentary Oaths and the conduct of Mr. Bradlaugh on the one hand, and the House on the other; and, therefore, I could not consider it regular.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I do not wish to give a silent vote on the Motion now before the House. I wish to state why it is that, having seen so many of those scenes attending the expulsion of Members of this House, I shall, on the present occasion, support the authorities. I was present at the scene which has just taken place. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was not present, and the description he has given of the scene is wholly inaccurate. Having been present when the assault was committed upon the Serjeant-at-Arms by Mr. Bradlaugh, and at the closing scene outside, I wish to state simply that so far from Mr. Bradlaugh being in a fainting condition at the time he was left outside, in a far worse condition was the officer of this House, whose collar he had never let go through the struggle outside of the House; and, at the same time, he gave him as good a shake outside the House as ever a bull-dog gave a rat, thus showing that although he asked for a glass of water, he was in no fainting condition. But the scene was disgraceful in the extreme, and it was disgraceful to Her Majesty's Government, because of their want of moral courage to deal with the case. In a brutal manner Mr. Bradlaugh committed an assault for which he should be prosecuted; and if he does not, it is because this House lacks moral courage, because it lacks back-bone. It shows that it deals far differently with an English Member from the manner in which it deals with an Irish one. Although there have been many expressions of sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh, yet it is a significant fact that there are none who come forward and offer to resign their seats in his favour. For the reasons I have given, I shall heartily support the authority of the Chair in this matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That this House approves the action of Mr. Speaker and of the officers of this House acting under his orders.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to give Notice that on going into Committee of Supply I shall move—

“That every person returned as a Member of this House, who shall claim to be permitted to take the Oath, notwithstanding so much of the Resolution passed by this House on the 26th April last, as relates to the taking of the Oath, shall take and subscribe the Oath of Allegiance in the form and in the manner prescribed by law.”

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

NAVY (CADETS).—RESOLUTION.;

MR. GORST, in rising to call attention to the regulations for the admission of Cadets into the Royal Navy; and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, Naval Cadets should be appointed at a more advanced age, and that if they are chosen by competitive examination, such competition should be open, and not limited for the purposes of patronage,” said, that the boys were now chosen at too young an age, and although this selection was supported by professional men, it was opposed to the experience and custom of all Navies in the world. Why should this country set itself against the universal practice and experience of other civilized countries in this matter? The second objection was that the competitive examination was extremely injurious to these young boys, because of the numerous and very heavy subjects they were required to be proficient in. He knew there was a difference of opinion on the subject; but he believed the weight of the testimony supported his assertion. One of the gentlemen who were engaged in instructing the boys for examination purposes admitted that the required amount of mathematical knowledge could not be "crammed" into the head of a lad of such tender age without doing permanent harm to his intellect, and greatly impairing his constitution. Such a system was fatal to proper education; and he might observe that there was no public school in the Kingdom which subjected boys to such a rigid examination at so early an age. The next objection he had to urge against the present method of training cadets was the badness of the Britannia school. Lord Dalhousie, when a Member of that House, stated that while he was commander of the Britannia it was a very bad school. All our great public schools now submitted to an annual inspection by the joint Syndicate of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; and he should like to know whether the Admiralty would be willing to subject the Britannia to inspection and examination at the hands of this Syndicate? This was a fair challenge; and if the Admiralty would not accept it, perhaps the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) would say why they could not submit to such an ordeal. The next objection to the present system was that the boys were not sent to sea. It was not until they had left the Britannia and had passed into the Navy, at the age of 15 or thereabouts, that they were sent to sea at all. They might be educated in the ordinary schools of the country, instead of being cooped up in a ship, in which they learned nothing of sea life. Again, he wished to know why admission to the Navy should be a matter of patronage? There was no patronage now in the Army; and it was only in the Navy and the Diplomatic Service that the disagreeable and antiquated system of patronage survived. Some people talked about the importance of having a class of educated gentlemen with good connections to serve as officers in the Navy; but he would ask whether the officers of the Army were, in regard to social status, one whit inferior to the officers of the Navy? All patronage of this kind, if it were not useful, was unjust. Why should a lad be debarred from serving the Queen in the Navy simply because his father or his friends held obnoxious political opinions? Considering that a Liberal Government was in Office, and that the Office of Secretary to the Admiralty was held by a Gentleman whose opinions on this subject were so well known, it seemed strange that a Conservative Member should be standing there pleading to the House of Commons for the abolition of patronage. The circumstance showed that a system of this sort, after having been long established, could not be done away with in a moment, even by the most Liberal and advanced Government that ever was in Office. If the House should prefer that the Navy should be open to everyone by public competition, without patronage, he knew the Secretary to the Admiralty would be very glad, and the passing of the Resolution would materially strengthen his hands. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. GOURLEY, in seconding the Resolution, observed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), when First Lord of the Admiralty, as were also some of his distinguished Predecessors, was in favour of the abolition of the Britannia, and held the opinion that boys intended for the Naval Profession should be educated at public schools, and afterwards learn their profession at sea under commanders who were well qualified to impart to them the necessary technical knowledge. In that opinion he entirely concurred, and he hoped it would be adopted by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty. One result would be to secure equally efficient naval officers at a much smaller cost than at present, and another would be to get rid of a most obnoxious system of patronage. Under the present system, if a gentleman wished to have his son nominated to a cadetship he wrote to a Peer or a Member of Parliament requesting that he should apply for a nomination to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and if he did not succeed the first time he wrote again and again to other Peers or Members of that House. He had himself known that process repeated 30 or 40 times, and it was time that the patronage system was abolished. In the ordinary training ships boys were well trained, but the only prospect they had before them was that of being ordinary seamen, or, at the utmost, becoming petty officers. At Greenwich School there were about 100 boys receiving technical and other education; but they had no chance of receiving commissions as cadets or otherwise, and their highest prospect was to become petty officers, or, perhaps, stewards on board Her Majesty's ships. The whole system needed revision, and, for his part, he was in favour of affording the clever boys in the ordinary training ships, and at Greenwich, means of attaining a superior education, which would enable them to compete with the Britannia boys. He hailed with pleasure the opinions which had been expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, Naval Cadets should be appointed at a more advanced age, and that if they are chosen by competitive examination such competition should be open and not limited for the purposes of patronage,"—
(Mr. Gorst),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished to express concurrence in the Resolution of his hon. and learned Friend. He (Sir John Hay) was of opinion that they could obtain as good, if not a better, class of boys by direct selection than by competition. He had always advocated, when he was previously in the House, that the age of the boys who entered as cadets should be raised. In former periods of naval history, when sailing was a different business than now, the management of a ship under sail, and other kindred matters, required that a boy should be taken very young, and trained up for the purpose; but now, he thought, they did not require boys to be taken for the Navy at an earlier age than for Woolwich. Lord Dundonald, for instance, a most distinguished officer and brilliant seaman, entered the Navy when he was upwards of 18 years of age. That showed that Lord Dundonald had special aptitude for the Service, and what they wanted was special aptitude. There was no reason why a boy who had special aptitude should not be allowed to join the Navy after he had attained the age of 16. In his opinion, they would be quite as efficient officers by taking them at a later period than the age at which the lads were now taken. He believed a process might be introduced, by virtue of which boys might be selected by prizes in public schools, not on the knowledge gained of one day's examination, but of the general character of the boy, and his aptitude for a daring and skilful life. He concurred that the Britannia was not the best process by which to get the best class of boys. It was necessary, he thought, to put them first into sailing ships, because he believed they would thus obtain that readiness of hand, and quickness of eye, and special adaptation necessary for a successful and efficient officer. He would be glad to see some change made in the direction indicated by the Mover of the Resolution. Patronage, no doubt, was a very bad process for obtaining the boys; but he was of opinion that if it was bad for those who were admitted by such means, it was also equally bad and unpleasant for those who exercised it. He did not believe the Admiralty desired to continue the system of patronage, and his opinion was that the changes introduced by the late Mr. Ward Hunt were for the public interest.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that, heartily concurring, as he did, in the views expressed by the right hon. and gallant Admiral who had just spoken, and knowing the just weight that would be given to any observations or suggestions made by him, he (Sir Henry Holland) would not have interfered in the debate had he not been requested by several persons to say a few words in support of the opinion that naval cadets should be appointed at a more advanced age. He certainly thought that the necessity of choosing the Profession for boys of such tender age was objectionable in itself. He thought that it was much better that young lads should go to school and learn a little for themselves about the different professions and chances of life. It did not, of course, follow that the parents should fall in with the wishes of the lads; but the lads themselves would, at a more advanced age, and with more knowledge, be able to appreciate the reasons for choosing this special Profession, and they would be more likely to take to the Profession than they are now. It would tend to lessen the discontent which, he feared, was felt in many cases in the earlier stages, at all events, of the Profession. Nor could he see how in any way the interests of the Navy would suffer from such a change. If prizes were given at public schools, or if cadetships were offered to the boys at such schools, special attention would be given to subjects which would fit the boys for the Naval Service, such as mechanics, mathematics and engineering, geography and languages, and such like subjects. The actual naval work, the special knowledge of a ship, and how to handle it, and so forth, could be learnt in a short time after a lad had joined his ship; and the right hon. and gallant Admiral had pointed out that he entertained no doubt on this point, looking to the difference between the sailing vessels of the former days and the steamers of the present day. He (Sir Henry Holland) would not delay the House by urging further reasons in support of this view; but he desired to press upon Her Majesty's Government that part of the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) which related to the appointment of naval cadets at a more advanced age, and which, he believed, would advance the interests of this great Profession.

Mr. Gourley

MR. TREVELYAN said, it had more than once been the fate—he might almost say the hard fate—of the present Board of Admiralty that, when they had devised and carried through a reform which they fondly imagined was a bold one; when they had reasoned away the opposition which existed inside the Service, and had screwed up their courage to facing the opposition which they presumed to exist in the House of Commons, then, to their astonishment, they found themselves met, not with the charge that they had gone too far, but that they had not gone far enough; that, so far from being praised as reformers, they were regarded as unprofitable servants, who had not even done as much as it was their duty to do. If censure came in that form, he should be the last to complain, and especially when it came from the opposite Benches. The present Board of Admiralty had made a great change—a change which was eagerly advocated in this House during the years between 1875 and 1880, and persistently refused by the Boards which then held Office; and now that the thing was done, it was a subject, he thought, rather of congratulation than complaint that the first effect was to elicit from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) a demand for still more extensive reforms, and an interesting speech on the much vexed and all important question of the education and selection of our naval officers. He thought the House was not quite aware of the great importance of the change which the present Board had made; and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham seemed to under-rate altogether the practical result of that change, and to attribute to it defects and dangers which he believed to be quite imaginary. What Government had done was this. There were two theories as to the selection and education of naval officers. One was to take them young, and, after educating them, partly at the public expense, to give them a long knocking about on board ship while still boys. The other was to take them at a more advanced age, when they had completed all except their strictly technical education outside the Service, to give them that technical education, and nothing else, and to send them to sea as young men rather than as boys. This last might be said to be the Continental system, which prevailed in Italy, Germany, France, and the United States. The other system was, and always had been, for good or for evil, the English system; and, though he did not say there was not a better, still that system, as far as it was properly worked, had produced out of British lads as fine a body of naval officers as ever existed in the world. But this system, as worked between 1875 and 1880, and before 1869, had very grave defects; and the present Board of Admiralty saw, or thought they saw, the method of remedying those defects; and, without entering on the question of whether the system should be abandoned and another introduced, they made, or rather revived, a reform, very simple in its character, by which the received and existing national method of officering our Navy might be made as perfect as it was capable of becoming. The system of pure nomination, which existed before 1869, and which was revived by Mr. Ward Hunt, had two very serious defects.

When the authorities in whose gift patronage lay could appoint any lad whom they chose to be a naval cadet, if only he passed a test examination, the temptation to appoint more than the interests of the Service required became, in the long run, irresistible. It was resisted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), and he (Mr. Trevelyan) firmly believed it would have been resisted by Lord Northbrook. But it had, in past days, been yielded to by First Lords of both the great Parties in the State. It came to this—that, for some years together, three times as many cadets were entered as the Service of the Navy required, so that all the avenues of promotion were blocked up, and a ruinous expense inflicted on the taxpayer. That was the first defect of our old system, and of that defect the scheme of the present Secretary of State for War, as revived by Lord Northbrook, had afforded a complete and permanent cure. The most self-interested and unscrupulous dispenser of patronage would never care to multiply offices when, by so doing, he did not increase the chance of his own nominee getting one. For every fresh cadetship three fresh boys would have to compete. The chances were three to one against any given boy, whether there were 10 cadetships or whether there were 100; and whatever else might be said for or against the system of limited competition as conducted at Greenwich, this, at any rate, might be safely affirmed, that it was an absolute specific against the fatal tendency, which formerly existed, to over-officer the Navy. But the reform which had been set on foot was intended to do much more than this. He was not without hope that many of the objections which Lord Dalhousie, in his very striking speech of last year—a speech so striking that those who heard or read it had never ceased to regret his removal from among us—brought against the present system, and the objections which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham had brought against it would turn out not to be inherent in that system, but to have been actually remedied by the measures which the present Board of Admiralty had thought it right to take. The old system produced a large number of as fine officers as anyone could wish to see; but it admitted, likewise, a certain number of young fellows of capacity inferior to what the public had a right to ask for in those who served it. It was those young fellows who were the weak part of the Naval Service at all periods of their career, and at no period more than during the educational period to which the hon. and learned Gentleman's Resolution related. One great evil complained of was that the boys on the Britannia spent their time in painfully grinding through subjects in which they took a very small intellectual interest. Another complaint was that, as soon as they left the Britannia, many of them dropped those subjects, and forgot all about them with extraordinary rapidity. Now, those were just the boys who were kept out by limited competition. People were very apt to talk of the competitive system as if it was an elaborate machinery for getting a service composed of senior wranglers, and asked whether a man who came out at the head of a class was sure to make the finest officer. That was not the contention of the advocates of competition. Their contention was—and he maintained that it had been fully borne out by experience—that the effect of competition was to guarantee that none of the servants of the public should fall below a very respectable standard of intelligence. No test competition that ever was invented had ever, in the long run, secured that end. The facts that now were before them proved that it was from the disuse of competition that the evils complained of arose; and it would be from its revival that they would, in great part, cease. Let them take the system as it was under Lord Northbrook, and as it was during the last five years. Now-a-days, if a boy who was not very sharp was offered a nomination, his parents made up their mind that he had no chance in the competition, and left him to continue his ordinary school course, where he got the usual training of a boy destined to civil life. But when a boy got a nomination under the old system, whether he was clever or stupid, it was worth sending him to a crammer and taking the chance of his passing the test. In the words of the President of the Royal Naval College—

Mr. Trevelyan

“It was possible by a forced and superficial process of preparation—by cramming, in short—to pass boys into the Service who would have no chance whatever of competing successfully.”

But the evil did not stop there. Having been got into the Britannia, it was necessary that, at all hazards, they should be got through it; and the time of the naval instructors was consumed in pushing and hustling boys through a course of subjects which they never more than half understood, and which they worked at solely against the grain. And these were the boys who, when they went to sea, dropped their painfully, but superficially, acquired knowledge as completely as if they had never acquired it at all. These were the very boys whom limited competition kept out of the Navy. When limited competition was exchanged for nomination in 1874, the average of ability fell in a marked manner. The 450 cadets who entered under competition before 1874 obtained, on an average, 60 per cent of full marks at their final examination. The 235 cadets who entered by pure nomination obtained 53 per cent. The young midshipmen who entered by competition obtained in their first examination afloat an average of 811 marks out of 2,600. The midshipmen who entered by pure nomination obtained 685 marks; and, what was very significant, the number of cadets who obtained first-class certificates on leaving the Britannia under competition amounted to 20 per cent, and under nomination only to 10 per cent. Some curious statistics taken by an officer of high rank for his own information proved that it was from the boys who had taken these first-class certificates that our distinguished and successful officers were, to a large extent, derived. It might fairly be said that, of boys who took a first-class certificate on leaving the Britannia, 50 per cent became captains and commanders, while of boys who took a third-class certificate, only 20 per cent reached that rank. So that what the revival of pure nomination did was practically this—that out of every 100 boys who entered the Navy, it diminished the exceptionally able boys, who were likely to grow into really first-rate officers, by exactly one-half, and replaced them by as many boys who were below the standard which the Service of the country required. But by the restoration of limited competition the Britannia henceforward would be a school composed entirely of boys for whose conduct and abilities there was a real and solid guarantee. Now that the best had been done for the old system under which our officers had been educated for so many years, he should be inclined to ask the House to let that system work a little longer without at once pulling it to pieces and building it anew. As to the fears expressed by hon. Members of the effects of competition at this tender age, he was firmly persuaded that, under the examination as at present conducted, those fears were illusory. A boy might be crammed to pass a test examination which he would not have passed otherwise; but if a competitive examination was properly conducted he could not be crammed so as to enable him to beat a boy better taught and naturally cleverer than himself. What cramming would enable a boy to do unseen passages of French and Latin, with the aid of a dictionary, better than another boy who had a real and solid acquaintance with those languages, and who had superior mother-wit to himself? The best testimony to the manner in which the examination last June was conducted was afforded by the only letter which he had seen giving the account of the reason of a boy's failure; and in that letter the parent said that the boy had been overcoached the night before; and everyone who knew what a good examination was knew that the worst possible preparation for it was to cram up to the last night. He firmly believed that the competition which they held at 13 was just as innocuous to health as that which the hon. and learned Member proposed to hold at 16 or 17. But hon. Members must not think that he wished to meet this Resolution with a hard-and-fast negative. He had the greatest sympathy with the general objects of the hon. and learned Member. He had the keenest sense of the defects of our present system which the hon. and learned Member exposed; and for months past he had been studying in every way in his power the different solutions of the problem of naval education which had been so ably put forward in various quarters. He felt most strongly the very great discomfort and disadvantage to our midshipmen of becoming officers in Her Majesty's Service before they had got rid of school. It appeared to him that to minds of that energetic and resolute class which we especially valued in our Navy, it might be almost a mental torture to be distracted between rather elementary book learning in the abstract sciences and the acquisition of the practical duties of a profession. To alternate between being a captain's aide-de-camp in a naval brigade and reading algebra with a naval instructor; to go from gun drill, and inspection, and the charge of boats to old schoolroom learning that had been rubbed up and forgotten ten times over was a life of such waste of intellect and energy that he did not despair, and he was farther from despairing than ever, of finding some corrective for it. Young or old, when a lad went to sea, he ought to go as a sailor; and so strongly did he hold this that he would not hesitate to recommend a pretty bold recasting of our system in order to attain this desired end. His own firm belief was that if a young man had three years at sea without having his attention distracted by school work he would learn more seamanship and more seamanlike qualities than he learnt in the five years that he now served afloat in a capacity something between a schoolboy and an officer. If that were carried out, it would give him a year or a year and a-half to continue his general studies before he joined the Service. There is much to be said likewise on the question of open competition. There is much to be said for drawing closer the connections between our great public schools and the Navy by giving nominations for competition to the head masters of such schools as Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Cheltenham, Marlborough, and any school that might desire to enter the lists. Nor, if the House of Commons so wished it, would they consider that the Navy would be ruined even if the principle of open competition was imposed upon them by Resolution of the House. The introduction of open competition into the Indian Civil Service, and into the Public Offices at home, was intimately connected with two names in which he had the strongest and the closest interest, and the first years of his public life were spent in urging the change from purchase in the Army to the open competition which at present existed. He supposed he was one of the last men in that House likely to regard open competition with dread. But he hoped that the House would leave them alone for the present. The Admiralty had this year made a very great change in their method of first appointment; and if it were merely for the purpose of making sure their ground and obtaining data to guide their further progress, it was really important that they should be allowed some time to see how the change would work. In the interests of the Service, and speaking as one who had his mind open—widely open—to the possibilities of reform being needed, he would be heartily glad if they were allowed time to deliberate very carefully indeed on their experiences of the reformed system before they were bound by a vote of Parliament to exchange it for another to which it was, in some important respects, an approach and an advance.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to call the attention of the Government to the reports contained in the morning papers stating that two of his constituents had been arrested and placed in prison—namely, Mr. Murphy and Mr. Campion, of Rathdowney, in the Queen's County. He was perfectly certain these two men were among the last in Queen's County who would aid or abet any transgression of the law. It was perfectly impossible to conceive what offence they had been guilty of which would justify their arrest; but he supposed that, as had been done in other cases, the Government would be prepared to shelter themselves behind the powers which had been given to them, and under which they had already seized Mr. Doran and others, of Maryborough, and placed them in Naas Gaol. The difficulties of the 200 others who were confined in Ireland were very well stated in a letter which he had just received from Mr. John Reddington, now in prison. He said it seemed to him very unlikely that any of those now in prison would be released without signing some compromise; that he was charged with inciting to intimidation, while, as a matter of fact, he had always been most anxious to prevent breaches of the law; and that the men who felt as he did on this question should not be handed over to the tender mercies of the Government. He asked what would become of those men in prison who wanted to bring cases before the Land Commissioners? He was conscious of having sinned too deeply in the eyes of the powers that be, because he ventured to assert his own right, to expect pardon, except he was prepared to sign a compromise, and, consequently, he was likely to remain in prison some time. His father and mother were old and decrepit. He had an extremely strong case to lay before the Land Commission. His landlord, although he lived within three miles of the property he occupied, never came near it, and a few years ago he raised the rent 100 per cent over Griffith's valuation. Unless he was allowed to obtain legal advice, he could not appear before the Land Commission. This man was respected throughout the country by all who knew him, and was utterly incapable of doing the thing complained of, or attempting to break the law. But, at the same time, he was a man of determination, and never hesitated to say that which he thought ought to be said, and assert his right. This man appealed for information, and he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) thought the appeal was a very reasonable one, as to what facilities would be afforded to men like him to bring their cases before the Land Commission. This man's relatives were entirely dependent on his exertions, and were entirely unable to look after his interests. Such had been the tyranny of the landlord class that if it were not for some bold, determined spirits the great bulk of the tenants could never have been induced to assert their rights as they had done manfully during the last 18 months. He, therefore, asked the Government how they proposed to deal with these men after the rising of Parliament, when the Land Commission was at work, and what was the alleged reason for the arrest mentioned in this morning's papers of Mr. Campion and Mr. Murphy?

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was not aware the hon. Gentleman was about to bring forward this case. As to the last question, he could not answer it until he got information. If the hon. Member put the Question down on the Notice Paper he would give him what answer he could, in accordance with the previous answers he had given on these matters; but he was not in a position at present to make any statements at all upon the subject. He would take care that no man who was arrested under the Protection of Person and Property Act should be, if he could possibly prevent it—and he thought he should be able to prevent it—in any way damaged in making applications in reference to his holding under the Land Act if it became law. The hon. Member wished to find out in what way he would carry out that intention. He must ask for time to consider the way in which he would carry it out. He admitted it would be unjust for a man to be deprived of his power of obtaining a judicial rent, and of having his case for a fair rent put before the Commissioners for the reasons named by the hon. Member.

MR. BIGGAR said, one part of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was more or less—rather less than more—satisfactory. He stated that tenants arrested would have an opportunity of putting their case before the Court. Now, they had a great deal of experience as to the promises of the right hon. Gentleman, and it would have been more satisfactory had he been a little more explicit in his reply. Then, with regard to the other part of the question, his reply was most unsatisfactory, for they were always led to believe that no imprisonment would take place unless the right hon. Gentleman himself specially and carefully examined the charges made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he did examine the cases personally; but he declined to make a statement from memory when he had not received Notice and had not the Papers before him.

MR. BIGGAR thought it remarkable that, having examined the cases, the mind of the right hon. Gentleman should appear to be a perfect blank on the subject. The replies of the right hon. Gentleman conveyed the impression that the right hon. Gentleman knew nothing of the case. They would require every statement made by the right hon. Gentleman put down on paper, and a rigid examination of details.

MR. HEALY asked if it was the invariable rule of the right hon. Gentleman to look into every case? If that were so, it was a matter of some satisfaction, for he would rather fall into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman than those of Under Secretary Burke. They knew that the right hon. Gentleman had, unfortunately, been led astray, while the bent of the mind of Mr. Burke was against the tenants. He was a most odious tyrant in every relation with his tenants. He presumed that the "reasonable suspicion" on which those men were arrested arose from the moral consciousness of the right hon. Gentleman. In the Irish Office there ought to be kept a précis stating opposite each man's name the grounds on which he was arrested.

MR. W. E. FORSTER repeated that he looked into every case; but if he had had Notice he would have been able to give a more precise answer. He must, in the strongest possible terms, repudiate the description which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had given of Mr. Burke, and he defied the hon. Member to get that description endorsed by the tenants. He believed there was rarely to be found a man who was more sympathizing with the tenants or more ready to redress hardships than Mr. Burke.

MR. HEALY said, that, last year, cases were brought forward in that House in which Mr. Burke had rack rented and oppressed tenants.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that no case of the kind had been proved.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,027, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue."

MR. FINIGAN said, he wished to put one or two questions to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury before this Vote was agreed to. First of all, he wanted to know what was the meaning of the item under the heading B—"Lyon King of Arms, £500;" and who was the personage who represented the Lyon King of Arms? He also desired to know what explanation could be given of the item "Secretary to the Bible Board, £600?" He should like to know what the Secretary to the Bible Board had to do, and also what was the particular duty of the Bible Board itself? He hoped the noble Lord would furnish some information as to the persons employed by the Bible Board. The Committee ought to understand what they were asked to vote the money for.

Mr. Healy

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH stated that the Lyon King of Arms was the Chief of the Herald's College in Scotland. With regard to the Bible Board, he believed its duties were to see that there were no inaccurate copies of the Bible published in Scotland. It was, of course, well known to hon. Members that in England the Bible could only be printed by the two Universities and by the Queen's Printers; but in Scotland Bibles might be printed by any printer, and, consequently, it was considered advisable that there should be a check upon the issue of copies of that Book, so as to make sure that inaccurate copies should not be published. The expense of this had been charged on the public for ages past, and it only amounted to a small sum.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the noble Lord if there was any plea for the advocate de diaboli of the index purgatorius in Scotland, because, if there was, something could be said for the keeping up of this charge.

MR. HEALY asked if there were any means of preventing any person who wished to do so from publishing an inaccurate version of the Bible? Was there any law under which anyone who wanted to publish a Bible with a chapter or verse left out must send a copy to the Secretary to the Bible Board, who would have to certify as to what had been left out?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to be informed what was the duty of the Bible Board, with regard, for instance, to the newly revised edition of the New Testament?

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he should like the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury to inform the Committee what were the duties and functions of "Her Majesty's Limner," whose salary was stated in the Vote at £97. What was it that he was required to draw or print?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, all he had to say in answer to the questions that had been put to him was that some of these charges were relics of the ancient Scottish Monarchy, and were the only ones that now survived in connection with the numerous appointments attached to the ancient Scottish Court. He was not very well acquainted with the details in connection with some of the matters referred to, and he thought the Solicitor General for Scotland would be better able to answer the question put with regard to the law on the subject of the publication of the Bible in Scotland. It was his belief, however, that it was requisite that a copy of every new edition should be sent to the Bible Board.

MR. LEAMY asked whether, supposing an incorrect copy of the Bible were printed in England, the Bible Board in Scotland would have power to stop its circulation in that country?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH believed that the duties of the Bible Board were simply confined to Bibles printed in Scotland.

MR. BIGGAR wished to ask what were the duties of the Law Agent to the Bible Board in Scotland? This appointment seemed to him to be the most curious appointment in connection with the Board. He thought the noble Lord ought to be able to give some information on this point. He should like to know what were the duties both of the Secretary and of the Legal Adviser to the Bible Board?

MR. HEALY said, he should like to know whether if a Catholic printer were to publish the Douai version of the Bible, he would be bound to submit a copy of it to the Bible Board—whether, in fact, the Catholic version of the Bible could be printed in Scotland?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he should like to put a further question to the noble Lord, and that was, whether the office of Secretary to the Bible Board was a sinecure or not? If it were not a sinecure, he apprehended that that officer would have the very pleasant task of looking at every Bible that crossed the Scottish Border in order to see whether it was the correct version. Was it a part of his duty to do this?

In fact, was the appointment a sinecure, or was it not? The Committee had already been satisfied about the office of Lyon King of Arms, because the office was one that brought in something; but with respect to the Secretary to the Bible Board, he could not see that the office was one that did any good to the inhabitants of Scotland, or to any other part of the world, the only advantage of the payment of £600 per annum being that the money went into the pocket of some gentleman who had nothing to do in return for it.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, the Bible Board had no right to interfere with the publication of any edition of the Bible unless it professed to be the authorized version. Any person in Scotland might print and publish any other version as he pleased. He might publish a new and altered translation and no one could interfere with him. There was not less liberty in Scotland than in England as to printing the authorized version. In England it could be printed only by the Universities or the Queen's Printer. In Scotland it could be printed or published by any man if he received the attestation of the Board as to its accuracy. The office of Secretary to the Bible Board was not a sinecure; but, at the same time, he was of opinion that it was one that might be abolished with advantage.

MR. BIGGAR said, no information had as yet been given in reply to his question as to the Law Agent of the Bible Board, and very little with regard to the Secretary, and for this reason he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the amount payable to the Secretary and the Law Agent of the Bible Board.

THE CHAIRMAN: Both the Secretary and the Law Agent?

MR. BIGGAR said, he meant to include both in his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,187, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue."—(Mr. Biggar.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he found that the Secretary had an officer under him who was a printer by profession, and who was employed as reader in the technical work of revision. The Secretary also had to provide office rooms and papers.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had been about to ask the Solicitor General for Scotland for some information, because he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman might throw some light on the question. He believed he was right in saying that the office of Queen's Printer in Scotland was abolished some 30 years ago. That office used to entail a charge of £6,000 a-year on the public, and in its place the present arrangement had been made. Of course, whoever bought a Bible, like a person who bought butter, wanted to buy the real thing, and although any person in Scotland might, if he pleased, print copies of the Bible, he must not print an unauthorized version. If he did, the public would not have that which they desired to have; but if this Vote were abolished, every person who wanted the correct version would, in future, be obliged to go to the Oxford or Cambridge Press for it.

MR. HEALY said, he would suggest that his hon. Friend should be content with the protest he had made; but he did not understand why they should spend £840 on the two offices that had been the subjects of discussion.

MR. LEAMY did not see why they should have in the office of Law Agent to the Bible Board a permanent official at a salary of £240 a-year, which was to be paid whether he had been engaged in any prosecutions or not; nor did he see why, in the case of the Secretary, it should not be incumbent on the Board to engage a lawyer who might institute prosecutions in case of any breach of the law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he was not aware of any recent cases in which prosecutions had been instituted. He believed the practice was that proof sheets of every proposed edition of the Bible were sent to the Secretary of the Bible Board, and when these had been gone over by the reader, the Secretary also went over them, and they were then submitted to a meeting of the Board, the meetings being held periodically. If necessary, corrections were made, and these were sent back to the respective printers, who sometimes would incur a good deal of cost in making the alterations.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished, before the Vote was put to the Committee, to ask a question which he regarded as a pertinent one. He wished to ask the Solicitor General for Scotland whether it was not a fact that the Secretary to the Bible Board got £600 a-year, and gave £100 a-year to a tradesman who did the work for him, he putting the remaining £500 a-year into his own pocket for doing nothing? This arrangement was merely because it was necessary to keep up a show of doing some work; but, practically, as far as the appointment of the Secretary was concerned, the office was a mere sinecure. With regard to the appointment of Law Agent, that was also a sinecure; and he believed he was justified in saying that if proceedings were taken at the instance of the Bible Board against a printer for infringing the law, the expenses of the prosecution came out of a totally different Vote. It was, therefore, by no means necessary that the allowance for Law Agent should be continuous, as it was now.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he could not state what the arrangement between the Secretary and the reader was, but no doubt there was some arrangement between them. The results of the duties performed were, as he had already stated, submitted to the Bible Board at their periodical meetings, with such observations as the Secretary had to offer. With regard to the appointment of Law Agent, he was afraid he could not add to what had already been said on that point. All he knew was that the office was one that was still retained.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he was afraid that the continuance of these offices kept the door open to a form of abuse. He sincerely hoped that such an expression of opinion as had already been given on this subject would lead to this result—that while the present holders of the offices referred to should be permitted to retain them for the rest of their lives, it would be impossible for any Government to continue the appointments. There was an evident abuse which, being perpetrated in the name of the Bible, rendered it all the more intolerable.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

MR. BIGGAR said, he was much pleased to hear what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Williamson) who had just sat down. He wished to put this question to the Representatives of Her Majesty's Government—Would they give a distinct pledge that they would not re-appoint men to these two sinecure offices? So far the Government had been exceedingly unwilling to let the Committee know what were the facts of the case; and it would have been far better had the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Scotland come forward at once, and stated what he knew about the matter under discussion.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could assure the Committee that there would be no new appointments to these offices without the question being carefully investigated.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the statement just made by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was very satisfactory; but he would have saved a good deal of wasted time if he had made that statement before, and had said not only that no future appointment would be made to either of the two sinecure offices, but that no such appointment should be made without submitting the matter to that House. If, in the course of the coming winter, one of these officials should die, what course would the Government be likely to take? There ought to be some pledge that it should not be filled up without the sanction of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: It would not be filled up without the sanction of Parliament.

MR. BIGGAR said, after what had just fallen from the Prime Minister, he would, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw his Amendment. He should like, however, to say, with regard to the Queen's Plates that were given for racing purposes in Scotland, that he was very sorry to see these items upon the Votes. He was well aware that in saying this he differed in opinion from some of his hon. Colleagues upon the subject of horse-racing; at the same time, he made it a rule which he did not like to break to oppose the Vote of money for such purposes, and if any other hon. Member would support him, he should certainly move to omit the sums put down for these Queen's Plates.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £9,239, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays."

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to say a few words on behalf of his constituents the fishermen on the coast of Ayrshire, between Ballantrae and Girvan. This was one of the most important herring fisheries in Scotland. The fishing took place in February and March. Outside the great spawning bed at Ballantrae there were considerable trawling grounds, where great quantities of cod and other fish used to be taken by lines; but the beam-trawlers had swept away the lines, and the fishery was destroyed. The fishermen had asked him (Colonel Alexander) to forward a Petition to the Fishery Board against beam-trawling. He had received a courteous answer from the Secretary that he could do nothing. In the year 1866 a Sea Fisheries Commission was appointed, consisting of the present First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) and Mr. James Caird, a distinguished agriculturist. This Commission arrived at the curious conclusion that beam-trawlers were Free Traders and ought to be encouraged, whereas those who opposed beam-trawling were Protectionists and ought to be discouraged in every possible way. In 1878 another Commission was appointed, consisting of the late Mr. Buckland, Mr. Walpole, and another gentleman, which arrived at a different conclusion. The Commission reported that the Ballantrae fishermen had made out a strong prima facie case against beam-trawling inshore, and thought the Legislature should give the Secretary of State power to stop beam-trawling inshore should it be necessary to do so. He (Colonel Alexander) wished to know whether the Secretary of State (Sir William Harcourt) would carry out the recommendation of the Commission, and ask Parliament for power to stop beamtrawling inshore at any place where he might consider it necessary so to do?

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was able to confirm what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Alexander). His (Sir John Hay's) constituents were largely interested in this question. There were numbers of these hardy and excellent fishermen who, when they went to sea, found their legitimate occupation seriously interfered with by trawling vessels coming from a distance. It seemed to him that the recommendation of the last Commission ought to be attended to by the Home Secretary; for although he had great esteem and respect for Mr. James Caird, he did not know that his knowledge of sea fisheries was very extensive. He (Sir John Hay) had paid great attention to the Reports of the Commissions, and he did not see why the advice of the later Commission should not be acted upon. There was no doubt that great mischief was done by the trawlers to the legitimate occupation of the fishermen on the coast. They were a set of men who were hardy and excellent fishermen, and well deserving of encouragement. There was plenty of room outside the line fisheries for the trawlers, and he trusted the Government would give effect to the recommendation of the last Commission.

MR. WEBSTER said, the question now under discussion had been brought forward by him at an earlier period of the Session, and the Motion he had then submitted was negatived on a division. He was glad to find that hon. Gentlemen opposite were now inclined to concede the principle for which he had contended; and what they had said encouraged him to hope that when this question was brought forward in another Session he should be supported by those hon. Gentlemen. At present, however, the question had been decided by what had previously taken place.

SIR JOHN HAY wished to say that although the hon. Member (Mr. Webster) had his entire sympathy in the Motion he had formerly submitted, that Motion was brought on at an hour in the morning when he (Sir John Hay) did not happen to be present. It was, however, a matter with which he hoped the Lord Advocate might interfere in the sense suggested by the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) and himself.

Colonel Alexander

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he hoped the Home Secretary would give a reply to the point he had raised. It would only be necessary for him to interfere in those cases where he might think it necessary to do so.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it was unfortunate the Lord Advocate was not in his place when the question was opened, and he did not think that the Representatives of the Treasury were well qualified to decide this question. He could only say that the facts would be brought before the Lord Advocate.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had received several letters from Kerry with reference to an item in this Vote, which was regarded with a good deal of jealousy by all the fishing interests in Ireland. They complained that the Irish Members gave their consent for the voting of public money for certain purposes in Scotland, when similar grants were persistently refused to the interests in which they were concerned in Ireland. He referred to the item "Cutter and Boat Service; Pay of Officers and Crew of Cutter; Victualling; Repairs and Service Stores—Fishery Station Votes amounting to £2,480." It was of great importance to the fisheries on the Coasts of Ireland that they should be protected; but they were not. As a matter of fact, they suffered a great deal from the trawlers, who also frequented the Coast of Scotland, as well as from the great misconduct of the number of foreign fishermen, principally French, who habitually broke their nets. He believed that the Scotch fishermen, in common with the English and Irish fishermen, had sustained much injury from the Belgian fishermen, who made use of instruments which were called "Belgian devils." The cutter mentioned in this Vote had proved of great service in protecting the Scotch fishermen from the depredations committed by these foreigners, and it had also been useful in maintaining the peace and preventing dangerous quarrels among the Scotch fishermen themselves. The Irish fishermen suffered from the same evils, and the Inspectors of Fisheries had repeatedly made urgent representations as to the advisability of establishing a good Cutter Service in the Irish waters, such as was voted by the House in favour of the Scotch fisheries year after year. But the Irish fishermen had hitherto found it impossible to secure due attention on the part of the Government to this very reasonable application, and it therefore became necessary that the Irish Members should make a distinct stand upon this point. He was sorry to appear to oppose the Scotch Vote, especially as he was inclined to think that the Scotchmen did not get so much from the Imperial Revenue as they had a fair right to in many instances, and he was, generally speaking, inclined to support the Scotch Members in the representations they made as to the inadequacy for the sums voted for the Scotch Service. But on this occasion he felt it necessary to exceed the representations that had been made to him from Kerry. Therefore, he should move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £2,430, in the hope of being enabled to obtain some assurance from the Government that the claims of Ireland in this matter should receive the same treatment as those of Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £6,809, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland and certain Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays."
—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH was understood to say that much consideration had been given to the subject before it was decided to send a vessel to the Scotch Coast. A greater number of Scotch fishermen were employed there than the number of Irish fishermen on the Irish Coast; and it did not follow that because a gunboat had been placed off the Coast of Scotland to prevent the depredations of foreign vessels, that one should also be sent to the Irish Coast for police purposes. He was not aware that disturbances had occurred in connection with the Irish fisheries; but if, on examination, it was found to be necessary, a gunboat would be sent.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the mind of the noble Lord was still insufficiently impressed with the importance of this question. In the Report of the Fishery Commission of 1879 he found an expression of opinion that there ought to be a properly equipped vessel on the Irish Coast, for the purposes of carrying out fishing experiments and discovering new fishing grounds. He did not think the noble Lord had any claim whatever to take further time for the consideration of this matter. As long as there has been a Report from the Fishery Commissioners, so long had there been a paragraph in it demanding that a vessel should be sent to the Coast of Ireland, and the Inspectors of Fisheries had declared, on their own responsibility, that a necessity existed for this gunboat. There had been a discussion a few days ago upon the subject of the Irish fisheries, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland had, upon that occasion, given an assurance which was satisfactory as far as it went.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member for Galway that, although it was allowable by way of illustration to show that there was no Vote for a gunboat off the Coast of Ireland, it was not competent to him to discuss the question of the Irish fisheries upon the Scotch Vote.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR thanked the Chairman for his ruling. He had quoted the Report of 1879 by way of illustration, and would conclude the few observations he had to make by a reference to the Report of 1880, which said that "the attendance of a gunboat or two was necessary during the mackerel season to protect the fishery." The Commissioners of Irish Fisheries were every year pressing this question upon the Government; the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had also, on more than one occasion, brought it before the House, and he had never heard him speak upon the subject without impressing the immense necessity which existed for placing a gunboat off the Irish Coast, for the purpose of protecting the fisheries. He therefore trusted that the Government would lose no more time in carrying out this recommendation.

MR. LEAMY said, that the Committee were not only asked to vote £2,430 for Cutter and Boat Services, but there was also a charge of £200 for salary of the commanding officer of the Vigilant cruiser, besides £100 for salary of the commanding officer of H.M.S. Jackal, and another sum of £50 in connection with the gunboat. It would really seem as if the whole Navy were concerned in the protection of the Scotch fisheries; but, leaving that point out of the question, he was quite at a loss to understand why the commander of the Jackal should receive £100 in addition to his naval pay.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, the Scotch Members had quite recently shown their readiness to support measures for the development of the Irish fisheries; but what they were asked to do now, as a means of aiding Ireland, was to acquiesce in refusing the Vote for the fisheries of their own country. That might be an Irish way of securing the desired end, but it was certainly not a Scotch one. He hoped that the Irish Members would give up their opposition to this Vote.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he would remind the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee that the course adopted by hon. Members near him was the only means they had of calling attention to the necessity which they believed existed for placing a gunboat in Irish waters. He could assure the Committee that no better service was done than that performed by the Vigilant and Jackal; and he trusted hon. Members for Ireland would not wish to improve the Irish fisheries so far as to remove these vessels from the Coast of Scotland. He approved strongly the stationing of gunboats of the Navy at various places for the purpose of protecting the fisheries, because, amongst other reasons, it gave their officers and men excellent experience of waters which it required much skill to navigate. He was entirely opposed to stopping the Jackal and the Vigilant in their work off the Coast of Scotland; but he should be glad to hear that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to do what was requested by Irish Members, if necessary.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH explained that the extra pay to the commanding officer of the Jackal was for work done in connection with the Scotch fisheries, which was much more difficult than that which was usually performed by naval officers. If upon further examination it was found that a gunboat was required off the Irish Coast for the purpose indicated by hon. Members opposite, he should be glad to do everything in his power to persuade the Board of Admiralty to station a vessel there. The question of disputes between English and foreign fishermen would be discussed at the International Congress, which was shortly to meet at the Hague. He must remind the Committee that the reason for sending a gunboat to the Scotch Coast was very different to that which might exist in the case of the Irish fisheries. It was purely a matter of police as regarded Ireland, and he could hardly believe that the same state of things existed off the Irish Coast as off the Scotch Coast.

MR. E. COLLINS said, he was perfectly sure there was no disposition on the part of his hon. Friends to reduce the Vote for the Scotch fisheries. The question of having a cutter in Irish waters had been discussed during the last few years by those interested in the Irish fisheries; and the Irish Fishery Commissioners had impressed upon the Government the desirability of sending a boat for the purposes they had indicated. But he would like to mention, for the information of his hon. Friends, that there was a great distinction to be drawn between the objects contemplated by the Irish Fishery Commissioners and matters of police. He also reminded them that a gunboat was sent to the Irish Coast, and occasionally a cruiser, which looked after the Irish fisheries. For these services no separate Vote was taken in the Estimates, but it formed a charge upon the Admiralty.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it was not his intention to proceed to a division; but he had felt it to be his duty to take formal notice upon this Vote of the different treatment accorded to Scotland and Ireland. In asking permission to withdraw his Amendment, he begged leave to say that his appeal to the Government for the stationing of a vessel in Irish waters was made as much in the interest of the Scotch as of the Irish fishermen. A Return showed that in one season there were 60 English, 115 Irish, and 187 Scotch vessels engaged on one Irish fishing ground, while further down the coast, at Ardglass, as many as 213 Scotch vessels were engaged. The placing of a vessel on the coast would, therefore, be for the advantage of the Three Countries. He might also mention that inasmuch as the Scotch boats were larger than the Irish, their interest in the matter was proportionately greater. It was not only for police purposes that this was required, but for the protection of fishermen and fishing pro-fishermen. The Report stated distinctly that it was necessary that a cruiser should be stationed off the coast of Kerry and Cork for the protection of the mackerel fishery from those depredations. When the question again presented itself he trusted that, for the reasons he had stated, they would receive the support of Scotch Members in aid of the claim for a boat to be stationed off the Coast of Ireland.

Mr. Leamy

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £3,944, to complete the sum for the Board of Lunacy in Scotland.

MR. WEBSTER said, he had been requested to bring forward a question which was the subject of a Petition he had presented to the House from the Convention of Burghs. The question was as to whether it was not desirable that the Lunacy Board should be merged into the Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor in Scotland. The Committee would observe that the charge under this head was considerable—namely, £5,944, of which £3,200 was for the salaries of Senior Commissioner, Commissioner, Senior Deputy Commissioner, and Deputy Commissioner; and these gentlemen, in addition to the amount of their salaries, had an allowance for travelling expenses of £1,000. There were also a secretary and a staff of clerks, whose salaries brought the total amount under that head to the sum of £4,864. Now, it had been very clearly pointed out by the Convention that a great part of the business of the Lunacy Commissioners was devoted to the oversight of pauper lunatics, most of whom were kept in the parochial poor-houses, which were under the direct charge of the Board of Supervision of the Poor in Scotland. It, therefore, deserved grave consideration whether the business of the Lunacy Commission might not be superseded and merged, as he had before said, into the department of the Board of Supervision, whose business underlay and embodied the greater part of that of the Lunacy Commissioners. He confessed he had up to the present time not been able to get sufficient information to justify him, with due respect and regard to the Committee, in proposing on that occasion absolutely to do away with the Commission; and he, therefore, confined himself to giving Notice that if, upon further consideration, it appeared to Scotch and other hon. Members that this Commission had seen its day, and that it should be merged into the department for the relief of the poor, the question would be deliberately raised again next year.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) pointed out that the Lunacy Commissioners were appointed for the purpose of carrying out certain Acts of Parliament. They were medical men, and performed duties with respect to all public and private lunatics throughout Scotland; and, under the circumstances, he did not think that the staff was more than adequate for the requirements of the service. It might be that on some grounds the union of the department with the Board of Supervision of Relief to the Poor was desirable; but he could hold out no prospect that it would take place.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £5,746, to complete the sum for Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

(5.) £5,582, to complete the sum for Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Public Health, Scotland.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to elicit from the Government some explicit statement as to their intentions with regard to the sum of £10,000 which appeared as a grant in aid of medical relief under this Vote. It was a matter of just complaint in Scotland that this grant was limited to so small a sum as £10,000, having regard to the very lavish expenditure for the same purpose in England. He believed the Prime Minister had on the previous day expressed some intention of dealing with the matter in speaking on the Motion of the hon. Member for Ayrshire (Mr. Cochran-Patrick); but it had not been easy to gather exactly what it was that the Prime Minister was desirous to convey. He would, therefore, be glad to know whether the Government proposed to ask for any Supplementary Estimate this year for the purpose of rectifying the existing inequality?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, it would not be possible for him to add anything to the explicit statement made by the Prime Minister, and which, he believed, was perfectly understood by all Scotch Members. He should regard perty against the depredations of foreign it as simply a waste of time to attempt any further explanation.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he believed that hon. Members below the Gangway on that side of the House were entitled to a civil reply from the noble Lord when a question affecting the expenditure of public money was addressed to him. He wished to elicit from the noble Lord whether the Government intended to make any immediate alteration in the arrangements which at present existed with respect to the Medical Board in Scotland, and whether, in order to do so, it was proposed to enlarge the Vote by a supplementary sum?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the Prime Minister had distinctly stated that no change would be made this year, but that the matter would be considered next year.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,270, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."

MR. FINIGAN said, he objected to this Vote en bloc, and, in saying that, he wished to state that his objection was not to any individuals, but to the whole system of paying for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. He had heard, in that House and elsewhere, great speeches delivered on the tyranny of government in certain countries; but he would not now refer to any other system of government than that at Constantinople, which was, in his opinion, the only one which could be reasonably compared with the English system of government in Ireland, and he was quite aware that the Lord Lieutenant's Household in Dublin was kept up on a somewhat similar principle to that which regulated the household of a Pasha under the Turkish rule. He protested against, and was bound to oppose, any system, with all its surroundings, that supported a tyrannous rule in Ireland, and which kept up a permanent staff of effete officials such as that provided for in this Vote. He found that the salaries for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant amounted to £3,631. Now, he said that a household which took so large a sum of money must be of an extravagant kind, and it was very hard for Irish Members to be asked to vote £3,631 to maintain a household which directly supported a wretched system of government. For that reason he should vote against the charge. Then there was another item, under sub-head D, for the Ulster King-at-Arms, to which he had last year called the attention of the Committee. Happily, there were no Kings in Ireland; and there they did not want even an Irish King, and certainly not the anomaly called the Ulster King-at-Arms. For his own part, he thought that Kings and Ireland would do very well apart, and that the Irish people would be much better without either the realities or emblems of Royalty. Besides the amount of salary paid to the Ulster King-at-Arms, he saw, on referring to a foot-note, that he received £500 a-year as Keeper of State Papers. Now, this system of giving duplicate offices to one individual had been common in England, and much more common in Ireland, and such offices, as a general rule, were State rewards to persons who had rendered services, not to Ireland, but to those who misruled it. Therefore, he opposed the Vote, first, on account of the Ulster King-at-Arms holding duplicate offices, to which he objected on abstract grounds, and secondly, because he objected to the office itself. He further objected to the item of £25 for emblazoning arms. In moving that the Vote be reduced by two-thirds of the whole total, he expressed a hope that Irish Members would divide against this charge again and again, not in opposition to the individuals included under it, but in opposition to, and as a protest against, a system of government which, he thought, should be done away with as quickly as possible. He wished to see Ireland ruled, if it must be so ruled, in accordance with the so-called Act of Union, which had been violated in spirit and word, in equity and in law, and in every possible way. He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by two-thirds of the total amount.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,423, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course

Lord Frederick Cavendish

of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1882, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."—(Mr. Finigan.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether he would be in Order in afterwards moving a reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,800 for salaries of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member would be in Order in moving the reduction of the Vote by £1,800, but not the reduction of an item after a reduction had been moved on the total.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, in that case he would ask his hon. Friend to withdraw the present Motion, to enable him to move the reduction of the household expenses.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had given the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Finigan) an opportunity to do so; but he had decided to move the reduction of the total, and it would, therefore, not be competent to the hon. Member for Queen's County to move the reduction of an item.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood the hon. Member for Ennis to make his Motion upon two grounds. His first objection was to the Vote en bloc; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) presumed that as long as the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland was kept up the Committee would vote the sum necessary for maintaining the present form of government in Ireland. The hon. Member then especially objected to the charge for the Ulster King-at-Arms. This Vote was similar to that for the Lyon King-at-Arms, and he found that the present occupant came into office in 1853, when it was fixed that his salary was to be £200 a-year in addition to fees. But by a Treasury Minute of the 25th February, 1872, it was settled that the salary was to be £750 in lieu of fees. Since that time fees had been paid into the Exchequer to the amount of £6,015, by which it would be seen that the Treasury had been gainers of a considerable sum annually. He understood also that the office was not to be again filled up without the consent of the Treasury—that is to say that, on the office becoming vacant, there would be an opportunity of considering whether it should continue or not. With regard to the duties of the Keeper of State Papers, he wished to observe that they were performed by the Ulster King-at-Arms in the most efficient manner, and that the amount charged in the Estimate for the services rendered were no more than an adequate remuneration to that officer.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR observed, that the right hon. Gentleman apparently had not thought it right to make any reply to the general observations of the hon. Member for Ennis. He joined with his hon. Friend in his strong objection to Royal Courts, under all circumstances; and if he objected to Royal Courts a fortiori, he objected to Vice-regal Courts which were very shams, and he contended that the effect of the Vice-regal Court on the people of Dublin was to bring to the surface all the snobbish elements of society. Such persons had for a long time uniformly opposed everything in the shape of the regeneration of the Irish nation and the advance of public opinion. If in London anyone desired to find a class of persons a little below the Corporation of the City, it would be necessary for him to go to those parts of the Metropolis where the Royal tradesmen "most do congregate," and then it would be found that every proposal emanating from the party which represented progress and improvement was met with uniform opposition on the part of these hangers-on of Royalty. It was precisely the same in Dublin. In that city there was no resident aristocracy, but in its place there was a number of officials, professional men, and tradesmen. The Vice-regal system in Dublin was kept up by various expedients, notably amongst others by the influence of the weaker sex. If you wanted a professional man to take any manly and straightforward action upon a question of policy in Ireland, he would be sure to be got at by the patronage which, in the shape of large salaries, the English Government had under its control in Ireland, and which were kept up to an extravagant figure simply because they were not the rewards of professional ability, but because they were bribes by which the talent of the country could be kept in the anti-national ranks. But he would be completely secured by the female belongings of the Lord Lieutenant, and an invitation to a ball was one means by which the Government in Ireland was propped up by the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary. With regard to the present holder of the office of Lord Lieutenant in Ireland he had nothing to say beyond that he worked in silence and secrecy, and that he had probably blushed occasionally to find himself famous by allusions which Irish Members were compelled to make in that House to some of his operations. He had nothing to urge personally against the present holder of the office, whom he believed to be a high-minded nobleman; but he pointed out that they were dealing with a country the majority of whose inhabitants at the present moment were in such a state of destitution that the Government had been obliged to overthrow on their behalf the principles which related to the land. It was in such a state of things that there was a Lord Lieutenant in Ireland with a salary of £20,000 a-year and a household which was charged at the additional sum of £3,631. And, then, in order that his religious wants might be attended to, he was provided with a chaplain whose salary and allowances amounted to £780. Finally, there was the Ulster King-at-Arms with the salary of £750 a-year, who, although he had never had the pleasure of seeing him, he presumed belonged to something in the nature of the order of beadles. However that might be, to spend £750 in a wretchedly poor country, for the purpose of keeping up this miserable and ghastly remnant of feudal days, was rather too much to propose in a House composed of Liberals pledged to economy. This question had been brought before the Committee on previous occasions by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and by the late Joseph Hume, who repeatedly asked that a change should be made; and whenever the opportunity should present itself of following in the footsteps of the latter, whom he regarded as a trustworthy guide in political questions, whether English or Irish, he should protest against this Vote in the belief that he would, by so doing, act in conformity with the wishes of the English and Irish people. When he contrasted the poverty of the people of Ireland with the enormous expenditure on State officials, he regarded the latter as the embodiment of the worst form of foreign customs which existed at the present day; and for that reason, and for the purpose of convincing the Government of their sincerity, he trusted his Colleagues would always meet this Vote with persistent hostility.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the remarks of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) rather conveyed the impression that the payment to the Ulster King-at-Arms was a loss to the country; but the fact was the reverse of this. The fees for the last five and a-half years which had been paid into the Treasury amounted to £6,015, as against five and a-half years' salary, which amounted to £4,135.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not attach much importance to the item of Ulster King-at-Arms. After all, arms were but the hieroglyphics of nobility, and as such, perhaps, might be of interest to persons of an archæological turn of mind. Although he was not opposed to the office in the hands of its present occupier, he hoped that when it became vacant, it would not be again filled up. If the Lord Lieutenant then chose to pay an officer of the kind out of his own pocket, no one could of course object to his doing so. But his objection to the Vote rested on larger grounds. He agreed with a Member of the present Government in saying that the whole system of administration by the Lord Lieutenant was a mockery and a sham. He had himself heard a Member of the present Government use these words, at a bye election, when he was endeavouring to obtain the Irish vote—

"We owe you," he said, "a debt; and as one who feels we have wronged you—not in his own person, but in those of his predecessors—I will endeavour, in connection with honest men, to wipe out the memory of those crimes and obliterate the last traces of English misrule in Ireland, and I hope the day is not distant when this farce of the Lord Lieutenant will be got rid of."

These were the words of one of the present occupants of the Treasury Bench. Moreover, he had heard an Irishman say in the House of Commons—

"I can understand what people talk about when they speak of the sunshine of Royalty, but the moonshine of Viceroyalty is utterly incomprehensible."

But his objection to the office was not only that it was a sham and a mockery, but because the powers intrusted to the Lord Lieutenant had, to his mind, been grossly abused. That House had extended to the present Lord Lieutenant and his Chief Secretary very exceptional powers, and such as had never before been extended to any authority in Great Britain. They had placed the liberties of the people of Ireland at the arbitrary will of two men, with regard to one of whom he must say that the present Lord Lieutenant had shown that he was very much given to that turn of mind which enabled him to see reasonable grounds of suspicion against men whom he and his subordinates or satellites might choose to represent as fit subjects for imprisonment. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had, in his place in that House, repeatedly stated that these powers were conferred in order that persons of bad character and unruly members of the community should be placed under restraint when it was found impossible by ordinary process of law to prevent them carrying out their mischievous designs. But the result of these powers was that the turbulent were at large, and that the village ruffians were safe and perfectly free. There was no single village tyrant in prison in Ireland under the Coercion Acts, and there was no single Queen's County landlord who for one moment was in apprehension for his personal safety. There was a tyrannous attitude towards the people that would go far to break the spirit and crush the independence of any population less elastic than the Irish people. But, on the other hand, the Chief Secretary had listened to interested representations—had given his ear to the persistent suggestions of men who, whether they were supported by Secret Service money or not, he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) did not know, but who had instilled into him the idea that the men most trusted by the people were fit subjects for the exercise of his exceptional powers; and it was found from one end of Ireland to the other, men whose lives up to the present had been blameless, against whom no specific charge could be brought—men who were trusted—

THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member that the right time to discuss this subject is on the next Vote for the Executive. This is simply a Vote for the Household.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, quite so; but he would do away with the Lord Lieutenant, and he would include the household in the condemnation. He would recommend a "bag and baggage policy" for Ireland as complete as was suggested for Bulgaria. He objected to this household of the Lord Lieutenant, and he objected to the Lord Lieutenant himself. He supposed if there were no Lord Lieutenant there would be no necessity for the household, and therefore he objected to the expenditure for the household of the Lord Lieutenant. He wished to say that he did not make his observations with regard to the arrests in Ireland without personal knowledge. He had good personal knowledge of years standing with many of the men now imprisoned.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have pointed out to the hon. Member that the question of the arrests comes under the Vote for the Executive. This is simply a Vote for the Household, and his remarks are out of Order.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, as, of course, he was not in a position to challenge the ruling of the Chair, there was absolutely nothing for him to do but to submit to it, which, under the circumstances, he did. But he would go on to the next head of the Vote—the salary and allowances to the chaplain. The chaplain of Dublin Castle received £184 12s. 8d., and an allowance, in lieu of a furnished house, of £150—that was, in a round sum, £335 a-year for a chaplain for Dublin Castle. He was under the impression that the Lord Lieutenant for the time being must necessarily be a Protestant and a member of the Church of England, and the chaplain presumably would be a member of the same Church. This was a charge, therefore, for the appointment, in a Catholic country, and where the Church of England had been disestablished, and which was maintained out of the taxes upon a Catholic population, of a chaplain—to which appointment a member of the same faith as the great majority of the people was not eligible. This appointment of a chaplain to the Lord Lieutenant, from which Roman Catholics were excluded, was a remnant from the days when the ecclesiastical supremacy of the majority of the people of this country was maintained in Ireland. He objected, therefore, to this pay to the chaplain to the Castle of Dublin; and the "reading clerk," of course, would come under the same condemnation, as did also the organist, the master of the chair, and the keeper of the chapel. He did not know whether it was necessary to refer to the item of £1,562 for Queen's Plates to be run for in Ireland. He fancied that those who derived any benefit from these Plates did not belong to the great bulk of the people of Ireland; but as objection was not raised to a similar item in the Scotch Vote, he would not oppose this particular item. He regretted that it would not be in Order, according to the ruling of the Chairman, to discuss the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant in connection with the household provided for him by the House. His official residence—the Castle—had over its gates the emblem of Justice, and it was remarkably well placed, for its back was turned to the people.

MR. LEAMY said, the Committee had heard a great deal about the Ulster King-at-Arms; could the Chief Secretary give any information about another official, the "Kettle Drummer," and could he also say what were the duties of the "Serjeant of the Riding House?"

MR. HEALY said, he should like to ask a question with regard to some enclosures in Phoenix Park, and he thought the inquiry would properly come under this Vote. Why was it that the "swells" of Dublin, and none but those connected with the Castle, were allowed intakes from the Park for cricket and other purposes?

THE CHAIRMAN: This question would apply to a Vote which has been passed, Class I.

MR. HEALY said, of course, if it was out of Order he would not put the question; but he thought that the Committee, being now upon the Vote for Household Expenditure, this matter would come under it.

THE CHAIRMAN: No; it is not in the Vote at all.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, as to the inquiry of the hon. Member for Waterford, the office of "Serjeant of the Riding House" was instituted in 1843, with a salary of £30 a-year, in lieu of the appointment of a Master of the Riding House, with a salary of £200. The "Kettle Drummer" was the only remnant of a band of a drummer and six trumpeters appointed in the days of Charles II. He received £61, and when the present holder of the office died the question of renewing the appointment would be re-considered.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. HEALY said, he should be glad to know if the Chief Secretary could inform him by whose instructions were the intakes from the Park in the neighbourhood of the Castle made, and whether they were permitted in favour of others besides those having connection with the Castle? He would also like to know if the state of friction still continued between the Veterinary authorities and the Lord Lieutenant with regard to the sale of milk? Formerly, the Lord Lieutenant sold his milk and his cabbages, and the result was that the Veterinary authorities of Dublin insisted that there should be the usual inspection, and the Vice-regal milk was for a time stopped. Did that state of things exist now, or had an Order in Council exempted Phoenix Park from that veterinary inspection, which was insisted upon in respect to other dealers in milk and keepers of cows?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, as to the first question, it had been ruled by the Chairman as not being pertinent to the Vote. If the hon. Member would give Notice of a Question on the subject, he would endeavour to answer. As regarded the other point, he had heard of no state of friction, and he was not aware that the Lord Lieutenant sold milk and cabbages.

MR. HEALY said, his Predecessor did.

MR. FINDLATER said, he must protest against the idea that the people of Dublin had any wish for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy. He had been a citizen of Dublin for 40 years, and had every means of knowing that the views of the citizens were quite the reverse of those that had been put forward by hon. Members, who, after all, were not Dublin ratepayers.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was not prepared to dispute the statement of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) that a large proportion of the population of Dublin were in favour of the maintenance of the Lord Lieutenant. This would be found to be the case in the neighbourhood of every centre of the aristocracy. The small shopkeeping class in every village set more value upon the small amount of their sales to landlords and land agents than on all their other business. The same was the case in Dublin. All those who obtained custom from the Castle, or who got invitations to State balls or ceremonies, or who were on terms with those who were sometimes invited, or who got employment directly or indirectly with regard to matters of this sort—all these were exceedingly anxious there should be no change. The vanity of women also showed itself in connection with the Castle ceremonies. But all this was what he objected to. Any political spirit that was displayed in other parts of Ireland never found moral support in the capital of the country; but, on the contrary, there were always objections and adverse criticisms from the parties in place, and those under their influence. Another objection to the present system was that the class of persons he had referred to—the genteel and semi-genteel people of Dublin—instilled into the ears of the Lord Lieutenant the most absurd and erroneous ideas as to the wants and wishes of the Irish people. Any good intentions he might have had no support. The Lord Lieutenant and the Government in Dublin were so earwiggled by the shopocracy and the professional classes that they were misled as to what was desirable and what ought to be done for the good of the Irish people. Then he was justified as a taxpayer—as an Imperial taxpayer—in objecting to a Vote of this kind; and he did object to the Vote as a whole, and without reference to special items, though he did specially to the item for Ulster King at Arma, though the right hon. Gentleman very skilfully referred to the fees that some parties paid to this official. Why not leave him to the support he received from this source? Of course, if there was to be a Lord Lieutenant at all, he must have a household; but what was wanted was to get rid of the Lord Lieutenant and his household with him. It seemed to him that English and Scotch Members ought to assist Members from Ireland in getting rid of an unreasonable and anomalous expenditure, just as Irish Members would assist in putting an end to a useless expenditure in Edinburgh or elsewhere. He could not understand why English Members should insist on voting for expenditure for matters which were, in his opinion, at least, most unreasonable. Of the Lord Lieutenant himself he knew nothing, except that his name appeared as the signature to warrants for consigning prisoners to gaol. Nothing seemed to be known practically as to his abilities or capabilities; he seemed to be a mere blind tool in the hands of wire-pullers, beyond which he did nothing. Surrounding him the Lord Lieutenant had secretaries and a staff of clerks; but it seemed an absurd thing that he should require this array of clerks, aides-de-camp, Steward of the Household, Gentlemen Ushers, and so on. All these were matters for which a Vote should not be asked, and he considered he was only doing his duty in refusing such a Vote. All these things had a tendency to demoralize and corrupt the genteel and semi-genteel population of Ireland, and the trading classes, who hoped to get occupation in connection with these offices. They lessened the influence of Members of Parliament and of public opinion, and encouraged a great amount of mischief, and, on the other side, not a word had been said in defence by the Chief Secretary.

MR. CALLAN said, he was not surprised that the Lord Lieutenant had not received any defence, because he believed that, if out of Office, the Chief Secretary would join with the political section to which he belonged in seeking to abolish the office, the Four Courts of Dublin, and every distinction that distinguished the capital of Ireland from the position of a provincial town such as Manchester or Liverpool. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) did not represent the mass of the educated opinion of Ireland, for that mass was in favour of retaining the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, and with an increased brilliancy, if possible. It was regarded as one of the land marks of Irish Nationality. ["No, no!"] He had his own opinion as a Nationalist, and had expressed it before many of those who interrupted him were known in the political world. He looked upon this Lord Lieutenancy as a golden link to the Crown, and he looked forward to the time when instead of being a mere appanage to the Crown, one of the Princes of the Blood Royal would assume the office of Lord Lieutenant, and a son of Her Majesty open a Parliament in Dublin composed of Representatives of the opinions of the country. Those who had a stake in the country and were anxious for their country's prosperity wished to see that day, and he hoped to see it yet, though he was not so sanguine as he was some half-a-dozen years ago. But as to what had been said of the opinion of Dublin, if that alone were favourable to the retention of the office of Lord Lieutenant, it would not merit much consideration, for Dublin was not the capital of Ireland so much as it was the capital of the flunkeyism of the country, and he would wish to remove the office of Lord Lieutenant from the dingy gilding that now surrounded it and to brighten it into a real Royal Court. He should vote for the retention of the Vote if the Amendment was intended as an expression of opinion against the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

MR. REDMOND said, he thought it was the duty of Irish Members to offer strenuous opposition to Votes which were asked for for the maintenance of institutions which they believed prejudicial to the true interests of the country. He believed that the institution of Lord Lieutenant was altogether bad. It formed in Ireland a centre for the demoralization of the whole country. Those who represented the feelings and aspirations of the people had too much reason to look with despair upon Dublin, because every national movement, every outcome of national sentiment from the Irish people met with opposition always directed from Dublin. What the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) said with respect to the opinion of Dublin was no doubt strictly correct, and no doubt that opinion was in favour of the retention of this institution. It was but natural that it should be so, and the institution itself had created such an amount of national demoralization and national degradation in Dublin as was quite sufficient to account for the opinion. What the state of Dublin society was could be gathered from the descriptions of Charles Lever and others, and it was known that Dublin society was made up of men who had no right whatever to pose as the gentry of the country. Public opinion in Dublin had grown corrupt under Castle influences, and that was why the opinion of Dublin was in favour of an institution which the rest of Ireland viewed with strong dislike; and those who desired to see this influence abolished were determined that the Vote should not be carried without a full expression of opinion upon it. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) had gratified his wish to stand up as the only Member on those Benches to say a word in favour of the maintenance of this institution. He was within his right in expressing his opinion; but the distinction he had gained was not to be envied, for there was no question that throughout Ireland the vast majority of the people were bitterly hostile to this institution. Dublin was the rallying point of anti-national opinion; Dublin opinion was demoralized and corrupt, and there could be no thoroughly healthy national life there until the officialism of the Castle and its evil traditions were entirely swept away. There were many reasons that made him anxious to oppose this Vote, and he hoped that the opposition would be carried to a division. Amongst other reasons, because the Lord Lieutenant, whose existence as such was called in question upon this Vote, was the ostensible mode of carrying into effect the tyrannical coercive laws. The only reason why he seemed to have any existence in Ireland was because his name should appear at the foot of warrants issued in Ireland for the purpose of incarcerating men against whom no crime was alleged, men who ever commanded the respect and esteem of their fellows. But he would not infringe upon the Chairman's ruling; and he sincerely trusted that on a subsequent Vote there might be a more legitimate raising of the questions attaching to the office, as well as others in connection with the Gentleman who filled the ill-starred office of Chief Secretary. On this Vote he would say nothing further, and he hoped a division would be taken if only to show that the hon. Members for Monaghan and Louth did not share the opinions of the majority of Irish Representatives.

Mr. Callan

MR. FINIGAN said, he had not heard one reasonable argument in support of the Vote, but many why the opposition should be continued. He disputed altogether that there was any justice in supporting a Vote of this large sum of money annually, to maintain a foreign Household in the capital of Ireland.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 4th August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Ecclesiastical Courts Regulation * (201); Superannuation (Post Office and Works) *
(203).

Committee—Land Law (Ireland) (187); Removal
Terms (Scotland) * (184).

Committee—Report—Presumption of Life (Scotland) * (197).

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 187.)

(The Lord Privy Seal.)

COMMITTEE. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

LORD DENMAN rose to move, as an Amendment, that the House do resolve itself into Committee on that day six months. He (Lord Denman) had read and written out all the Amendments upon the Bill, so that he did not hastily condemn the measure; but he was sure that litigation might be increased by it, and an appeal to the House of Lords had been proposed as an Amendment.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE rose to Order, observing that it would be irregular to enter into a discussion of the Amendments at that stage of the Bill.

LORD DENMAN remarked, that he was often interrupted in that House, and referred to his Protest of 12th July, 1880, in which he showed how Lord Denboyne, an Irish Peer, had been prevented from speaking on the Irish Land Bill. He went on to allude to 1844, when three noble and learned Lords, all pupils of a most eminent Special Pleader (Mr. Tidd), had overruled Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham on the O'Connell case, and reminded their Lordships that, although from an irregularity as to the jury, the defendant (O'Connell) escaped eight out of 12 months of imprisonment, and a fine of £5,000, yet the law was vindicated. He also alluded to 1846, when his noble and learned Relative had proposed clauses for the Protection of Life Bill, empowering the Lord Lieutenant and Magistrates to bind accused parties over to keep the peace; and as it was in that year deemed safe to throw out the Protection of Life Bill, so he thought the present Ministry, having a Coercion Bill and an Arms Bill, might well dispense with this Bill. He feared that he might be alone, like the Father of Lentulus, when he voted against buying off the Gauls with gold; but he could not willingly go on with this Bill, full of such sweeping changes as were devised by it, and concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the motion ("on this day six months.")—(The Lord Denman.)

On question, that ("now") stand part of the motion, resolved in the affirmative.

House in Committee accordingly.

PART I.

ORDINARY CONDITIONS OF TENANCIES.

Clause 1 (Sale of tenancies).

LORD WAVENEY moved, in page 1, line 20, after the word ("thereof") to insert—

("Provided always, that in defect of agreement it shall be lawful for the landlord to present for the approval of the Commissioners the purchaser whose holding shall be considered most advantageous to the estate by reason of contiguity.")

The noble Lord said, the object of the Amendment was that where two persons were willing to purchase a particular lot, the landlord should have the power of making the selection most advantageous to the estate. No damage would be done to the tenant in the circumstances.

LORD HARLECH said, he was glad that this Amendment had been moved by an Ulster landlord who was in favour of tenant right. The principle was a good one, because where consolidation could be effected within certain limits it was a most advantageous thing both for landlord and tenant.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Amendment had been carefully considered by the Government, and he could assure the noble Lord behind him that it would be quite unnecessary, because the Bill did not contemplate, nor would the Court require, directions as to a presentation of this kind. The matter would be found to work itself satisfactorily out in practice.

[First Night.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Amendment was absolutely unnecessary. If the landlord objected, on reasonable grounds, to any proposed purchaser, his objection would receive effect; and if he choose to exercise his own right of pre-emption, the uncontrolled selection of a new tenant would rest with him.

Amendment negatived.

LORD DUNSANY moved to amend sub-section 4, by providing that where the tenant "shall agree" to sell his tenancy to some other person than the landlord, he should inform the landlord of the name of the purchaser, and state therewith the amount of the consideration agreed to be given for the tenancy. The words of the clause were, "where a tenant has agreed," and that, he thought, was rather indefinite. If a tenant, either through inadvertance, or from any other cause, did not give notice at all to his landlord that he had sold his farm to any other person, the sale was not null and void, as one might naturally suppose it would be, but it simply became voidable. As the clause now stood, the landlord had no right of pre-emption whatever.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 21, leave out ("has agreed") and insert ("shall agree.")—(The Lord Dunsany.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he did not think that the dangers apprehended by the noble Lord would arise; but he (Lord Carlingford) thought they might trust the Commission with a matter of this kind, since the determination of other matters of greater importance was left to their discretion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked by what possibility a sale could be allowed to stand if there had been no notice given to the landlord?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if the landlord did not object, no harm could be done. He would not be bound to admit the purchaser as a tenant, unless he had received the proper notice.

THE EARL OF DERBY asked whether he was right in concluding from the clause, as it now stood, that a sale might be valid of which no notice had been given to the landlord?

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asked a similar question, observing that the matter involved other interests of the landlord besides his right of pre-emption.

EARL CAIRNS said, he thought the point of considerable importance, as the landlord would not always wish to exercise his right of pre-emption, but would sometimes prefer that the purchaser should be the owner of the adjacent holding, or some other desirable person.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN suggested that a difficulty would arise if the tenant sold his interest without notice to the landlord and then left the country.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the Government did not differ on the real point, only as to the method of procedure, and therefore the Government would accept the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the better way would be to insert the words "in writing," so as to secure that the notice should be given in writing.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, in page 2, line 5, after ("court,")

("Provided that the landlords objection shall be conclusive in the case of any tenancy in a holding where the improvements in respect of which, if made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, the tenant would have been entitled to be compensated under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, have been made by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and not by the tenant or his predecessors in title.")

The noble Duke said, the Amendment was, to his mind, of considerable importance, although, perhaps, it might not be apparent at first sight. They had now, by reading the Bill a second time, assented to its principle, and he could assure his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal that he should neither move nor vote for any Amendment which, in his opinion, was in derogation of the main principle and purpose of the Bill. As their Lordships had voted for the second reading of the Bill, this was the only just and straightforward mode of proceeding. What he considered the main principle of the Bill was this—that every tenant in Ireland should have the power afforded of re-valuation; and, in the second place, that every tenant in Ireland, with but few exceptions, should have the power of sale. He had already stated at considerable length his objections to this power of sale, and he would now say what might be urged in its favour. He thought it was absolutely just in all cases where, by the custom of the country, the tenant had it, and in all cases in which, without the custom of the country, the tenant could pay for it. He admitted that probably the power of sale might be the most convenient form in which the tenant could be repaid for improvements, and as a large proportion of the tenantry of Ireland had done the improvements, it was the most proper form; and he fully admitted that the power of sale mitigated very much the harshness of eviction. In the case of the very smallest class of tenantry, though he thought the power of sale in their case was, perhaps, the most mischievous, yet incidentally it might have the advantage of enabling the wealthier tenant buying out the poorer one, and thus, to some extent, consolidating the property. On those grounds, he agreed there was much to be said for the power of sale. He did not intend by his Amendment to touch the power of sale in any of the cases to which those arguments applied. Having stated the arguments in favour of free sale, he thought his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal would admit he had stated them fairly, and he would remind the House of one of the strongest objections to that power. In the Report of the Bessborough Commission, in one of the few passages with which he entirely concurred, this statement occurred—

"The right of free sale, even more than fixity of tenure, interferes with a landlord's right of control over his property in respect of his power to choose the tenants by whom he is surrounded, and to surround himself by those whom he prefers."

And in another paragraph they pointed out the consequences of this, and they said—

"Except for main drainage and similar improvements on a large scale which may be undertaken by the landlord as a commercial speculation, the result of depriving them of the settlement of sale must eminently be to discourage still further, if not to extinguish, every expenditure upon the soil."

That was a definite objection; and surely the Government would admit that, in cases where none of the arguments for free sale applied, it was a most unreasonable thing to apply this power to the destruction of the landlord's sentiment of ownership. His Amendment applied solely to cases where landlords had, at some time or other, either by themselves or their predecessors in title, executed all the improvements, as was generally the case in England and in Scotland. He must press this Amendment on the Government, because the Government had admitted that this Bill referred to a most exceptional state of things, and Mr. Gladstone had expressly said that he hopefully looked forward to the time when Ireland would be able to arrive at a healthier state of things. Then, why shut the door to a healthier state of things? In cases where landlords had executed all the improvements, for any sake, let them retain that sentiment of ownership, out of which the whole zeal for agricultural improvements had its rise. No man could pretend that this Amendment was contrary to the principles of the Bill. This matter, he thought, was even more important in the future than in the present. As regarded the efficiency of this clause in the future, the Government professed to desire that a great number of persons would buy land in Ireland. Supposing a number of tenants bought their farms and made all the improvements as it was expected they would do, some circumstances, say, occurred which prevented the farmer continuing his residence there—as, for instance, sickness—and he desired to let it to some person whom they chose. Now, under the Bill as it stood, they could not do this without the next day the chance of this tenant selling the tenancy to some other person. He hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 5, after ("court") insert—("Provided that the landlords objection shall be conclusive in the case of any tenancy in a holding where the improvements in respect of which, if made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, the tenant would have been entitled to be compensated under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, have been made by the landlord or his predecessors in title, and not by the tenant or his predecessors in title.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

LORD CARLINGFORD sympathised with a good deal which had been said by the noble Duke, and it had given him a great deal of pleasure to hear him recognize some, at least, of the advantages which they believed would arise from the sale of the tenant's interest. At the same time, he was not convinced by the noble Duke that this Amendment was a necessary one. It would, he thought, in respect to the present state of things, have a very narrow operation indeed. If it were to be adopted, he should ask that the words "substantially maintained" should be inserted with reference to the improvements, because it was obviously possible that improvements might have been made by the landlord 50 years ago, but maintained ever since by a long succession of tenants, in which case, of course, the exemption should not apply. But, setting that aside, what he said was, that in the existing state of things in Ireland cases in which landlords could possibly take advantage of this provision were of so rare occurrence that he did not think it advisable to create such an exception to the general system of tenure which the Government thought ought to be applied to the country, and this all the more, seeing that when a landlord expended money in improvements it was open to him to raise the rent of the holding in order to compensate himself for his outlay. He objected, also, to the mode in which his noble Friend proposed to proceed, inasmuch as direct exemption from the Act was preferable to this indirect exemption. He would not, however, put their Lordships to the trouble of going into the Lobby on the question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Does the noble Lord accept the Amendment, then?

LORD CARLINGFORD: No; but we will not go into the Lobby on it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Why does my noble Friend not answer my arguments? He has said nothing against this Amendment whatever, and I am very much afraid that his real objection is this—that it is an unpopular idea in Ireland that the landlord should ever improve his own land. He rather wishes to discourage than to encourage the improvement of the land by the landlords of Ireland. I shall certainly divide the Committee.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM supported the Amendment, contending that, as the Bill stood, confiscation of landlords' improvements would follow.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if the landlord had not charged a fair rent, having regard to his improvements, this ought to be—and he had no doubt would be—taken into account. Then, with respect to future improvements, it was distinctly provided, that if, after the rent had been fixed, improvements were made by agreement between the landlord and the tenant, there might be an additional rent charged in respect of them. He, therefore, greatly doubted whether it was wise, in the interests of those who approved of the proposal, to insist upon this Amendment. The landlords had already, let them remember, the means of compensating themselves for their outlay on improvements. If the Amendment were to be adopted, he suggested that after the reference to the Act of 1870 there be inserted the qualifying phrase "as amended by this Act." But, while he suggested this, he must point out that it would not be wise to place tenants on estates where the landlords made the improvements in a worse position than that occupied by other tenants.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had no objection to accept the words suggested; but he must direct attention to the argument of his noble and learned Friend. It was said that they should not place the tenant of a holding on which the improvements were made by the landlord in a worse position than the tenant of a farm where the landlord did not make the improvements. His reply to this was that the Bill itself placed the one tenant in a worse position than the other, and that, therefore, the argument for uniformity at once fell to the ground.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD suggested that the requirement of the Amendment should not be that all the improvements should be made by the proprietor. If this requirement were kept in, then the tenant might, by erecting a pigstye, throw the entire clause out of gear, for then it would not, of course, be possible to say that all the improvements had been made by the tenant.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY pointed out that the suggestion of the noble Marquess introduced quite a new element, because what it really amounted to was that they should exempt from the operation of the Bill farms on which some of the improvements had been made by the tenant, and some by the landlord. If they begun with a pigstye, they introduced an element of doubt into the whole matter.

Lord Carlingford

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: That matter would be left to the Court to decide—that is, whether the improvements were permanent or not, and whether they had been made by the landlord—whether, in fact, the estate had been managed after the English system.

THE DUKE OF LEINSTER was understood to oppose the Amendment.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE pointed out that amongst permanent improvements was main drainage, and if it were not kept up, all other improvements would be valueless. The landlord made this improvement.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved, in page 2, line 5, after ("court,") to insert—

("The landlord's objection shall be conclusive where the Ulster tenant right custom, or the benefit of the usage corresponding to such custom, has been purchased or acquired by the landlord or his predecessors in title.")

Cases of the purchase by a landlord of the tenant's interest were by no means so rare as had been thought. He had made inquiry both within and outside Ulster, and had collected a number of cases which occupied seven pages. There were several cases in county Down; at least eight cases in county Armagh. In Antrim £4,500 had been given by a landlord for the tenant right in 116 acres, £1,200 for that right in 60 acres, £700 in 170 acres, £110 in 16 acres, and £1,500 in 72 acres. Outside Ulster he found that a gentleman in Queen's County had bought up the tenant's interest in 14 farms. He had been asked whether the landlords in such cases had not increased the rent in proportion to the sum given for the tenant right? He had made inquiry, and had been informed that in some cases possibly there might have been some increase; that in certain cases there had been none at all; and that in no instance had the rent been unreasonably increased. He was of opinion that where the landlord had acquired the tenant right he should be freed from liability under the Act; and, therefore, he moved the present Amendment.

Amendment moved,

in page 2, line 5, after ("court,") insert—("The landlord's objection shall be conclusive where the Ulster tenant right custom, or the benefit of the usage corresponding to such custom, has been purchased or acquired by the landlord or his predecessors in title.")—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the noble Earl had not been able to show that there were many cases to which his Amendment would apply.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: Sixty-five.

LORD CARLINGFORD: In the whole Province of Ulster?

THE EARL OF BELMORE: Sixty-eight.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would not dwell upon that, as he did not rest on this contention. The Government were quite unable to accept the Amendment. The provision of the Land Act of 1870 was that when the Ulster tenant right custom was bought up by the landlords that custom ceased to attach to the holding in which it had been bought; but the Act went on to say that all the general provisions of the law should apply to the holding just as they applied to every other holding in Ireland. That was the principle of the present Bill. The noble Earl was proposing that to such cases the general provisions of the Bill should not attach. The landlord in such cases looked upon the purchase money of the tenant's interest as an investment. If he had not increased the rent so as to pay a return on that investment the Government could not help him as to the past; but he would be entitled to raise it for the future. The landlord could not be paid in these cases both ways, both by an increase of rent and a return of the capital sum invested.

EARL CAIRNS said, it was very difficult and dangerous to be certain as to what this Bill meant; but he was under the impression that that which the Lord Privy Seal said could be done could not be done. He understood the noble Lord to say that any money paid for the tenant right by the landlord would be recouped by increasing the rent. On Monday night the noble Lord assured the House, in the most solemn way, that the sum paid for the tenant right had nothing to do with the rent, that they were drawn up on parallel lines, and had nothing to do with each other. The Act of 1870 declared that where the landlord had purchased or acquired the benefit of such a usage as the Ulster Custom, the holding should not thence-forward be subject to such usage. But now, in 1881, this Bill came in and said that all over Ireland the tenant might sell that which in the interval the landlord had purchased with his money, and on the strength of an Act of Parliament. The number of landlords who had purchased in this way was, no doubt, small; but the principle was very important. He had never before known an instance where Parliament had been so openly asked to violate the most solemn engagements. It was said that the landlord could recoup himself by raising the rent, which, in consideration of the other elements of the Bill, was, in effect, saying—"If you are a landlord, recoup yourself by raising your rent; if you are a tenant, the way to recoup yourself is to get your rent lowered." He trusted that by this Amendment, or by some similar means, those unfortunate persons who had spent many thousands of pounds on their estates would be protected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the objection of the noble and learned Earl was more apparent than real as applied to this Bill. If the tenant's interest was bought by the landlord, he was entitled to charge interest in the shape of additional rent against the tenant; and that, no doubt, was what took place. But, apart from this purchase, what the tenant had to sell was his own; it did not belong to the landlord. ["Oh!"] His improvements were his own, and would it be contended that the landlord had a right to dispose of them? The Ulster tenant right depended upon custom on estates in Ulster, which settled the terms between landlord and tenant in many ways which deviated from the particular provisions in this Bill, under which the right of sale was given generally in Ireland. The Ulster Custom remained; and the new law being extended over all the country, it was difficult to see any sound reason for this Amendment, which would seem to suggest that those who had bought the tenant's goodwill in Ulster were to be regarded as more unjustly treated than those who never were subjected to the Ulster Custom.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, if any person came before the noble and learned Lord and proposed to escape from engagements solemnly entered upon on the reasons he had alleged, the proposition would be repelled with expressions of indignation. What the landlord bought up under the Act of 1870 was not the tenant's improvements; it was the Ulster tenant right custom. The landlord had acted under that which the Government had systematically despised and trampled under foot in this Bill, and the extent of which they appeared to have forgotten. What induced the landlords to pay up the Ulster Custom was the sentiment of ownership—the desire to be masters of their own estates, and that was the thing which Parliament solemnly guaranteed to them. Now, the noble and learned Lord said that it was a sufficient fulfilment of the promise—sufficient compensation—that the landlords should have the power which they then had of raising the rent to any extent which the tenants would pay. The sentiment of ownership was the thing which was bought up, and no proposals to give any additional rent were a fulfilment of the contract which Parliament had made. He earnestly hoped their Lordships would honour the signature of Parliament in this respect, and would not allow it to be dishonoured by accepting the proposal of the Government.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN observed, that no landlord could raise his rent without rendering himself unpopular; and, therefore, the suggestion that he could do so in order to compensate himself for the loss of the tenant right was impracticable.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the assumption of the Government appeared to be that a landlord in the case where he had bought up the Ulster tenant custom would be able to recoup himself by raising the rent; but there was this paradox attaching to the Ulster right, that in dealing with it they could not say that two and two made four. The tenant right and the landlord's fee simple together made a sum far in excess of the selling or letting value of the farm as a whole. In a case in which the landlord's interest might be worth 25 years' purchase, and the tenant right worth 25 years' purchase, the landlord could not charge additional rent representing the interest on the sum paid by him. The purchases made by landlords, though few in number, had not been made as commercial speculations, but had been made in order to liberate the holdings from a custom the operation of which they believed to be detrimental to their estates. The purchases had been made by the landlords in order to give them the power of dealing with their land as they thought proper, and exercising freedom in the selection of their tenants. It was a great injustice when, on the invitation of Parliament, landlords had bought the tenant right with these objects, that Parliament should turn round upon them and tell them that the money they had invested had been expended in vain.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY said, it was impossible that any private person could find out the number of cases that had occurred. He had purchased tenant rights and also made improvements. The injustice proposed to be done was analogous to a tradesman claiming the payment of an account for the second time.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he was of opinion that the tenant's improvements would be invaded by the introduction of this Amendment.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he thought the case was hardly met by the Amendment before them.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that if this Amendment were accepted one of his own, which followed, would be useless. It had the same object, but would, he believed, attain it in a better form. He denied that the landlords had increased their rent by an amount corresponding to the sum spent on the purchase of the tenant right. On the contrary, they had in repeated cases reduced their rent. He contended that there had been no recouping on the part of the landlord. The tenant being allowed the power of sale which the Bill gave him, the landlord should be entitled to prove to the Court that he had laid out a certain sum of money that he had not been recouped, which, as a matter of common honesty, should come out of the purchase money. The form of his Amendment to give effect to this view seemed to be more consistent with the provisions of the Bill than the Amendment now before them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY considered that it would be quite possible to pass both Amendments, but recommended the withdrawal of the Amendment of the noble Earl (the Earl of Balmore) if the Committee thought that that of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) would come more within the scope of the Bill.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, in page 2, line 28, after ("tenancy,") to insert—

("Where before the passing of this Act the landlord or any of his predecessors in title has purchased or acquired the Ulster tenant right custom or the benefit of a usage corresponding to the Ulster tenant right custom to which any holding was subject, and such holding has in pursuance of section one or section two of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, ceased to be subject to such custom or usage; or

("Where before the passing of this Act the landlord or any of his predecessors in title has purchased or acquired the right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding, and where the tenant or any of his predecessors in title have been paid the consideration for such purchase or acquisition either by payment of a sum of money, or by a corresponding abatement of rent, or where the tenant or any of his predecessors since such purchase or acquisition is or are not proved to have paid money or given money's worth with the express or implied consent of the landlord or any of his predecessors in title on account of becoming the tenant of such holding; and

("The tenancy in such holding is sold for the first time after the passing of this Act, the landlord shall be entitled to apply to the Court to have paid to him out of the purchase moneys of the tenancy the sum which he can prove to the satisfaction of the Court to have been paid by him or his predecessors in title by way of consideration for the purchase or acquisition of the Ulster tenant right custom or of the benefit of such usage or of any right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding; subject nevertheless to any deduction which the Court may deem just in respect of any money received by the landlord or his predecessors in title by way of fine, increased rent, or otherwise on account of the sum so paid as aforesaid.")

The noble Duke wished to say, as one of those who were responsible for the Act of 1870, that he felt that there was an absolute contract between Parliament and those landlords in Ireland who purchased land under it. As a matter of common honour and honesty, and not as a question of policy, he held that they had no right to violate that contract. But he admitted to the Lord Chancellor and to the Members of the Government that if before this new Triumvirate, which was invested with the power not of valuing rent, but of re-distributing the property in Ireland—if before that High Commission, vested with such powers of disposing of the property of every man in Ireland, the tenant could prove that he had recouped the sum paid for the tenant right, then he admitted that the contract might be departed from; but unless that could be shown, he contended they would be guilty of a direct and violent breach of contract. He entirely dissented from what was stated on this subject by his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor the other night, and he maintained that he was perfectly accurate when he said that this Bill would give the tenant power to sell what was not his own. From that injustice, he was sorry to say, they could not wholly escape. However, they might in some way mitigate the injustice. There were hundreds of landlords in Ireland who had allowed their tenants to sit at a far lower rent than could have been exacted from them, for the purpose of keeping out the power of sale. Their Lordships swallowed a great deal when they swallowed this proposal for indiscriminate sale by the tenant of tenant right; but he could not swallow the proposal to break faith with those who had purchased property in Ireland under the solemn guarantee of Parliament. In moving his Amendment he was perfectly willing, as was distinctly stated in it, to take the opinion of the new Court which had been set up as to whether or not the landlord had been recouped for what it was now proposed to dispossess him of; but, for his own part, he regarded the Triumvirate as a barbarous convention of a barbarous condition of things.

[First Night.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not for a moment call in question the motives which influenced the noble Duke in proposing the Amendment, nor did he deny that there was a good deal in the considerations his noble Friend had advanced; but the adjustment of this question upon principles of absolute justice under the Bill was a more difficult matter than the noble Duke seemed to be aware of. He would not repeat the arguments he had used before, but would only say that they were merely removing impediments which previously existed by law to a man taking his own goodwill and his own improvements to the most available market. The latter part of the Amendment appeared to be quite just; but as for the other part he would ask, By whom was the landlord to be repaid? Not by the person who had received the money from him, but by the existing tenant, whether he had been a short or a long time in occupation, and whether he had derived profit from it or not. If the view taken by his noble

The Duke of Argyll

Friend of the Act of 1870 was sound, it would rather follow, that it might be the duty of Parliament to make compensation. He could understand the argument that a man who had sold the tenant right and received money for it should repay the landlord; but he could not understand why a man who had derived no benefit from the transaction should be called upon to do so.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that his noble and learned Friend's argument was a good deal inconsistent with the preceding provision of his own Bill, which said that where permanent improvements were made by the landlord the landlord should be recouped. The only difference between the cases was that in the one instance the landlord had spent his money in making improvements, in the other in purchasing the tenant right. But in both cases he had spent his money. If the Amendment was not accepted a tenant who had only been in the farm some six months might sell something that was really not his own.

EARL CAIRNS said, the fallacy of the noble and learned Lord was this—he assumed that the person who was at present in possession had a property in the tenant right. But these holdings were different from others, in that they had stamped upon them a distinct character by Parliament, which declared that they should not be subject to tenant right, as formerly they were. By this Bill they were going to say that those holdings should be put up to see what some person would give for the tenant right. It was a fallacy to say that that money belonged to the tenant in possession. It rather belonged to the landlord, who had bought the tenant right by Act of Parliament.

On question? (leave being given to the Earl GRANVILLE to vote in the House) Their Lordships divided:—Contents 219; Not-Contents 67: Majority 152.

CONTENTS.

| | |
|----------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| Canterbury, L. Archp. | Marlborough, D. |
| York, L. Archp. | Norfolk, D. |
| | Northumberland, D. |
| Beaufort, D. | Richmond, D. |
| Buckingham and Chandos, D. | Somerset, D. |
| Cleveland, D. | Sutherland, D. |
| Grafton, D. | Wellington, D. |
| Leeds, D. | |
| Manchester, D. | Abercorn, M. (D. Abercorn.) |

Abergavenny, M.
 Bath, M.
 Bristol, M.
 Exeter, M.
 Hertford, M.
 Lansdowne, M.
 Salisbury, M.
 Winchester, M.

Amherst, E.
 Annealey, E.
 Bandon, E.
 Bathurst, E.
 Beauchamp, E.
 Belmore, E.
 Bradford, E.
 Cadogan, E.
 Cairns, E.
 Caledon, E.
 Camperdown, E.
 Carnarvon, E.
 Chichester, E.
 Clonmell, E.
 Coventry, E.
 Dartrey, E.
 De La Warr, E.
 Denbigh, E.
 Derby, E.
 Devon, E.
 Doncaster, E. (D. Buccleuch and Queensberry.)
 Eldon, E.
 Ellesmere, E.
 Feversham, E.
 Fortescue, E.
 Gainsborough, E.
 Haddington, E.
 Hardwicke, E.
 Harewood, E.
 Ilchester, E.
 Jersey, E.
 Lanesborough, E.
 Lathom, E. [Teller.]
 Leven and Melville, E.
 Lindsey, E.
 Lovelace, E.
 Lucan, E.
 Lytton, E.
 Macclesfield, E.
 Mansfield, E.
 Manvers, E.
 Mar and Kellie, E.
 Minto, E.
 Morton, E.
 Mount Edgcumbe, E.
 Nelson, E.
 Onslow, E.
 Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
 Portarlington, E.
 Powis, E.
 Radnor, E.
 Ravensworth, E.
 Redesdale, E.
 Romney, E.
 Ross, E.
 Roslyn, E.
 Sandwich, E.
 Somers, E.
 Soudan, E.
 Stanhope, E.

Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.
 Suffolk and Berkshire, E.
 Verulam, E.
 Waldegrave, E.
 Winton, E. (E. Eglington.)
 Zetland, E.

Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)
 Cranbrook, V.
 Doneraile, V.
 Gough, V.
 Hardinge, V.
 Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
 Hereford, V.
 Hood, V.
 Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)
 Lifford, V.
 Melville, V.
 Sherbrooke, V.
 Sidmouth, V.
 Templetown, V.

St. Albans, L. Bp.

Abinger, L.
 Amherst, L. (V. Holmesdale.)
 Annaly, L.
 Ardilaun, L.
 Arundell of Wardour, L.
 Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)
 Aveland, L.
 Balfour of Burleigh, L.
 Bateman, L.
 Beaumont, L.
 Belper, L.
 Borthwick, L.
 Botreaux, L. (E. Loudoun.)
 Brabourne, L.
 Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
 Byron, L.
 Calthorpe, L.
 Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)
 Castlemaine, L.
 Chelmsford, L.
 Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)
 Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
 Clinton, L.
 Cloncurry, L.
 Colchester, L.
 Colville of Culross, L.
 Cottesloe, L.
 Crofton, L.
 De Freyne, L.
 De L'Isle and Dudley, L.
 De Mauley, L.
 Denman, L.
 de Ros, L.
 De Saumarez, L.
 Digby, L.
 Dinevor, L.

Donington, L.
 Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
 Dunsany, L.
 Ellenborough, L.
 Elphinstone, L.
 Emly, L.
 Ettrick, L. (L. Napier.)
 Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
 Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
 Grey de Radcliffe, L. (V. Grey de Wilton.)
 Hare, L. (E. Listowel.)
 Harlech, L.
 Hartismere, L. (L. Heniker.)
 Hatherton, L.
 Hay, L. (E. Kinnoul.)
 Heytesbury, L.
 Hylton, L.
 Inchiquin, L.
 Keane, L.
 Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
 Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
 Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
 Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.)
 Lamington, L.
 Lawrence, L.
 Leconfield, L.
 Lismore, L. (V. Lismore.)
 Lovat, L.
 Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
 Lyveden, L.
 Manners, L.
 Massy, L.
 Monteagle, L. (M. Sligo.)
 Monteagle of Brandon, L.
 Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)
 Napier, L.
 Northwick, L.
 Norton, L.
 O'Neill, L.
 Ormathwaite, L.

Ormonde, L. (M. Ormonde.)
 Penrhyn, L.
 Penzance, L.
 Plunket, L.
 Poltimore, L.
 Raglan, L.
 Ranfurly, L. (E. Ranfurly.)
 Rayleigh, L.
 Rodney, L.
 Rowton, L.
 Sackville, L.
 Salterford, L. (E. Courtown.)
 Saltoun, L.
 Scarsdale, L.
 Shute, L. (V. Barrington.)
 Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)
 Somerhill, L. (M. Clancricarde.)
 Somerton, L. (E. Normanton.)
 Stanley of Alderley, L.
 Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
 Stratheden and Campbell, L.
 Strathspey, L. (E. Seafield.)
 Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
 Talbot de Malahide, L.
 Templemore, L.
 Tollemache, L.
 Truro, L.
 Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)
 Ventry, L.
 Vernon, L.
 Vivian, L.
 Waveney, L.
 Wentworth, L.
 Westbury, L.
 Willoughby de Broke, L.
 Wimborne, L.
 Windsor, L.
 Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.)
 Devonshire, D.
 Westminster, D.
 Ailesbury, M.
 Northampton, M.

Airlie, E.
 Durham, E.
 Granville, E.
 Kimberley, E.
 Morley, E.
 Northbrook, E.
 Saint Germans, E.
 Spencer, E.
 Sydney, E.
 Yarborough, E.

Canterbury, V.
 Eversley, V.
 Falmouth, V.
 Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.)
 Torrington, V.

Exeter, L. Bp.

Aberdare, L.
 Amphill, L.
 Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.]
 Braye, L.
 Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.)
 Camoys, L.
 Carew, L.

[First Night.]

| | |
|---|---|
| Carlingford, L. | Monson, L. [Teller.] |
| Carrington, L. | Mostyn, L. |
| Clermont, L. | Mount Temple, L. |
| Clifford of Chudleigh, L. | O'Hagan, L. |
| Crewe, L. | Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.) |
| Dacre, L. | Ramsay, L. (E. Dalhousie.) |
| Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.) | Ribblesdale, L. |
| Fingall, E. (E. Fingall.) | Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.) |
| Foley, L. | Sandhurst, L. |
| Granard, L. (E. Granard.) | Saye and Sele, L. |
| Greville, L. | Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.) |
| Houghton, L. | Skene, L. (E. Fife.) |
| Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.) | Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.) |
| Kinnaird, L. | Sudeley, L. |
| Leigh, L. | Suffield, L. |
| Loftus, L. (M. Ely.) | ThurLOW, L. |
| Lyttelton, L. | Vaux of Harrowden, L. |
| Methuen, L. | Wolverton, L. |
| Monck, L. (V. Monck.) | Wrottesley, L. |
| Moncreiff, L. | |

Amendment agreed to.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL moved, in page 2, line 34, after ("tenancy,") to insert—

("Or for moneys payable to the landlord under the preceding sub-section in respect of the purchase or acquisition by the landlord or his predecessors in title of the Ulster tenant right custom or the benefit of such usage, or of any right of sale of the tenant's interest in such holding.")

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CAIRNS moved to insert, in page 3, line 30, after ("usage,") the following words:—

"(14.) Where a sale of a tenancy is made under a judgment or other process of law against the tenant, or for the payment of the debts of the deceased tenant, the sale shall be deemed to be made by the tenant, and shall be made in the prescribed manner and subject to the conditions of this section."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR objected to the Amendment on the ground that the Bill, as it stood, did not interfere with the ordinary process of law.

EARL CAIRNS wished to know whether the Government, after creating this right of sale, intended to allow a judgment creditor to put up a holding for sale, and thereby to deprive the landlord of all the safeguards which were thrown over the right in the previous part of the section? If so, any tenant who wanted to get rid of those safeguards would only have to allow a collusive execution to be taken out against him.

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CAIRNS moved to insert—

("Any sum payable to the landlord out of the purchase moneys of the tenancy under this section shall be a first charge upon the purchase moneys.")

Amendment agreed to.

EARL CAIRNS moved the following Amendment:—

"(15.) A landlord, on receiving notice of an intended sale of the tenancy, may, if he is not desirous of purchasing the tenancy otherwise than as a means of securing the payment of any sums due to him for arrears of rent or other breaches of the contract or conditions of tenancy, give notice within the prescribed time of the sum claimed by him in respect of such arrears and breaches, such sum failing agreement between the landlord and tenant to be determined by the Court, and may claim to purchase the tenancy for such sum if no purchaser is found to give the same or a greater sum; and the landlord, if no purchaser be found within the prescribed time to give the same or a greater sum, shall be adjudged the purchaser of the tenancy at that sum."

The noble and learned Earl said, there was no doubt that the Bill gave to the landlord the right of pre-emption of tenancy on any occasion of sale, and there were many cases in which the right would be exercised; but he was bound to say that he did not think, as a general rule, the landlord would be desirous of purchasing the tenancy, and thus enter into a controversy with the tenant as to the value of the tenancy. The consequence would be that the occasions would be few on which the landlord would buy the tenancy as a purchaser; but there would be a great number of occasions on which he would take a very lively interest in the sale for other reasons. The landlord under the Bill was informed that, practically, the remedy by eviction against a tenant would be of very little worth, and that the way in which he must look for re-imbursement for arrears was by giving the power of free sale to the tenant. The tenant would be driven to make a sale of the tenancy, and the landlord would be paid out of the purchase money the sum due to him. Therefore, the landlord would have a vital interest in two things—namely, that sufficient should be produced by the sale to pay the arrears of rent and other charges; and, secondly, that some machinery should be provided by which he would really know what sum the incoming tenant paid, because their Lordships would see that as between the incoming and outgoing tenant the object of both would be to keep the landlord in the dark as to what sum really had been paid in the change of tenancy. It was most desirable that some machinery should be provided enabling the landlord to ascertain the sum, as nothing could be easier than for the outgoing tenant to have a contract by which the incoming tenant would appear to pay a certain sum, say £100, whereas, in reality, the amount that would be paid would be £200. Nothing was easier than to pay another £100 to a third party, to be given to the outgoing tenant after the landlord was disposed of. For these reasons he thought his Amendment should be added to the clause. The landlord, if he did not wish to purchase, should be allowed to go into Court and say—"I have a claim against the tenant, and, unless that sum is forthcoming, I claim to have the tenancy adjudged to me." There could be no possible harm done to the tenant if a purchaser were found to buy at a price more than the sum due to the landlord.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if the landlord passed over the pre-emption right, and did not wish to become the possessor, he ought not to stand in the way of the tenant realizing his tenant right in the best way he could. This Amendment would give the landlord a double advantage over the tenant. If the noble and learned Earl had proposed an Amendment simply to prevent a collusive sale the Government would have been prepared to consider it; but the Amendment, as it stood, would prevent a sale where the bona fides were undoubted, and it was of excessive stringency against the tenant.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought that the opportunity of collusion pointed out by his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) was one of the greatest dangers they had to encounter. The danger was that the tenant would sell his holding nominally for a small price, but really for a large one, and so try to escape the debt he owed to the landlord. The sympathies of the noble and learned Lord opposite (the Lord Chancellor) were highly excited for fear the tenant might be forced to pay the rent due; but the remedy was very simple. The moment the tenant paid his arrears all the rights of the landlord given by the Amendment would fall to the ground. In other words, the tenant would practically exercise the very common right of buying in the tenancy for the price he pleased; and if he choose to pay the money due from him to the landlord the rights of the latter ceased, and no possible injury could be done to the tenant.

LORD O'HAGAN argued that if the Amendment were passed it would deprive the tenant of the advantages contemplated by the statute, inasmuch as it would tend to limit the right of free sale. Why should the landlord, if he had arrears paid to him, have any advantage over anybody else in the sale? Why should he not be in the open market competing with anybody else, so that the tenant might have freedom to obtain the largest amount which might be given in the open market for his interest in his tenant right? If the landlord got the amount of his arrears and was prepared to pay the full value according to the opinion of the Court on ascertainment of the justice of the tenant right without question, he got all he wanted and all he was entitled to. He got the amount of his arrears, he had the holding of his own land. He lost nothing whatever. Was it so very unfair that the tenant pressed by circumstances should have as fair a chance of obtaining the full value of his tenant right, the landlord having the same pull upon him as to the amount of his arrears as he would have if he went into the open market? As the Amendment was in contravention of the principle of the clause, and the machinery of the Courts, he, for one, would oppose it.

EARL CAIRNS contended that, so far from its being in contravention of the clause, it was merely incidental to it. The object of the Amendment was that the tenant should produce the utmost shilling that could be produced upon the holding. The landlord and tenant were in the same boat. They both wanted to get the utmost possible sum that could be got for the tenant right. It might be that the landlord did not want to become the purchaser, and that he had no wish to interfere in the transaction at all except for the purpose of having his arrears paid. The tenant came to him in Ireland, and said—"I wish to sell my tenancy." "Well, you owe me arrears of £200, and of course that is a sum which I am anxious to have." The tenant said—"It may produce that sum or it may produce less."

[First Night.]

"I do not want to buy your tenant right; all I want is the sum due. I do not wish to hamper you in any way in selling your interest. Get the highest price you can get by auction or by private contract, or in any other way; but the sum due to me should be treated as a reserve price, so that if you cannot get a higher sum, then I take the holding for that sum. By all means get £200 or £300. I won't exercise my right of preventing you; and, rather than have a settlement by the Court, if you do not get more than £200, let that and the amount of the arrears be the reserve price." How was that against the principle of the Bill? He had never heard that the reserve price was against the principle of any sale.

THE EARL OF DERBY asked if the noble and learned Earl would explain whether a tenant, having given notice of an intended sale and having reason to suppose that he would not get what he thought an ample price for his tenancy, would have the power of withdrawing from the sale? If he would have that power it did not seem to him that any injustice would be done to him by this Amendment; but if he would not have it, the Amendment would put it in the power of the landlord to take advantage of the tenant's temporary inability to find a purchaser at a fair price. At the same time, they must all be desirous of preventing collusive sales.

EARL CAIRNS said, he had no hesitation in answering that question. The transaction should be perfectly free, and he intended the utmost liberty in that respect to the tenant. He would be willing to add words to make that intention quite clear.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the objection raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) was the only one which he entertained. So explained, he had no objection to the Amendment. But it was quite plain that, as the Amendment stood, the tenant, if he once gave notice of sale, would be bound to go on.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he thought the intention would be made quite clear by the insertion in line 8 of the words "and the tenant determining to proceed to a sale." He moved to insert those words.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the Government would accept the noble and learned Earl's Amendment with the insertion of these words.

Earl Cairns

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD CARLINGFORD moved, after Clause 1, to insert the following clause:—

("The tenant from year to year of a tenancy to which this Act applies shall not, without the consent of the landlord, sub-divide his holding or sub-let the same or any part thereof.")

The effect would be that such tenancies would be null and void, and sub-tenants so created would have no existence in the eye of the law.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked whether this Amendment was necessary, as he thought it was covered by the existing law? If there was one point on which all parties were agreed it was that it should not be in the tenant's power to sub-divide the holding. Why was it necessary that this Amendment should be introduced in that House?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the object of the Amendment was to show clearly that the sub-division without the landlord's consent was illegal.

EARL CAIRNS suggested that the following words should be added to the clause:—

("Any act done by the tenant in contravention of this provision shall be absolutely void.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR accepted the addition, though he thought it unnecessary.

New Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Incidents of tenancy subject to statutory conditions).

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD proposed to leave out the words—

("After notice has been given by the landlord to the tenant not to commit or to desert from the particular waste specified in such notice.")

He said that the Government would not have put in these words if they had considered at the time what they were going to put in in Clause 12, as it affected the tenant. The word "persistent" waste therein contained was a great protection to the tenant.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the requirement of notice would tend to limit and simplify the inquiry before the Court as to the waste. He should like the words to remain. He did not know whether the noble Marquess was anxious to leave them out.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he was very anxious to have these words left out.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD DUNSANY moved, in page 5, line 13, after ("notice,") to insert ("the tenant shall not break up pasture or meadow land contrary to express covenants.") That which he sought to prevent by the Amendment was one of the most destructive things that could be done on a farm.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, their Lordships had already passed a clause which provided, as one of the statutory conditions, that the tenant should not make persistent waste by the deterioration of the soil. He apprehended that breaking up ancient pasture would come within the meaning of the term "persistent waste." These statutory conditions were intended to take the place of covenants, and therefore any reference to covenants in leases would be out of place in this clause. As to a pasture which was not ancient, there was no reason why it should not be broken up.

LORD DUNSANY said, the argument did not apply, because there was an absence of persistency if all the injury could be done at once without any repetition of the wrong-doing.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that would not rob the act of the character of persistency. It would be persistent waste to burn down a house which could be burnt only once.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE supported the Amendment, and suggested the omission of the reference to covenants.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON considered the words of his noble Friend's Amendment went further than he intended, because, in his opinion, the Amendment, if adopted, would prevent any tenant breaking up pasture or meadow, which, in many cases, might be a great benefit to the landlord and tenant.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, it might be necessary to do it in the ordinary course of rotation. But if it were waste to do it, that would be only one form of waste; and if they were to enumerate the different forms many others would have to be inserted—such, for instance, as burning the soil. He thought it would be better to leave the clause as it stood.

LORD HARLECH also objected to the Amendment, but believed the clause would be improved by inserting after the word "persistent," "or wanton waste."

EARL CAIRNS observed, that in many cases it was absolutely necessary to break up pasture.

LORD DUNSANY expressed his readiness to accept a modification of his Amendment, in order that his object might be carried out.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that the lands with which the noble Lord wished to deal were old pasture lands of 20 years' standing, and if those lands were ploughed up it would be an injury from which they might not recover for many years. He would suggest that the words inserted should be "the tenant shall not break up ancient pasture or meadow land."

THE EARL OF BELMORE said he was owner of pasture land which was all the better for breaking up.

LORD DUNSANY said, he was willing to insert "ancient pasture" in his Amendment, and to omit the latter part of it with reference to express covenants.

Amendment negatived.

To the words in page 5, line 13, "the tenant shall not, without the consent of his landlord, sub-divide or sub-let his holding," the following words were added:—"or any part thereof."

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in page 5, line 15, after ("holding,") to insert—

("Nor erect, or suffer to be erected thereon, save as in this Act provided, any dwelling-house in addition to those already upon the holding at the time of the passing of this Act, nor suffer to be used as a dwelling-house any building which at the time of the passing of this Act was not so used, with the knowledge and consent of the landlord.")

He said his object was not to alter the scope of the provision against sub-letting or sub-dividing, but to make the words more effectual. All were agreed that sub-letting or sub-dividing should not be allowed. This was a matter of national concern. What they wanted to secure was that an area should not be burdened with a population it was not able to support. Sub-letting and sub-division were brought about in this way—the tenant took in under the name of a lodger some member of the family, and established him in a cabin adjoining his own, or in a building intended for some other purpose, and not fit for the accommodation of human beings. Upon a miserably small holding, scarcely sufficient to accommodate a single family, would be sometimes found four or five families huddled together under circumstances of great misery. Hitherto landlords had been able to check such excessive sub-division; but they had now been deprived of all means of preventing it. He wished, therefore, to insert in the Bill words which would remove all doubts upon the subject.

[First Night.]

LORD LECONFIELD said, it frequently happened that the cottages had a room on either side of the door, with a kind of attic over without a window. The tenant knocked a hole through the wall, and put in a window afterwards, letting a part of the cottage to another party, and he suggested that words should be inserted to prevent that kind of sub-division.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not accept the latter suggestion. If they were to do battle by Act of Parliament with every piece of ingenuity that might possibly occur to an Irish tenant it would require a good deal of ingenuity and time on their part to do so. He was, however, willing to accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne).

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN regretted that the Amendment had been accepted.

Amendment agreed to.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD next moved an Amendment exempting the landlord from liability for damage occasioned by cutting and removing turf in the exercise of his right to enter upon the holding for such purposes as mining, quarrying, road-making, draining, and sporting.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not accept the Amendment; but he would consider the point before the Report.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD also objected to the Amendment, which, in his opinion, went too far.

Amendment negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in page 5, line 28, after ("mine-

The Marquess of Lansdowne

erals") to insert ("or digging or searching for minerals.")

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in page 5, line 32, after ("title") insert—

("And which the tenant at the time of the passing of this Act may be entitled by law to cut and remove.")

As the Bill stood the tenant could claim almost every tree. There was no intention, of course, of interfering with those that were planted for ornament or shelter.

LORD LECONFIELD said, if some such Amendment as this were not accepted, in a short time there would not be a single stick of timber standing in Ireland.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the tenant who claimed the statutory term of 15 years might have a plantation on the farm, for which he was bound to pay rent during those 15 years; and yet it was now proposed that the landlord should be allowed to come forward during that time and sweep away such a plantation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY observed, that the landlord always had the right to take the trees which were on his property. He was now asked to give the tenant something which he never possessed before, and that was the right to those trees; and simply because the tenant made some improvement, or for some other reason, the noble Lord proposed an additional spoliation to those contained in the Bill—namely, by giving the possession of trees which the tenant never had, and to which he could not possibly lay a claim.

EARL SPENCER remarked that a tenant who had a statutory term of 15 years would have to pay a certain rent for that particular period, and it was undesirable that the landlord should be allowed to diminish the value of the holding during that period by cutting down the trees.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that if the tenant wished to grow trees during his statutory term he could register them under the special Act of Parliament.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in page 5, line 34, leave out ("may be required,") and insert—

("The tenant under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term was lawfully entitled to cut.")

LORD CARLINGFORD agreed to accept the Amendment, if the words relating to "the contract of tenancy subsisting" were omitted.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in page 5, line 38, after ("game,") insert ("as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven.") He said his object was to include snipe and woodcock. In many parts of Ireland snipe and woodcock were the only game, and to preserve game in Ireland without preserving snipe and woodcock would simply be like mockery.

LORD CARLINGFORD considered the proposed definition unnecessary.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, if his Amendment was not accepted, a landlord would not be able to prosecute in his own name.

EARL SPENCER said, the landlord would be able to prosecute under the Act of last year in his own name.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that Act only had reference to cases where the landlord reserved his rights.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in page 6, line 1, to leave out the word ("persistently,") and insert ("unreasonably") in the clause. The object was to prevent tenants from unreasonably obstructing the landlord in his shooting, even though they did not persistently do so.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought it would be undesirable, as a thing which was of no real consequence might sometimes be unreasonable, though, unless persisted in, it might do no harm. It was not desirable, in a clause settling conditions of tenure, to raise questions as to anything which was not of real importance between the landlord and tenant.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD moved, in sub-section 5, which provides that the shooting and fishing should belong to the landlord, subject to the Ground Game Act, 1880, in line 41, after ("game,") to insert ("as defined for the purposes of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven;") and, in line 48, after ("1880,") to insert—

("And the provisions of the Act twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter sixty-seven, shall extend where such right of shooting and taking game belongs exclusively to the landlord as though such exclusive right were reserved by the landlord to himself by deed.")

And in line 4, after ("section,") to insert—

("During the continuance of a statutory term, all mines and minerals, coals and coal pits, quarries of limestone and other stone and slate, gravel and sand pits, woods and underwoods, and all bogs and bog timber, turbaries for cutting turf, and rights of turbary, except such of the said rights as the tenant, under the contract of tenancy subsisting immediately before the commencement of the statutory term, was lawfully entitled to exercise, shall be deemed to be exclusively reserved to the landlord.")

Amendments agreed to.

LORD CARLINGFORD moved, in page 6, after line 6, add, as a new paragraph—

("Nothing contained in this section shall prejudice or affect any ejectment for non-payment of rent instituted by a landlord whether before or after the commencement of a statutory term, in respect of rent accrued due for a holding before the commencement of such term.")

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY took exception to the wording of the 6th subsection of the clause, which said that during the continuance of a statutory term in a tenancy, "consequent on an increase of rent by the landlord," the Court might, on the application of the landlord, and for certain purposes, authorize the resumption of the holding, and require the tenant to sell his tenancy, or part of it, on such terms as the Court might approve. The purposes for which the land might be resumed included grants or leases of sites for churches or other places of religious worship. These were very desirable objects, no doubt, for which the landlord was to have the power of resuming the land; but this power of resumption was not to be given to every landlord. In order to be able to exercise this power, a landlord must have qualified himself by a certain special qualification—namely, that he should have previously raised the rent of his tenant. Now, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was entirely desirous of protecting the right of the landlord to deal with the rent; but he had never, in his wildest moments, gone so far as to look upon the raising of the rent as a special mark of holiness in a landlord. He, for one, should venture to claim for landlords who had not risen to so exalted a height of virtue as to raise their rents the liberty of building churches on their estates. He therefore moved to omit the words "consequent on an increase of rent by the landlord."

[First Night.]

LORD CARLINGFORD pointed out that the noble Marquess had not read an important part of the clause, which empowered the landlord to resume—

("The holding, or part thereof, for some reasonable and sufficient purpose having relation to the good of the holding or of the estate.")

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But why is it to be consequent upon an increase of rent by the landlord?

LORD CARLINGFORD explained that, as the Bill stood, the power of resumption was confined to the case of statutory terms not created by the intervention of the Court, but by the mere fact of the landlord and tenant having agreed upon an increase of rent without having recourse to the Court. He would, however, take this opportunity of stating a proposal which the Government was prepared to make on this subject. It was this—first, that the power of resumption should be made universal in all cases and in respect of all statutory tenancies, beginning from the time of the passing of the Bill; and, secondly, that for a certain number of years there should be no power whatever under any circumstances to convert present into future tenancies. That was to say, the creation of future tenancies would be for a certain time postponed. If their Lordships were prepared to consider this suggestion in its double aspect, the Government would be prepared with words on Report to carry it into effect. If they were not disposed to accept it, the only course open to the Government would be to stand by the words which the noble Marquess wished to omit.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the noble Lord had raised a much larger question than that brought forward by the noble Marquess; it was one requiring a good deal of consideration, and ought to be kept distinct from the other.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was not sure that the Committee fully understood the nature of the mine that had been sprung upon it by the observations of the Lord Privy Seal. When he left the Government, and when the Bill was introduced into Parliament, it was a fundamental idea of the Government, and a fundamental principle of the Bill, that there should be a distinction between future and present tenancies. Every possible device was adopted in the Bill to make present tenancies continuous and almost permanent. They were, in fact, to be entails in favour of the present tenants of Ireland. But the Prime Minister left open a door through which in some future time they might hope to return to a healthy and natural condition of things in Ireland. A door was, in fact, left open for a return to the principle of freedom of contract; and the Government had repeatedly said that they looked to that result as the ultimate hope for peace in that country. The Lord Privy Seal, who, for all he knew, was one of those who had always been jealous and suspicious of the notion of a return to the natural state of things in Ireland, now proposed to substitute for a very innocent proposal of the noble Marquess opposite a complete abandonment of what he (the Duke of Argyll) considered the fundamental principle of the measure. His noble Friend said that the postponement of the power to create future tenancies would be temporary. Well, they all knew what would occur. Another agitation would be got up, and the postponement of the power would be continued indefinitely. The suggestion of the Lord Privy Seal was the result of his hatred of the plan by which a door would be left open for a return to freedom of contract. He did not believe that the Irish tenants were alarmed at the proposal that bits of their land might be taken from them for certain purposes, for they understood that they would be properly compensated. He quite understood, however, that many of them disliked the idea of a return to the principle of freedom of contract for themselves and their landlords, although they insisted upon absolute freedom to contract between themselves and their fellow-tenants. He would much rather keep the Government to the fundamental principles of the Bill than assent to the further Amendment which had been indicated.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN was understood to say that where the statutory terms were granted landlords would not make improvements.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that if landlords wanted to resume possession for any of the purposes named, they must sacrifice the valuable privilege of freedom of contract; and yet in another Bill simultaneously introduced into the House by the Government it was provided that persons in possession of land might make leases of it for the erection of churches and schools and for the promotion of public education. But as regarded this Bill the question was why the power of resumption given by the clause was restricted to a special class of landlords—namely, those who had raised their rents. The inconsistency of these provisions showed the haste with which the proposals of the Government were made. The Committee would do well to reflect upon them more than the Government had done.

EARL CAIRNS said, the clause as it stood would induce a landlord who wanted to build a church to raise the rents of his tenants.

EARL FORTESCUE wished to say a word on the matter as a sanitary reformer. The evil consequences in Ireland of the overcrowded and bad state of labourers' cottages were enormous; and it was monstrous that they should have a large question brought before them when all they cared for in the clause was the very simple power of enabling the landlord to resume for the purpose of building decent dwellings for the labourers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY could assure the noble Marquess that the proposal which had been described as the springing of a mine was not made without the fullest consideration.

LORD WAVENEY hoped that the Government would not give up this clause.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the power of resumption was an exceedingly important modification of the statutory term, which might be made under the direction of the Court for reasonable and sufficient purposes, and not alone for the building of churches or schools.

EARL CAIRNS said, no doubt it was important; but the question was why it should be limited to cases in which there had been an increase of rent.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he understood the noble Marquess to adhere to his Amendment in spite of the important modification which the Government had offered to make; but if the offer were not accepted and the Amendment were carried, the Government would not consider themselves bound by the offer that had been made.

EARL CAIRNS said, that the Government professed a desire that landlord and tenant should agree; but the way they proposed to induce them to agree was by making the unfortunate landlord raise the rent.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he began to despair of getting a clear statement on this question. What he understood to have taken place was this. An Amendment moved by the noble Marquess opposite was met by a statement of the Lord Privy Seal that it was the intention of the Government to accord to the landlord an universal right of resumption, instead of the very limited right now accorded by the Bill. But the Lord Privy Seal added that, in order to quiet the minds of the Irish tenants, he intended to accompany this modification of the Bill by a proposal under which the conversion of present into future tenancies should be delayed for an indefinite time, which he did not name. In these circumstances, their Lordships ought to accept the Amendment of the noble Marquess, which was not foreign to the object of the Lord Privy Seal; and when they had before them that mysterious and indescribable proposal for quieting the minds of the Irish tenants, they would be able to consider it with the attention it deserved.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved, in page 6, line 12, after ("estate") to insert ("or for building purposes.") He said that the Government probably intended to give the landlord the right of resumption for building purposes, and the only question was whether that object was covered by the words "for the good of the estate." An ingenious lawyer might argue that the good of the landlord and of the estate were two different things; and, therefore, it would be desirable to have a distinct declaration on the subject.

[First Night.]

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had no doubt that the words in the Bill covered the object of the noble Earl, and that the words proposed were unnecessary.

EARL CAIRNS said, it was quite possible the Court might say that a scheme of building was not for the good of the estate. Therefore, his noble Friend proposed to insert the words in question, to indicate one of the purposes which should be deemed for the good of the estate. He thought, however, a subsequent Amendment to be proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) was preferable.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved, in page 6, line 12, after ("estate") to insert—

("Or for using or letting the same for manufacturing purposes, or for building ground, or for villa sites or gardens.")

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the words "for the good of the estate" embraced every purpose for which the landlord ought to have a right to resume possession.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY asked whether "for the good of the estate" meant for the good of the proprietor's pocket, or did it mean the actual improvement of the land as land?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE asked whether the words meant "for the advantage of the proprietor;" if so, why was this not stated on the face of the clause?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR objected to these words.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked whether it was the intention of the Government that the proprietors should have the power of resumption in order to apply the land as building land?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR replied in the affirmative.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked why, then, they should not say so in the Bill? There were many estates on which the sole hope of redemption lay in converting a portion of the land to building purposes.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

EARL CAIRNS moved the insertion of the words "including the use of the ground as building ground."

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Government would accept this Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Repeal of part of s. 3 of Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and enactment of new scale).

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE moved, in page 6, to leave out from ("provides") in line 27, to ("as") in line 32, both inclusive. He said that he fully understood the necessity of protecting tenants against capricious evictions; but the old scale of compensation was sufficient, especially as the Bill put within the reach of the vast majority of tenants what was practically a 15 years' lease, renewable for ever.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that though in the case of the great majority of the tenants the sale of the tenants' interest would take the place of the scale of compensation adopted in 1870, and would be better for all parties, there would be a residuum of tenants who would not find protection in the sale of their interests and with whom it was necessary to deal in another way. The Government, therefore, proposed to retain the sections giving compensation for disturbance, and also, influenced by the opinion of the Judges who were administering the Act of 1870—many of whom said that in cases frequently before them they felt the amount of compensation which they were empowered to award was too small—to increase the scale, and strengthen the power of the Court.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he hoped the Amendment would not be adopted. He admitted, of course, that through the medium of the scale of compensation it would be possible to give absolute perpetuity of tenure; but the change proposed by the Government would not make the scale prohibitive.

EARL CAIRNS said, the noble Lord had stated that there was a small residuum of tenants who would have no saleable interest. It was a strange thing that, because this small residuum of tenants had holdings which were of no value, they were not only to be compensated for those holdings, but compensated on a far higher scale than had been known up to this time. Many of the County Court Judges said the remedy up to the present time had been the Compensation Clause of the Land Act of 1870. They said cases had come before them in which the landlord was willing to pay full compensation, because he was certain to get a new tenant who would come in and recoup him all he had paid for compensation. Therefore, the very cases which the County Court Judges said they wished to provide for were cases in which, according to their own statement, there was a power of sale on the part of the tenant; and, consequently, it would be unnecessary to resort to the new Compensation Clause of this Bill. He had heard no argument for making compensation to the tenants on a very much higher scale than hitherto. It was proposed to increase the compensation, and in some cases to nearly double it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY contended that the argument of the noble and learned Earl who had just spoken was inconsistent. He did not object to the continuance of the clause of the Act of 1870; but he was opposed to the clause being made satisfactory. The County Court Judges, whose judgment might be accepted on this point as superior to that of even the noble and learned Earl, gave it as their experience that the clause of 1870 had been found to be imperfect.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that when the County Court Judges, or a certain number of them, gave an opinion that this compensation was not sufficient for the purpose, they did not know that it was contemplated to enact a system of free sale. All the cases they cited for the purpose of establishing that this compensation was insufficient were cases which never could arise under a system of free sale. Their opinion might, therefore, be put aside, because it applied to a system which had now altogether ceased to exist. He did not think the clause was of the first importance, because he agreed with the Lord Privy Seal that in the working of the Bill this Compensation Clause would almost entirely disappear. Still, as far as it went, he entirely agreed with the Amendment that was now before the Committee, because it seemed to him that the system of compensation in its principle was anomalous, and that it was not to be defended on any of the ordinary principles on which property was based. It was impossible to defend a system of compensation for disturbance which applied to tenants paying £500 or £1,000 a-year, for it was quite absurd to say that such tenants were weak persons who were unable to make a contract for themselves, and it was palpably ridiculous to give it the extension proposed.

On question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 91; Not-Contents 180: Majority 89.

CONTENTS.

| | |
|---|---|
| Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.) | Carew, L. |
| Grafton, D. | Carlingford, L. |
| Somerset, D. | Carrington, L. |
| Westminster, D. | Clermont, L. |
| | Clifford of Chudleigh, L. |
| Allesbury, M. | Dacre, L. |
| Bath, M. | De Mauley, L. |
| Lansdowne, M. | Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.) |
| Northampton, M. | Emly, L. |
| Airlie, E. | Ettrick, L. (L. Napier.) |
| Camperdown, E. | Fingall, L. (E. Fingall.) |
| Chichester, E. | Foley, L. |
| Derby, E. | Granard, L. (E. Granard.) |
| Durham, E. | Greville, L. |
| Fitzwilliam, E. | Hare, L. (E. Listowel.) |
| Ilchester, E. | Hatherton, L. |
| Kimberley, E. | Houghton, L. |
| Minto, E. | Kennmare, L. (E. Kennmare.) |
| Morley, E. | Lawrence, L. |
| Northbrook, E. | Leigh, L. |
| Spencer, E. | Lismore, L. (V. Lismore.) |
| Suffolk and Berkshire, E. | Loftus, L. (M. Ely.) |
| Sydney, E. | Lovat, L. |
| Yarborough, E. | Lytelton, L. |
| Canterbury, V. | Methuen, L. |
| Falmouth, V. | Monck, L. (V. Monck.) |
| Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.) | Moncreiff, L. |
| Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.) | Monson, L. [Teller.] |
| Powerscourt, V. | Monteagle of Brandon, L. |
| Sherbrooke, V. | Mount Temple, L. |
| Torrington, V. | O'Hagan, L. |
| Exeter, L. Bp. | Ponsonby, L. (E. Beaumont.) |
| Aberdare, L. | Ramsay, L. (E. Dalhousie.) |
| Amphill, L. | Ribblesdale, L. |
| Ashburton, L. | Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.) |
| Belper, L. | Sandhurst, L. |
| Blachford, L. | Saye and Sele, L. |
| Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.] | Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.) |
| Braye, L. | Skeno, L. (E. Fife.) |
| Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.) | Somerton, L. (E. Nor-manton.) |
| Calthorpe, L. | Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.) |
| Camoye, L. | Sudeley, L. |

Suffield, L.
Sundridge, L. (D. Ar- gyll.)
ThurLOW, L.
Vernon, L.

Waveney, L.
Wenlock, L.
Wolverton, L.
Wrottesley, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Beaufort, D.
Buckingham and Chan-dos, D.
Leeds, D.
Manchester, D.
Marlborough, D.
Norfolk, D.
Northumberland, D.
Portland, D.
Richmond, D.
Sutherland, D.

Abercorn, M. (D. Aber- corn.)
Abergavenny, M.
Bristol, M.
Exeter, M.
Hertford, M.
Salisbury, M.
Winchester, M.

Amherst, E.
Annesley, E.
Bandon, E.
Bathurst, E.
Beauchamp, E.
Belmore, E.
Bradford, E.
Brownlow, E.
Cadogan, E.
Cairns, E.
Caledon, E.
Carnarvon, E.
Clonmell, E.
Coventry, E.
Dartrey, E.
Denbigh, E.
Devon, E.
Doncaster, E. (D. Buc- cleuch and Queensberry.)
Ellesmere, E.
Fortescue, E.
Gainsborough, E.
Haddington, E.
Hardwicke, E.
Harewood, E.
Lanesborough, E.
Lathom, E. [Teller.]
Leven and Melville, E.
Lovelace, E.
Macclesfield, E.
Mansfield, E.
Manvers, E.
Mar and Kellie, E.
Morton, E.
Mount Edgcumbe, E.
Nelson, E.
Onslow, E.
Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
Portarlington, E.
Powis, E.
Radnor, E.
Ravensworth, E.

Redesdale, E.
Romney, E.
Rosse, E.
Sandwich, E.
Somers, E.
Sondes, E.
Stanhope, E.
Strange, E. (D. Athol.)
Strathmore and King-horn.)
Waldegrave, E.
Winton, E. (E. Eglin- town.)

Clancarty, V. (E. Clan- carty.)
Combermere, V.
Cranbrook, V.
Doneraile, V.
Gough, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V.
Hereford, V.
Hill, V.
Hood, V.
Hutchinson, V. (E.
Donoughmore.)
[Teller.]
Lifford, V.
Melville, V.
Sidmouth, V.
Templetown, V.

St. Albans, L. Bp.

Abinger, L.
Alington, L.
Amherst, L. (V. Holmes- dale.)
Annaly, L.
Ardilaun, L.
Arundell of Wardour,
L.
Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)
Aveland, L.
Balfour of Burleigh, L.
Bateman, L.
Beaumont, L.
Borthwick, L.
Botaux, L. (E. Lou- doun.)
Brabourne, L.
Brancepeth, L. (V.
Boyne.) Brodrick, L. (V. Middle- ton.) Carysfort, L. (E. Carys- fort.)
Castlemaine, L.
Chelmsford, L.
Clements, L. (E. Lei- trim.)
Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
Cloncurry, L.
Colchester, L.

Colville of Culross, L.
Crofton, L.
De Freyne, L.
De L'Isle and Dudley,
L.
de Ros, L.
Digby, L.
Dinevor, L.
Donington, L.
Dunsandle and Clan-
conal, L.
Dunsany, L.
Ellenborough, L.
Elphinstone, L.
Foxford, L. (E. Lime- rick.)
Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
Gormanston, L. (V.
Gormanston.)
Grey de Radcliffe, L.
(V. Grey de Wilton.) Hartismere, L. (L. Hen- riker.)
Hay, L. (E. Kinnoul.)
Heytesbury, L.
Howard de Walden,
L.
Hylton, L.
Inchiquin, L.
Kenlis, L. (M. Head-
fort.)
Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Kintore, L. (E. Kin- tores.)
Lamington, L.
Leconfield, L.
Lovel and Holland, L.
(E. Egmont.)
Lyveden, L.
Manners, L.
Massy, L.
Monteagle, L. (M.
Sligo.)
Moore, L. (M. Drog- hada.)
Napier, L.
Northwick, L.

Norton, L.
O'Neill, L.
Oranmore and Browne,
L.
Ormathwaite, L.
Ormonde, L. (M. Or- monde.)
Penrhyn, L.
Plunket, L.
Poltimore, L.
Raglan, L.
Ranfurly, L. (E. Ran- furly.)
Rayleigh, L.
Rodney, L.
Rowton, L.
Sackville, L.
Saltersford, L. (E.
Courtoun.)
Saltoun, L.
Sandys, L.
Scarsdale, L.
Shute, L. (V. Barring- ton.) Silchester, L. (E. Long- ford.) Somerhill, L. (M. Clan- ricarde.)
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Stewart of Garlies, L.
(E. Galloway.)
Strathnairn, L.
Strathspey, L. (E. Sea- field.)
Talbot de Malahide, L.
Templemore, L.
Tollemache, L.
Tredegar, L.
Trevor, L.
Ventry, L.
Wentworth, L.
Westbury, L.
Willoughby de Broke,
L.
Wimborne, L.
Windsor, L.
Wynford, L.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 agreed to.

PART II.

INTERVENTION OF COURT.

Clause 7 (Determination by court of rent of present tenancies).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved, in page 8, lines 15 and 16, to leave out the words ("after having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent.") He did not think that such a demand should be a condition of the landlord's access to the Court. He thought it hardly required argument to show that the landlord and tenant should have equal access to the Court, and, when there, be treated on equal terms. He was again obliged to think that there was some especial grandeur attaching to the landlord who increased his rent, for it was only those who should have increased their rent who would have access to the Court. Could he conceive himself selecting any class of landlords, or any special disabilities, he should be rather inclined to lean against landlords who increased their rents. But such was not the view of the wise men who ruled them. He would have justified his opinion to the House and attempted to demolish the arguments of the Government if they had condescended to give the slightest reason for the abnormal limitation of the provision under consideration. As matters stood, however, he would simply propose that landlords and tenants, like all other subjects of Her Majesty, should be placed upon the same level with regard to their rights of access to Courts of Justice; and with that view he begged to move that the words ("after having demanded from such tenant an increase of rent, which the tenant has declined to accept,") be removed from the Bill.

LORD CARLINGFORD explained the reason of the limitation to which the noble Marquess objected was a desire to induce the parties, if possible, to settle their affairs out of Court. If a landlord should wish to increase his rent, and should not be influenced by the desire of keeping out of Court to come to an agreement with his tenant, he would not be prejudiced by the limitation provided in the clause. He could not accept the Amendment.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that he could see no reason, nor had he heard any, for placing a landlord who had not raised his rent in a less advantageous position than a landlord who had raised his rent.

EARL CAIRNS asked what a landlord was to do who desired to have recourse to the Court for some other purpose than that of raising his rents?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR asked for what conceivable purpose could the landlord be disposed to go to the Court if he did not want to increase the rent? He would not go to the Court to get the rent reduced. If the tenant did not want to go to the Court to get the rent reduced, he would assuredly not go to get it increased. The motive for putting the clause in its present form was that it indicated that if the landlord did wish his rent increased, the better course for him would be to propose the increase he thought right, and then, if he and his tenants could not agree, to go to the Court.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he did not think the Amendment very material; but he thought the landlord who desired to protect himself ought to have the opportunity afforded him of going to the Court, even though he had never entertained the idea of raising his rent. He might wish to sell his estate, and to be able to state the amount of the rental as it would stand in future.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL pointed out there was another occasion when a landlord might wish to go to the Court, and that was when he was denounced by the Land League as a rack-renter. It was well known that over and over again professional agitators had gone about denouncing certain landlords as rack-renters; and tenants, as an excuse for non-payment of their rent, said they were coerced by the Land League. Therefore, he could conceive the landlord wishing to go to the Court to prove before a judicial authority that he was not a rack-renter. He could not conceive why the Government should debar him from doing that.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, the obvious reason for the limitation in this clause was that the Government, as he understood it, considered that the Court was a necessary evil. They wished to encourage recourse to it as little as possible. He hoped the Government would stand by the words of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could not admit that the provision in the clause was unreasonable. In the present relations of landlords and tenants in Ireland it was a matter of doubtful policy to encourage the landlords to go to the Court when they did not require an increase of rent, and bring their tenants—generally poorer men than themselves—into Court.

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved, in page 8, lines 20 and 21, to leave out the words ("and having regard to the interest of the landlord and tenant respectively.") They had been embarrassed frequently in dealing with this Bill by finding, from time to time, strange phrases, wholly unintelligible or useless in the position in which they were placed. They had never hitherto been able to obtain from the Government any clear ury, V.

th, V.
, V. (E. Aber-
r, V. (D. Leincourt, V.
ooke, V.
gton, V.

, L. Bp.

re, L.
ill, L.
rton, L.
, L. ord, L.
L. (E. Cork and ry.) [Teller.]
L. ibane, L. (E. dalbane.)
rpe, L.
s, L.
, L. gford, L.
gton, L.
mt, L. i of Chudleigh,

L.
L. ryne, L.
aley, L.
L. (E. Elgin and ardine.)
L. s, L. (L. Napier.)
L. (E. Fingall.)
L.
rd, L. (E. Gra-
l.)
le, L.
L. (E. Listowel.)
rton, L.

Houghton, L.
Kenmare, L. (E. Ken- mare.) Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
Lawrence, L.
Leigh, L.
Lismore, L. (V. Lis- more.)
Loftus, L. (M. Ely.)
Lovat, L.
Lyttelton, L.
Methuen, L.
Monck, L. (V. Monck.)
Moncreiff, L.
Monson, L. [Teller.]
Monteagle of Brandon,
L.
Napier, L.
O'Hagan, L.
Ponsonby, L. (E. Bess- borough.) Ramsay, L. (E. Dal- housie.)
Ribblesdale, L.
Rosebery, L. (E. Rose- bery.)
Sandhurst, L.
Saye and Sele, L.
Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
Skene, L. (E. Fife.)
Somerton, L. (E. Nor- manton.) Strafford, L. (V. En- field.)
Sudeley, L.
Suffield, L.
Sundridge, L. (D. Ar- gyll.)
ThurLOW, L.
Vernon, L.
Waveney, L.
Wenlock, L.
Wolverton, L.
Wrottesley, L.

Lovelace, E.
Lytton, E.
Macclesfield, E.
Mansfield, E.
Manvers, E.
Mar and Kellie, E.
Morton, E.
Mount Edgcumbe, E.
Nelson, E.
Onslow, E.
Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
Powis, E.
Radnor, E.
Ravensworth, E.
Redesdale, E.
Romney, E.
Rosse, E.
Rosslyn, E.
Sandwich, E.
Somers, E.
Sondes, E.
Stanhope, E.
Strange, E. (D. Athol.)
Strathmore and King-horn, E.
Verulam, E.
Waldegrave, E.
Zetland, E.

Clancarty, V. (E. Clan- carty.)
Combermore, V.
Cranbrook, V.
Doneraile, V.
Gough, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V. [Teller.]
Hereford, V.
Hill, V.
Hood, V.
Hutchinson, V. (E.
Donoughmore.)
Lifford, V.
Melville, V.
Sidmouth, V.
Templetown, V.

St. Albans, L. Bp.

Abinger, L.
Alington, L.
Amherst, L. (V. Holmes- dale.)
Annaly, L.
Ardilaun, L.
Arundell of Wardour,
L.
Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)
Aveland, L.
Bateman, L.
Beaumont, L.
Borthwick, L.
Botreaux, L. (E. Lou- doun.)
Brabourne, L.
Brancepeth, L. (V.
Boyne.) Brodrick, L. (V. Midle- ton.) Carysfort, L. (E. Carys- fort.)
Castlemaine, L.

Chelmsford, L.
Clements, L. (E. Lei- trim.)
Clifton, L. (E. Darn- ley.)
Clinton, L.
Cloncurry, L.
Colchester, L.
Colville of Culross, L.
Crofton, L.
De L'Isle and Dudley,
L.
de Ros, L.
Digby, L.
Dinevor, L.
Donington, L.
Dunsandle and Clan-
conal, L.
Dunsany, L.
Ellenborough, L.
Elphinstone, L.
Foxford, L. (E. Lime- rick.)
Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
Gormanston, L. (V.
Gormanston.)
Grey de Radcliffe, L.
(V. Grey de Wilton.)
Harlech, L.
Hartismere, L. (L. Hen- riker.)
Hay, L. (E. Kinnoul.)
Heytesbury, L.
Howard de Walden, L.
Hylton, L.
Inchiquin, L.
Kenlis, L. (M. Head- fort.)
Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.)
Lamington, L.
Leconfield, L.
Londesborough, L.
Lovel and Holland, L.
(E. Egmont.)
Lyveden, L.
Manners, L.
Massy, L.
Monteagle, L. (M.
Sligo.)
Moore, L. (M. Drogh- eda.)
Northwick, L.
Norton, L.
O'Neill, L.
Oranmore and Browne,
L.
Ormathwaite, L.
Ormonde, L. (M. Or- monde.)
Penrhyn, L.
Plunket, L.
Poltimore, L.
Raglan, L.
Ranfurly, L. (E. Ran- furly.)
Rayleigh, L.
Rodney, L.
Rowton, L.
Sackville, L.
Saltersford, L. (E. Cour- town.)
Saltoun, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

fort, D. ingham and Chan-s, D.
h, D.
chester, D.
dborough, D.
rick, D.
dumberland, D.
dmond, D.
dthland, D.
Wellington, D.

Abcorn, M. (D. Aber-
corn.)
Abergavenny, M.
Aitch, M.
Aitch, M.
Aitch, M.
Aitch, M.
Aitch, M.
Aitch, M.

Aitch, E.
Aitch, E.
Aitch, E.
Aitch, E.

Beauchamp, E.
Belmore, E.
Bradford, E.
Brownlow, E.
Cadogan, E.
Cairns, E.
Caledon, E.
Carnarvon, E.
Clonmell, E.
Coventry, E.
Denbigh, E.
Devon, E.
Doncaster, E. (D. Buc- cleuch and Queensberry.)
Eldon, E.
Ellesmere, E.
Feversham, E.
Gainsborough, E.
Haddington, E.
Hardwicke, E.
Harewood, E.
Lanesborough, E.
Lathom, E. [Teller.]
Leven and Melville, E.

[First Night.]

| | |
|---------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| Sandys, L. | Templemore, L. |
| Scarsdale, L. | Tollemache, L. |
| Shute, L. (V. Bar- | Tredegar, L. |
| rington.) | Trevor, L. |
| Somerhill, L. (M. Clan- | Tyrone, L. (M. Water- |
| ricarde.) | ford.) |
| Stanley of Alderley, L. | Ventry, L. |
| Stewart of Garlies, L. | Vivian, L. |
| (E. Galloway.) | Wentworth, L. |
| Stratheden and Camp- | Westbury, L. |
| bell, L. | Willoughby de Broke, |
| Strathnairn, L. | L. |
| Strathspey, L. (E. Sea- | Wimborne, L. |
| field.) | Windsor, L. |
| Talbot de Malahide, L. | Wynford, L. |

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved, in page 8, line 23, after ("rent,") to insert—

("Provided always, that where application is made to the court under this section in respect of any tenancy, and the court is of opinion that the tenant of the holding in which such tenancy subsists, or his predecessors in title, has or have caused or suffered such holding to become deteriorated, contrary to the express or implied conditions constituting the contract of tenancy, the court may refuse the application, or may postpone the further hearing of the same until after the performance by the tenant of such conditions as the court may think proper.")

He said, that this Amendment was a very important one. Its object was to prevent the deterioration of the holding. One of the greatest dangers which would arise under the Act was that it would hold out a strong temptation to the tenant to allow his farm to get into a bad condition during the last year, with the view of obtaining a lower rent for the next 15 years. The Irish landlords had a right to demand that they should be protected against that kind of thing. He doubted whether, as the Bill stood, the Court would hold that such conduct was "unreasonable" within the meaning of the "equities" clause, and would, on that ground, refuse a statutory term. The Amendment was the outcome of persons who had thoroughly considered the subject. It would be a wise and fair way of meeting a difficulty, and no honest tenant in Ireland need fear anything whatever from it.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that such a case as was contemplated in the Amendment would be prevented by Clause 8, which provided that where the Court was of opinion that the conduct of either landlord or tenant had been unreasonable, the Court might refuse the application or accede to it, subject to certain conditions.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD VENTRY moved, in page 8, line 23, after ("rent,") insert—

("Provided always, that the court shall not entertain an application made under this section by any tenant who owes more than one-half year's rent until satisfied that such tenant has tendered to his landlord within one year previous to his making such application a sum or sums equivalent to one year's rent of his holding.")

LORD CARLINGFORD said, the Amendment was inconsistent with the intentions and with some of the provisions of the Bill.

LORD VENTRY pointed out that the Amendment ran on the same lines as the clause relating to arrears of rent.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE moved, in sub-section 3, which provides that where the judicial rent of any present tenancy has been fixed by the Court such present tenancy shall be deemed to be a tenancy subject to statutory conditions, to leave the following words out:—

("With this modification, that, during the statutory term in a present tenancy consequent on the first determination of a judicial rent of that tenancy by the court, application by the landlord to authorise the resumption of the holding or part thereof by him for some purpose having relation to the good of the holding or of the estate, shall not be entertained by the court, subject nevertheless to the provisions in this Act contained for the benefit of labourers in respect of cottages, gardens, or allotments. Provided also, that such application for resumption may be entertained by the court, if it is satisfied that before the passing of this Act the reversion expectant on the determination of a lease of the holding was purchased by the landlord or his predecessors in title with a view of letting or otherwise disposing of the land for building purposes on the determination of such lease, and that it is bonâ fide required by him for such purpose.")

He remarked that he could discover no reason for drawing this distinction between the first statutory term of 15 years and a subsequent term.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not consent to the Amendment. The Government thought it of great importance that every tenant in Ireland should feel that he had it in his power to obtain a fixed term of at least 15 years, not liable to the chances of resumption by the landlord.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL was entirely at a loss to understand what object the Government had in putting so heavy a penalty upon landlords as that proposed by the 3rd sub-section of the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY remarked, that the object of the Government was to show the tenantry of Ireland that they were extremely zealous in punishing the Irish landlord; and the 3rd sub-section, which the Government wished to retain, was an example of their zeal in that direction.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the object of the clause was of the greatest importance in the estimation of the Government. Its object was to give the tenants of Ireland 15 years' rest; and if the noble Marquess thought that a laughing matter, those who were responsible for the government of the country took a different view. He might remind the Committee that nearly all their Lordships were landlords. They might not agree with many of the tenants' ideas on the subject—and he certainly did not agree with them all—but it was unreasonable to think that because their Lordships held certain views that they were to dominate entirely over the opinions of all who were concerned in a settlement of this question. He warned their Lordships from looking at the matter in such a light; and as there was an obvious reason why Ireland should have a respite from disturbance for 15 years, he hoped their Lordships would not resist the retention of the words proposed to be omitted.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE supported the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he quite understood the object of the Government. But the unrest of Ireland was not due to the inequality of the laws, for the Prime Minister himself had said that the laws of Ireland were more favourable to the tenant than those of any other country. The unrest was caused by the false doctrines which had been preached in Ireland, and which had been encouraged by the language of Ministers. It was most important that this privilege should be left to the owners of land for the good of the country. He could not support the Amendment, because he did not think it fair and just, and he wanted nothing to be given to the landlord that was not fair and just.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY asked, how it was possible to expect to obtain a respite from the agitation existing in Ireland if they refused such an Amendment as this, which would prevent landlords from having the power of doing good to the country when they wished?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he would be exceedingly glad to believe that there would be a respite to agitation. Nothing would be more gratifying to all of them, and it was simply to bring about that result that the clause was framed. They felt that, as landlords, it was necessary that they should make some little sacrifice to avoid friction as far as possible. They therefore thought it well to postpone for a time the exercise of those privileges of the landlord, which, though in themselves reasonable, might cause great harm if too freely exercised.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that, for the first time, he would vote with the Government. There was a good deal in the reasons they had given; but there was no justice in the course they proposed to take. He was afraid that the Government were too hopeful in thinking that there would be a respite of agitation.

On question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 77; Not-Contents 195: Majority 118.

CONTENTS.

| | |
|--|---|
| Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.) | Aberdare, L. |
| Devonshire, D. | Amphill, L. |
| Westminster, D. | Ashburton, L. |
| | Belper, L. |
| | Blachford, L. |
| | Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.] |
| Ailesbury, M. | Braye, L. |
| Northampton, M. | Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.) |
| | Calthorpe, L. |
| Derby, E. | Camoy's, L. |
| Durham, E. | Carew, L. |
| Fitzwilliam, E. | Carlingford, L. |
| Fortescue, E. | Carrington, L. |
| Kimberley, E. | Clermont, L. |
| Minto, E. | Clifford of Chudleigh, L. |
| Morley, E. | Crewe, L. |
| Northbrook, E. | Dacre, L. |
| Saint Germans, E. | De Mauley, L. |
| Spencer, E. | Elgin, L. (E. Elgin and Kincardine.) |
| Sydney, E. | Emly, L. |
| Yarborough, E. | Ettrick, L. (L. Napier.) |
| | Fingall, L. (E. Fingall.) |
| Falmouth, V. | Foley, L. |
| Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.) | Granard, L. (E. Granard.) |
| Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.) | Greville, L. |
| Powerscourt, V. | Hare, L. (E. Listowel.) |
| Torrington, V. | Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.) |
| Exeter, L. Bp. | |

[First Night.]

Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
 Lawrence, L.
 Leigh, L.
 Loftus, L. (M. Ely.)
 Lyttelton, L.
 Methuen, L.
 Monck, L. (V. Monck.)
 Monson, L. [Teller.]
 Monteagle of Brandon, L.
 O'Hagan, L.
 Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.)
 Ramsay, L. (E. Dalhousie.)
 Ribblesdale, L.

Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.)
 Sandhurst, L.
 Sandys, L.
 Saye and Sele, L.
 Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
 Skene, L. (E. Fife.)
 Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.)
 Sudeley, L.
 Suffield, L.
 Thurlow, L.
 Waveney, L.
 Wenlock, L.
 Wolverton, L.
 Wrotteale, L.

Sherbrooke, V.
 Sidmouth, V.
 Templetown, V.
 St. Albans, L. Bp.
 Abinger, L.
 Amherst, L. (V. Holmesdale.)
 Annaly, L.
 Ardilaun, L.
 Arundell of Wardour, L.
 Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)
 Aveland, L.
 Balfour of Burleigh, L.
 Bateman, L.
 Beaumont, L.
 Borthwick, L.
 Botreaux, L. (E. Loudoun.)
 Brabourne, L.
 Brancepeth, L. (V. Boyne.)
 Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)
 Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)
 Castlemaine, L.
 Chelmsford, L.
 Clements, L. (E. Leitrim.)
 Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
 Clinton, L.
 Cloncurry, L.
 Colchester, L.
 Colville of Culross, L.
 Cottesloe, L.
 Crofton, L.
 De Freyne, L.
 De L'Isle and Dudley, L.
 de Ros, L.
 Digby, L.
 Dinevor, L.
 Donington, L.
 Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.
 Dunsany, L.
 Ellenborough, L.
 Elphinstone, L.
 Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.)
 Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
 Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
 Grey de Radcliffe, L. (V. Grey de Wilton.)
 Harlech, L.
 Hartismere, L. (L. Heniker.)
 Hatherton, L.
 Hay, L. (E. Kinnoul.)
 Heytesbury, L.
 Howard de Walden, L.
 Hylton, L.

Inchiquin, L.
 Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
 Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
 Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.)
 Leconfield, L.
 Lovat, L.
 Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
 Lyveden, L.
 Manners, L.
 Massy, L.
 Monteagle, L. (M. Sligo.)
 Moore, L. (M. Drogheda.)
 Napier, L.
 Norton, L.
 O'Neill, L.
 Oranmore and Browne, L.
 Ormathwaite, L.
 Ormonde, L. (M. Ormonde.)
 Penrhyn, L.
 Plunket, L.
 Poltimore, L.
 Raglan, L.
 Ranfurly, L. (E. Ranfurly.)
 Rayleigh, L.
 Rodney, L.
 Rowton, L.
 Sackville, L.
 Saltersford, L. (E. Courtown.)
 Saltoun, L.
 Scarsdale, L.
 Shute, L. (V. Barrington.)
 Stanley of Alderley, L.
 Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
 Stratheden and Campbell, L.
 Strathnairn, L.
 Strathspey, L. (E. Seafield.)
 Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
 Talbot de Malahide, L.
 Templemore, L.
 Tollemache, L.
 Tredegar, L.
 Trevor, L.
 Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)
 Ventry, L.
 Vernon, L.
 Wentworth, L.
 Westbury, L.
 Willoughby de Broke, L.
 Wimborne, L.
 Windsor, L.
 Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Beaufort, D.
 Buckingham and Chandos, D.
 Grafton, D.
 Leeds, D.
 Manchester, D.
 Marlborough, D.
 Norfolk, D.
 Northumberland, D.
 Portland, D.
 Richmond, D.
 Somerset, D.
 Sutherland, D.
 Wellington, D.

Ilchester, E.
 Jersey, E.
 Lanesborough, E.
 Lathom, E. [Teller.]
 Leven and Melville, E.
 Lovelace, E.
 Lytton, E.
 Macclesfield, E.
 Mansfield, E.
 Manvers, E.
 Mar and Kellie, E.
 Morton, E.
 Mount Edgcumbe, E.
 Nelson, E.
 Onslow, E.

Abercorn, M. (D. Abercorn.)
 Abergavenny, M.
 Bristol, M.
 Exeter, M.
 Hertford, M.
 Lansdowne, M. [Teller.]
 Salisbury, M.
 Winchester, M.

Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
 Powis, E.
 Radnor, E.
 Ravensworth, E.
 Redesdale, E.
 Romney, E.
 Rosse, E.
 Rosslyn, E.
 Somers, E.
 Sondes, E.
 Stanhope, E.
 Strange, E. (D. Athol.)
 Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.
 Suffolk and Berkshire, E.
 Verulam, E.
 Waldegrave, E.
 Winton, E. (E. Eglington.)
 Zetland, E.

Airlie, E.
 Amherst, E.
 Annesley, E.
 Bandon, E.
 Bathurst, E.
 Beauchamp, E.
 Belmore, E.
 Bradford, E.
 Brownlow, E.
 Cadogan, E.
 Cairns, E.
 Caledon, E.
 Camperdown, E.
 Carnarvon, E.
 Olonmell, E.
 Coventry, E.
 Denbigh, E.
 Devon, E.
 Doncaster, E. (D. Buccleuch and Queensberry.)
 Eldon, E.
 Ellesmere, E.
 Feversham, E.
 Gainsborough, E.
 Haddington, E.
 Hardwicke, E.
 Harewood, E.

Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)
 Combermere, V.
 Cranbrook, V.
 Doneraile, V.
 Gough, V.
 Hardinge, V.
 Hawarden, V.
 Hereford, V.
 Hill, V.
 Hood, V.
 Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)
 Lifford, V.
 Melville, V.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the Amendment he now had to move was complementary to one which had been already accepted. Its object was to carry further the exception made with regard to English-managed estates. By the Amendment made in the 1st clause, it was decided that free sale should not exist upon English-managed estates, and the Amendment which he was now about to propose would exempt such estates from application to the Court to fix a judicial rent. It was unnecessary to argue at length in favour of this exemption. For many years a great deal of money had been expended in bringing those estates up to the level of English estates, and unless this exception was made, such efforts would be discouraged. He begged to move in page 9, line 14, to leave out ("may if it think fit") in order to insert ("shall if the landlord so requires.")

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would be willing to accept the Amendment if the noble Marquess would consent to retain the words with regard to the improvements that they should be "substantially maintained."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, practically, the improvements were maintained by the landlord; but if the tenant occasionally cleared out a ditch, it might be alleged that the improvements were not substantially maintained by the landlord.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the word "substantially" implied that the landlord in the main maintained the improvements.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL remarked, that in Scotland the tenant was under the obligation to maintain the improvements, subject to wear and tear. What he wanted to know was whether the word "substantial" was put in to give ease to the Court in its interpretation of the clause, or whether, on the contrary, it was intended to make it more rigid?

LORD LECONFIELD objected to the use of the word "substantial," on the ground that if it were employed the tenant might, under the clause, require the landlord to carry out any substantial repairs which were rendered necessary by the neglect of the former.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD CARLINGFORD moved, in page 9, after sub-section (5.) insert as a separate sub-section—

("6.) Subject to rules made under this Act, the landlord and tenant of any present tenancy to which this Act applies, may, at any time if the tenancy is not subject to a statutory term, or if the tenancy is subject to a statutory term, then may, during the last twelve months of such term, by writing under their hands, agree and declare what is then the fair rent of the holding; and such agreement and declaration on being filed in court in the prescribed manner, shall have the same effect and consequences in all respects as if the rent so agreed on were a judicial rent fixed by the court under the provisions of this Act."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY expressed approval of the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD INCHQUIN moved to insert, in page 9, line 39, after the word ("term,")—

("Provided, that nothing in this section shall apply in the case of any tenancy in a holding the rent payable in respect of which amounts to or exceeds one hundred pounds.")

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the Amendment of the noble Lord was one of the greatest importance, and he had looked forward to its being pressed in their Lordships' House. His interest in it was the greater because it was moved by a near Relative of his in "another place," where it received a large amount of independent support. The arguments brought forward in support of it appeared to him to be unanswerable. On the one hand, it affected only a very small number of tenants, and on the other it recognized a principle upon which, till now, they had always insisted—the principle that these large tenants were men perfectly able to protect their own interests and not requiring the protection of exceptional legislation. They could not, however, consider the proposal on its merits alone. When it was made in "another place" it encountered the strenuous opposition of the Prime Minister, who founded his opposition on the statement that if the Amendment were agreed to, and these 12,000 tenants excepted from the benefit of this clause, there would remain in Ireland a focus round which the discontent of the future would centre, and which would prevent the Bill from having the good effect which he anticipated for it. These words were, no doubt, weighed by the Prime Minister, and it was their Lordships' duty to weigh them also. They must look forward to the events with which they were likely to be brought face to face during the coming winter. He could see no reason for anticipating that this Bill would allay the agitation now prevalent in Ireland. Already there were sinister indications that that agitation was likely to be renewed in a shape not less dangerous than that which it had hitherto assumed. Under these circumstances, what would happen if this Amendment were insisted on? The agitation would continue, and they would be told that it was attributable to the alteration made in the Bill by their Lordships. They had already had some experience of the manner in which the House of Lords "mutilations" had been misrepresented, and they might depend upon it that in this case the agitation would be justified as a legitimate protest against their Lordships' action. There was another reason which induced him to think that this Amendment might be dispensed with. They had already inserted in the Bill provisions dealing specially with holdings which had been improved by the landlords, and in a later part of the measure an Amendment would be moved dealing with the question of leases. Both of these Amendments would principally affect the larger holders, whom the noble Lord wished to exclude. Under these circumstances, he ventured to ask his noble Friend whether the inconvenience which might arise from the acceptance of his Amendment might not outweigh any advantages to be derived from it by the landlords?

[First Night.]

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD hoped his noble Friend would withdraw his Amendment. If the line were to be drawn anywhere it ought to be at £20; but it was the larger tenants whose number it was desirable to increase, and to agree to the Amendment would be to discourage men from taking or buying holdings of £100 in value.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he was disposed to join in the appeal made to the noble Lord. If the Amendment were inserted the tenants to whom it applied would think after the language of the Prime Minister that the vote of the House was specially levelled against them. The advantage to the landlords would be very slight, and would not compensate for the discontent and disaffection which it would excite.

LORD CARLINGFORD heartily concurred in what had been said against the Amendment. The tenants against whom it was directed were the very men whom the Government wished to protect, for they were the tenants who were most ready to make their own improvements, and the effect of the Amendment would be to discourage them from laying out any of their capital on their holdings.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD VENTRY moved, in page 9, line 39, after ("term") insert—

("Provided that if the tenant has not before the expiration of the statutory term paid and satisfied the rent payable during the same a further statutory term shall not commence, and the tenant shall become a future tenant.")

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he could not accept the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

House resumed; and to be again in Committee To-morrow.

ECCELESIASTICAL COURTS REGULATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend an Act of the Parliament holden in the Third and Fourth Years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter ninety-three—Was presented by The Earl BEAUCHAMP; read 1^a. (No. 201.)

House adjourned at a quarter before
One o'clock A.M., till
Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 4th August, 1881.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—
Railways [No. 374].

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [August 3] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Irish Church Act Amendment [235]; Corrupt Practices (Suspension of Elections) [238]; British Honduras (Court of Appeal) [233]; Pedlars (Certificates) [234]; Universities (Scotland) Registration of Parliamentary Voters, &c. [232].

Withdrawn—Poor Relief and Audit of Accounts (Scotland) (re-comm.) * [239]; Exemption from Distress [116]; Canal Boats Act (1877) Amendment * [197].

The Marquess of Lansdowne

WITHDRAWAL OF RESOLUTION.

—o—

POLICE SUPERANNUATION (GREAT BRITAIN).

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that although he had for the fourth time secured the first place for his Motion respecting Police Superannuation, he did not intend to bring it forward, and for two reasons—first, because he did not wish to stand in the way of the Government in their natural desire to obtain Supply, especially at this period of the year; and, secondly, on account of the unavoidable absence of the hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who presided over the Select Committee which was appointed by the late Government, and who was anxious to take part in the discussion. He regretted this the more because he believed the Home Secretary intended to accept the principle of the Motion; but if next Session the Government did not deal with the subject of Police Superannuation, both in England and Scotland, he should be prepared to bring forward the Resolution of which he had already given Notice.

QUESTIONS.

—o—

BULGARIA—ARREST OF M. ZANKOFF.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any confirmation of the statement in the public journals, that M. Zankoff, the President of the late Ministry in Bulgaria, has been arrested; and, whether, if so, he will instruct Her Majesty's Representative in that country, to urge that M. Zankoff be secured in every respect the Constitutional and legal rights assured to him by the Constitution which was adopted by Bulgaria in 1878 with the concurrence of all the Great Powers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, according to the information received by Mr. Lascelles from the Bulgarian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Zankoff and Mr. Slaveikoff, after leaving Sistova, held meetings at various places in opposition to the new order of things; and on their arrival at Plevna, which is in a state of siege, the authorities placed them under arrest, and informed them that they were not to remain in the town. On their expressing a wish to proceed to Rustchuk, they were set at liberty and allowed to go there.

POST OFFICE — METROPOLITAN LETTER-CARRIERS.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Postmaster General, Whether, before the Post Office Vote is taken, he will arrange to receive a deputation from the Metropolitan letter carriers, who desire to be heard by him in support of the statements contained in their Petitions of the 26th April?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that he could only repeat what he had already stated on this subject. He had received numerous Memorials from the letter-carriers in various parts of the country, and those Memorials were now being carefully considered. As yet he had not found it necessary to supplement the statements contained in them by personal interview; and he was, therefore, unable to accede to the request of the hon. Member that he would receive a deputation.

ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT—PURCHASE LIEUTENANTS AND CAPTAINS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why a purchase lieutenant, who may possibly have invested about £800 in the State, is not allowed some recompense on compulsory retirement for the retention of that sum, while a purchase captain with (say) £2,400 invested in the State is allowed £100 a-year for life for its use on being compulsorily retired?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the right hon. and gallant Baronet, I have to say that the cases of the purchase captains and purchase lieutenants are altogether different. The former, who have not been promoted, were compensated by the Warrant of 1877 for the loss of their over-regulation money, and now will receive further compensation to the extent of £50 a-year, in consideration of their compulsory retirement at 42 instead of at 55. The purchase lieutenants who become non-purchase captains were liable, under the Warrant of 1877, to compulsory retirement at 40. They are benefited, not injured, by the Warrant of 1881, which enables non-purchase captains to obtain half-pay majorities, and ultimately honorary lieutenant-colonelcies. Of the £800 mentioned in the Question, only £100 was over-regulation money, and this, in 1877, was considered to be fully met by the promotion given to the officer. Under these circumstances, it is manifest that I should not be justified in disturbing the settlement of 1877 as to these officers.

INDIA—LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF JADHAVRAI HARISHANKAR.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been directed to the Petition of Jadhavrai Harishankar, now a prisoner in Tanna Gaol, praying for a new trial, or for the revision of his case by an independent judge; whether the principal witness against Jadhavrai has been subsequently tried and convicted, and, in the course of this subsequent trial, certain missing documents relied upon by Jadhavrai to prove his innocence, were actually produced; whether the Judge and Sessions Judge of Tanna reported to the Bombay Government in favour of a review of Jadhavrai's case by an independent judge; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the reasons assigned by the Bombay Government for refusing to grant the petition for a new trial or a revision of this case?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my attention has not been previously directed to the Petition referred to. It appears, however, from the political proceedings of the Bombay Government that Jadhavrai Harishankar, a prisoner under sentence for forgery, has submitted to that Government two Petitions, in which he has alleged that fresh evidence has been discovered which went to establish his innocence, and he prayed to be released. It appears that Mr. Coghlan, the Sessions Judge of Tanna, did represent to Government "as an official visitor of the gaol," that the case of the prisoner Jadhavrai Harishankar appeared to him to be one which deserved consideration. Several Reports have been made on the case by the two judicial officers, Mr. Candy, who had tried and sentenced the prisoner, and Mr. Aston, who had tried and sentenced one of the witnesses against the prisoner, and by the political officer at Kattiawar.

Mr. Childers

The Bombay Government resolved, on both occasions, stating no reason, "not to interfere with the sentence appealed against." The Government of Bombay appear to have acted entirely within the limits of their authority, and, no doubt, on legal advice. There was no obligation on them to state the reasons for their decision, and it would have been unusual for them to have done so. As at present advised, I do not see that there is on the face of these proceedings any ground for calling for further explanation from the Government of Bombay.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW ROYAL WARRANT, SEC. 66.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case (as has been stated) that, by Article 66, of Section 1, Part 1, of the new Army Warrant, commanding officers of battalions of Infantry will be unable to exchange with other commanding officers (as hitherto allowed when such exchanges were approved by the Commander in Chief) without losing their position as commanding officers, and becoming subordinate officers under the command of the newly created second lieutenant colonels; and, whether he will alter the Warrant so as to rectify so great an injustice?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; my hon. and gallant Friend has rightly interpreted the New Warrant; but I have no intention to amend it in the way he suggests. We deprecate, on the score of efficiency, exchanges between lieutenant colonels commanding battalions of different regiments, and I have no wish to make such exchanges more easy.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA — REPORTS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

MR. R. H. PAGET, who had the following Question on the Paper:—

"To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will endeavour to arrange for the transmission, each month, as soon as published, of the Reports issued by the Agricultural Department of the United States at Washington; and, if he will place a Copy in the Library of the House of Commons, and send a Copy to the Central Chamber of Agriculture, with a view of securing the circulation of the information to all interested in agriculture?"

said, that in consequence of a private communication received from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, for which he thanked the hon. Gentleman, it would not be necessary for him to put the Question.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that instructions to the effect stated in the Question had now been despatched to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Washington.

ARMY—BARRACK SERGEANTS.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will avail himself of the present opportunity, when the position of Non-Commissioned Officers in the Army is being generally improved, to review the conditions of service of Barrack Sergeants; and, whether in view of the onerous and highly responsible duties performed by Barrack Sergeants, when in sole charge of stations and stores, he will be good enough to consider the advisability of improving their position, as to pay and pension?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; I am not prepared, so long as barrack sergeants are chosen from pensioners, to increase their emoluments; but I am not quite satisfied that the present system is a good one, and that it would not be better to select barrack sergeants from men still in their Army engagements, which might possibly be extended. I will look into the question during the Autumn.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. M'DONOUGH AND FINN, PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. D. O'CONOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has further considered the case of Messrs. M'Donough and Finn who have been arrested under the Coercion Act at Gurteen, county Mayo; and, whether it is not a fact that Finn is a man of weak intellect, and not likely to be the leader of any conspiracy against Law and order?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had carefully considered the case of the two men, and he did not believe it would be consistent with the peace of the county to release them at present. Their cases, however, should be carefully reconsidered at the end of three months. He understood that although Finn suffered occasionally from an attack of sunstroke, that was only occasional, and did not affect him to any very serious extent.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—UNION RATING.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consider the possibility of introducing next Session a Bill to Assimilate the Law of Union Rating in Ireland to that prevailing in England?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he considered that the argument was strongly in favour of the assimilation of the law of union rating in the two countries; but he was aware that there would be a good deal of opposition to such a measure in Ireland. He should be disposed, however, to consider very carefully the possibility of carrying it into effect; but he could not pledge himself that a Bill on the subject would be brought in next Session.

MR. HEALY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was not aware that the opposition to the proposal came from the landlords?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was not aware of that. He repeated that, in his own opinion, there were strong arguments in its favour.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—OUT-DOOR RELIEF.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will cause an inquiry to be made into the exclusion of certain non-able-bodied classes from outdoor relief in Ireland, the same classes being entitled to it in England?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he would certainly ascertain the precise position of this matter; but he was not quite sure that his hon. and gallant Friend was not under some misapprehension. The Boards of Guardians had considerable power in this case. Section 1 of the Poor Law (Ireland) Act provided—

“That Guardians of the poor of every union in Ireland shall make provision for the due relief of all such destitute poor persons as are found to be disabled from labour by reason of old age, infirmity, or bodily or mental defect, and of such destitute poor persons as may be disabled from labour by reason of severe sickness or serious accident, and who are thereby deprived of the power of earning a subsistence for themselves and their families, and of poor widows having two or more legitimate children dependent upon them; and it shall be lawful to the Guardians to relieve such poor persons in or out of the workhouse as to them may seem fitting."

If his hon. and gallant Friend found that that section did not cover all cases, he should be very glad to receive private information of cases that it did not cover.

STATE OF IRELAND—DISTURBANCE AT NEW ROSS.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to an outrage committed by soldiers in New Ross on Friday the 22nd instant, the circumstances of which are reported as follows in the "Wexford People" of the 27th instant:—

"Shortly after eleven o'clock on Friday night last, Edward Murphy, who is employed as a driver by Mr. Keely, of Cross Lane, New Ross, was returning home from Kilkenny, where he had been in the discharge of his duties. He had reached the locality known as Sugarhouse Lane, when he was met by a crowd of drunken soldiers. One of the number, who has the privilege of going out in plain clothes, and who is said to be an officer's servant, jumped up on the car upon which Murphy sat and demanded to be driven to the barracks. Murphy refused, when the soldier struck him with all his might, felling him to the earth. Several others of the party immediately set upon the unfortunate man, whom they beat and kicked in the most savage manner. Murphy was unable to defend himself, and lay entirely at the mercy of his assailants, who, when they rendered their victim insensible, went to amuse themselves with the horse and car. Murphy's cries for assistance having been heard in the meantime, his wife and some neighbours soon arrived and conveyed the wounded man to his residence. At present he is in rather a critical condition, his head and shoulders being a mass of wounds:—" whether the foregoing report is substantially accurate; and, if so, what steps he has taken to insure the punishment of the perpetrators of this outrage and to protect the inhabitants from a repetition of such scenes; whether he is aware that continual complaints have been made of the conduct of these soldiers since they have been stationed at New Ross; and, whether he will inform the House of the grounds upon which the Government deem it necessary to maintain a military force in the town?

Mr. W. E. Forster

Mr. CHILDERS: No, Sir; I am satisfied that the report in The Wexford People quoted by the hon. Member is greatly exaggerated. I find that a sergeant, two corporals, and a private, all of whom were sober, were returning to barracks on the evening of the 22nd of July, when the private slipped and hurt his knee. They hailed a passing car, and the carman at first offered to take them to barracks, but, being in liquor, he afterwards refused, although the fare was tendered, pushed two of them off the car, and struck them across their faces with his whip. A scuffle ensued, and he was knocked down, but very slightly injured. The matter was settled between the soldiers and the carman, who, at first, complained at the barracks, but afterwards declined to pursue his complaint. I am also satisfied that continual complaints are not made against the soldiers at New Ross, whose conduct is exemplary. They have on several occasions been pelted with stones, but have never retaliated. In answer to the third Question, I have to say that troops were sent to New Ross on the recommendation of the magistrates.

Mr. REDMOND said, that, in consequence of the reply which had just been given to his Question, and which was at variance with the details supplied to him from information the credibility of which he could not for a moment question, he thought it his duty to make two or three observations, and, in order to enable him to do that, he would conclude with a Motion. ["Oh, oh!"] He was not surprised to find that some hon. Members were impatient to hear that he proposed to do so; but he offered no apology for taking this course. In exceptional and unconstitutional manner in which government in Ireland was being carried on at present, not only warranted, but seemed to him to demand the strictest investigation and the most vigilance from the Irish Members. During the prolonged discussions which taken place on the Land Bill they on the Irish Benches sat in patience and reticence, while events had been happening which, under other circumstances, would certainly have called for the promptest interference on their part; but the Bill having been taken from the House of Commons, they thought it to be the imperative duty to draw attention to things which were being done in name of law and order. With regard to this outrage in New Ross, he could state deliberately that this was not an isolated case. It was one of many instances of this conduct which had disgraced these troops while they had been stationed in New Ross. In the present condition of feeling in Ireland, and especially in a placelike New Ross, this was a matter of very grave importance. It was not alone that the people looked upon their presence there as an absolute insult to them. It was not alone that their feelings were continually outraged by the presence and conduct of the troops; but actually the peace and good name of the town were imperilled by their conduct and presence. He held in his hand letters which he had received from respectable men—from men who were intimately concerned in maintaining the public peace and order of New Ross—from clergymen, from gentlemen who held offices of public responsibility and trust, and every one of these men informed him that the presence of these troops in New Ross was not only a source of anxiety to them, but was a constant source of irritation to the people. Last February he had occasion to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he would state upon whose representation these men were sent to New Ross, and of course the right hon. Gentleman refused to disclose the names of the individuals who had "reasonably suspected" the locality; but he (Mr. Redmond) happened to know something about the circumstances under which these troops were sent there. He happened to know that a memorial was got up in New Ross which pretended to speak on behalf of the people of New Ross. He had reason to know that some of the local magistrates actually signed to sign this memorial, and that ultimately it only received the signature of a few individuals in no sense representative men, every one of whom was directly interested in creating a state of things which would warrant coercion. New Ross was absolutely peaceful at the time; but it was absolutely essential that an excuse for coercion should be produced, and consequently this demand was made for military protection. He had no hesitation in saying, from his personal knowledge, and the information supplied to him from responsible men, that these troops since they had been sent to New Ross had been the perpetrators of outrages which had more than once almost led to serious collision and conflict with the people. He had received a letter from the Chairman of the New Ross Town Commissioners, who stated that there was no doubt that the soldiers were concerned in a very brutal and cowardly attack upon poor Murphy, a most inoffensive man. They attacked him without the least shadow of reason, beat him, dragged him, and kicked him off the car, made his head one mass of bruises, inflicted several wounds upon him, and then drove off. The fact that the soldiers paid £5 to hush the matter up formed a strong case against them. Murphy would not accept the money, but his employer induced him to do so, as if he took further proceedings it might injure the employer in certain quarters. More than one of the attacking parties were sergeants or corporals. He (Mr. Redmond) would recommend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he wanted "dissolute ruffians," to go to the men who perpetrated such outrages as these, and leave alone the peaceable respectable men upon whom he was now laying hand in Ireland. He sincerely hoped that the announcement that appeared in that day's papers that the right hon. Gentleman intended to give up the reins of government in Ireland would turn out to be true. The Chairman of the New Ross Commissioners further stated that—

"The conduct of these soldiers had given much annoyance, and caused much offence to the people. They were not required to establish law and order; but they irritated public feeling, and increased the dissatisfaction of the population generally with British institutions."

He had another letter from a well-known and esteemed clergyman, stating that the facts set forth in his Question were substantially correct, and adding that Murphy, who was one of the most inoffensive of mortals, was brutally beaten by the soldiers out of mere drunken wantonness. In another portion of the letter the rev. gentleman stated that before Murphy came up that night the soldiers were engaged somewhere near or outside the chapel, mimicking the confessional, one representing the priest, and another representing a girl supposed to be confessing to him. He need not say that an outrage more insulting to held for Irish opinion. In his opinion, the best way was for the people to make appeals direct to their Members of Parliament, who could bring the subject before the House.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought it was hardly to be wondered that so many complaints were made about the soldiers in Ireland, when it was borne in mind that wherever a case was brought against a soldier it was generally dismissed by the magistrate. About six weeks ago, a tradesman and his wife and sister were walking through the streets of Dublin, when they were met by a couple of soldiers. One of the soldiers used some infamous language towards the women. The tradesman turned round and asked what he meant. The answer he got was a blow with a stick. He prosecuted the soldier. Four witnesses proved the case; the soldier, however, denied it. An officer came forward and gave him a good character, and the magistrate dismissed the charge, notwithstanding all the witnesses who proved the assault. The very next case on the list, before the same magistrate, was one in which a labourer was charged with assaulting a soldier. The labourer denied the charge; but the magistrate held it was proved, and he passed sentence of seven weeks' hard labour. The course that was being pursued now by the soldiery in Wexford was very similar to that pursued by the soldiery sent there by Castlereagh to precipitate the rebellion. The soldiers insulted the priests and their religion, until at length the men of Wexford rose to arms and made such a splendid resistance, that the name of Wexford has become an inspiration and a hope. If, at the time, every county in Ireland had done as well as Wexford, his hon. Friend would not have been under the necessity of coming here and asking foreigners to redress outrages done to the people of Ireland.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to explain that he had not said anything about the payment of £5 as compensation in his reply, because nothing had been said about it in the Question. What he said was that the carman had settled with the soldiers.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was of opinion that the practice of moving the adjournment of the House was the only safeguard which the Irish Members had that any attention would be paid by the Treasury Bench to their applications. Mischief was likely to arise when soldiers were placed in a position where they were not required, and when they acted the part of a riotous mob in a peaceable town, the charges made against them for their misconduct ought not to be allowed to be withdrawn simply because a particular complainant might not choose to appear.

MR. REDMOND said, he would have thought the Secretary of State for War knew sufficient of the incorrigible character of the Irish Members to prevent his taking up the time of the House by addressing lectures to them. As the right hon. Gentleman had not promised to re-investigate that case, he would certainly press his Motion to a division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 191: Majority 180.—(Div. List, No. 352.)

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS —CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. BRYCE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will state what is the present position of the scheme for the future management of Christ's Hospital which the Endowed Schools Commissioners have been occupied in framing; and, when it is likely to be laid before Parliament?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have caused inquiry to be made of the Charity Commissioners as to the position and prospects of the Christ's Hospital scheme, and I have received the following answer:—

“The draft scheme prepared by the Charity Commissioners for Christ's Hospital was published last August, and the Governors and others were allowed until the 31st of December to state their objections and suggestions. The objections and suggestions received are very numerous and weighty, and in respect to some of the points raised further investigations are requisite and are in progress. It is impossible at present to say when the Commissioners will be in a position to submit the scheme to the Education Department.”

MR. CAINE asked whether the Vice President of the Council was aware that the Governing Body of Christ's Hospital insisted upon the production of a certificate of baptism before admission to the benefits of the foundation, thereby excluding members of the Society of Friends, Baptists, and others; and whether, in framing a new scheme, he would suppress such an aggressive and unjust prohibition? Such a case had happened that day with regard to the child of a Baptist.

Mr. O'Donnell

Mr. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, he was not aware that such a provision existed; but when the scheme came into the hands of the Education Department he should be ready to omit any inequality of that description.

ARMY—PROMOTION BY SELECTION.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, owing to the promotion on the 1st July 1881 of a Major from the half-pay list to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel in the 6th Dragoon Guards, the senior Major of that Regiment has been superseded by thirty Majors of Cavalry and one hundred and forty-nine Majors of Infantry; and, if so, if he will explain the reason?

Mr. CHILDERS: Sir, I gather from the Question of the noble Lord that he considers that the senior major of a regiment is entitled to be promoted to a lieutenant-colonel's vacancy. That, no doubt, is a common practice; but since Lord Cardwell's declarations in February, March, and June, 1871, to the effect that while promotion in the lower regimental ranks would generally be by seniority, those to the higher ranks would be generally by selection, the Royal Warrants have made it quite clear that no officer has a right to consider that he has a claim to this promotion, and the responsibility is thrown on the Commander-in-Chiefs, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to select lieutenant-colonels. In the present case, the Duke of Cambridge proposed, and I approved the exercise of this responsibility; and it would evidently establish a bad precedent if I gave the reasons for taking this course.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—GEORGE PATTERSON, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT.

Mr. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph headed "A Suspect's Career," in the "Leinster Leader" of the 16th July, in giving an account of the career of Mr. George Patterson, of Edenderry, a veteran soldier; and, if he has ascertained of what offence this old soldier, who has served in several campaigns and shed his blood for the Queen is suspected?

Mr. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I have obtained a copy of the paragraph in question, from which I gather that a Mr. George Patterson had been arrested under the Act of this Session, and that he is stated to have enlisted in the Army 41 years ago, and since his discharge to have been until lately living in New South Wales. I find that a private of that name was discharged in 1853, and I presume he is the same man. I have no information as to the offence of which he is suspected beyond the statement in the Parliamentary Paper of this Session, No. 316, item 155, to which I must refer the hon. Member. It is not my duty to follow up the career of soldiers who left the Army some 30 years ago.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—TELEGRAPH TO SHETLAND.

Mr. LAING asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the fact that, owing to the interruption of the Postal Telegraph to Shetland from the delay in procuring a repairing ship, storm warnings cannot be conveyed there by telegraph, which might often, and especially on the occasion of the late disastrous gales, be the means of saving the lives of many of the poor fishermen; and, whether, in view of this lamentable occurrence, the Treasury will at once sanction the acquisition by the Post Office of a suitable repairing ship to maintain those Telegraphic Cables to Orkney, Shetland, the Lewis, and other islands of Her Majesty's dominions?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I am informed that the Meteorological Office did not predict the gale of July 20 to the north of the Shetlands. Storm warnings have never been sent north of Kirkwall, nor has there been any application for them from Shetland; but even had it been the custom so to send them, no warning could have been sent of this particular gale. I can only repeat the answer I have previously made, that I admit the inconvenience that has been experienced this year from having no repairing ship, and that I will carefully consider the question in connection with next year's Estimates.

FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA—EXPULSION OF MR. L. LEWISOHN, A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Russian Government has not made any complaint as to the conduct of Mr. Lewisoohn during his stay in Russia, and that the sole cause of his expulsion from that Country was that endorsed on his passport, viz. that he is a Jew; whether both the legal adviser of Her Majesty's Embassy at St. Petersburg and the Law Officers of the Crown have declared that the expulsion of Mr. Lewisoohn from St. Petersburg was illegal; if so, whether any representations have been made to the Russian Government on the subject, and with what result; and, whether Mr. Lewisoohn will now be permitted to go to Russia for purposes connected with his ordinary business as a London merchant, and be enabled to claim the protection accorded to all other British subjects in that Country who are not Jews?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, it is true that the Russian Government have made no complaint against Mr. Lewisoohn, and that we are not aware of any reason for his expulsion, except the fact of his being a Jew. Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires has, under instructions from Earl Granville, addressed a Note to the Russian Government calling their attention to the proceedings in Mr. Lewisoohn's case; but although Mr. Wyndham has reported a conversation on the subject, no written answer has yet been received. I am not in a position, therefore, at present to state whether Mr. Lewisoohn will be allowed to return to Russia.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Will the Papers be laid on the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir. I have promised that they will be produced; but they cannot be laid on the Table until the Correspondence now going on is completed.

STATE OF IRELAND—LAND LEAGUE MEETING AT DROGHEDA.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Lord Frederick Cavendish

Whether his attention has been directed to the Correspondence in the "Freeman's Journal" between Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M. and the Rev. H. M'Kee, P.P., the Rev. W. P. Kearney, C.C., and others, as to the alleged threat made by Mr. Lloyd to cause the police to fire on the people at Drogheda on New Year's Day; and, whether the Government will grant a sworn investigation into the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had seen the correspondence in question, and did not consider the case one in which it was the duty of the Government to order an investigation to take place.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (EXPERIMENTS ON STEEL).

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. CARBUTT) asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has seen a Blue Book entitled "Merchant Shipping (Experiment on Steel)." — Memorandum issued by Board of Trade for use of Surveyors, containing the Remarks of the Engineer Surveyor in Chief and his Assistants upon the use of Milled Steel manufactured by the Steel Company of Scotland, together with an Appendix showing the Tabular Results of Experiments made with regard thereto; and, if so, whether he would take into his consideration how far it is fair to other manufacturers of steel who have been longer engaged in perfecting the material, and who have had more experience, that the weight of the Department should be used to bring before the public one of the latest established steel works in Great Britain; whether he will give the same facilities to the large steel works in South Wales, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, who for years have supplied Her Majesty's Dockyards, to have experiments on their steel brought under the notice of Parliament with the same publicity; and, whether he would state the total cost of the Blue Book issue, which is charged 5s. 6d. to the public?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, I am glad the Question has been asked, as it gives me an opportunity of publicly correcting a misapprehension on which it is based. The facts of the case are these. The Board of Trade is under statutory obligation to fix the maximum pressure beyond which marine boilers shall not be worked, and recently, in consequence of the introduction of milled steel, out of which these boilers are now made, applications have been made to the Board of Trade by the makers of steel and users of these boilers to reduce the prohibition as to safety. The Board of Trade replied that they could not do that without proper evidence, and then the makers of steel requested the Board of Trade to undertake experiments for that purpose. The Board of Trade replied that they had no funds out of which to conduct such experiments, but that they would have no objections to allowing their officers to attend and supervise the experiments, and to publish the results if conducted at the expense of the companies concerned. Six considerable firms accepted the offer of the Board of Trade, and the first experiments were made by the Northern Company of Scotland, and were the first completed. The Blue Book referred to in the Question gives the result of those experiments. There are five other series of experiments to be made, and the results will be published in their turn. The Board of Trade will be ready to extend the same facilities to any other Companies under the same conditions. I do not think the Blue Book has been an expensive one; but it was absolutely necessary that the results of the experiments should be published for the information of the Board of Trade and the Admiralty.

GROUND GAME ACT—PROSECUTION FOR TRESPASS.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a trespass case tried at Stonehaven on Wednesday last where the sheriff substitute inflicted on a farm servant a fine of one pound, with four pounds expenses, for walking over rough pasture on his master's farm with a gun, his master having the benefit of the Ground Game Act, and the servant having alleged he had a written permission from his master, which he had left at the farmhouse; whether he did not say, when the Bill was passing this House, that, under circumstances as described, production of the written permission at the farmhouse would be held to be production on demand, and no judge would convict; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will remit the sentence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had made inquiry into the case mentioned, and he had received a report from the sheriff. It was not a case in which the man had left his written permission behind him, as he never had any permission at all. Even if he had, however, he would have violated the law by going in search of game in the month of June, which was an unlawful time under the Act; therefore, the point did not at all turn upon his leaving his permission behind him. He had received a statement of the gentleman who acted for the landowner in the prosecution, and he stated that if it had been shown to Dr. Young or his factor that the accused had a permission, the proceedings would have been withdrawn; but no such permission was ever shown to have existed.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—RELEASE OF PRISONERS UNDER THE PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881.

MR. J. COWEN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government will accompany the "message of peace" which they are about to send to Ireland either by the release of the two hundred persons kept in prison without trial, or accord them the constitutional right of having an opportunity of defending themselves before being punished? The hon. Member, after putting his Question, said, he would not put it at the present moment if the right hon. Gentleman thought the period inopportune.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I hardly feel justified in asking my hon. Friend to delay this Question, because if I were to ask him to do that, it would be like making myself a party to the Question, and, probably, giving occasion to expectations which I might not be able to fulfil. I think it would be better to take the Question as it now stands, and to say this. Naturally and necessarily when a Bill of an exceptional character is in force under which a number of individuals have been confined upon the responsibility of the Government, it is the desire and duty of the Government at all times, in connection with any Land Bill or any other way, to look at the question whether at all, and if so how far, it is in their power to counteract or put an end to such a state of things. That is a standing duty. This Question, however, places the exercise of the duty in especial connection with the Land Bill, which is glanced at in the Question as a "message of peace." Of course, it will be obvious to my hon. Friend that we do not at all know what decisions the House of Lords, in the exercise of its discretion, may arrive at with regard to the Land Bill, nor what view this House may take in respect of that decision. Consequently, the contingency which my hon. Friend has proceeded upon is one that is not yet realized as one which it is possible for us to have before us, as one of the facts of the case. But, in making that declaration, I must beg not to be understood as conveying, in any manner or degree, any anticipation of any decision of the Government in one of the gravest matters it could have to consider, which it only can consider from time to time, according to the circumstances of the case, on a comprehensive view.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE CONVENTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: A Question having been put to me more than once, very naturally, on the subject of the Convention with respect to the Transvaal, I may mention that the Government have to-day received a brief intimation that that Convention has been signed; that the transfer of the functions of Government will take place upon the 8th; and that the Commission is breaking up. The Chief Justice and the President of the Orange Free State had actually departed; Sir Evelyn Wood has gone back to Natal; and on the 6th Sir Hercules Robinson was to return to the Cape.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—A SATURDAY SITTING.

MR. GLADSTONE stated that it would be necessary for the Government to ask the House to sit on Saturday, in order to proceed with the Business in Committee of Supply.

NAVY—TORPEDO BOATS.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, as stated in the "Nautical Gazette of New York" of the 9th ultimo, two vedette or torpedo boats have just been built in the United States for the British Government; whether these boats are faster, cheaper, and better than any that can be produced in this Country; when he expects these boats to arrive; and, if he will be good enough to state the size and cost of these boats?
Mr. Gladstone

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, two vedette boats have been built of wood in the United States for the British Government. They are 48 feet long, and are designed for a speed of 14 knots. They have been delivered in England, but have not been tried yet. Their cost is £2,500 each, delivered in England. English-built, wooden vedette boats are a little slower, and cost something less. English-built torpedo boats of steel, with 16 knots speed and 67 feet long, cost no more than these Herreshoff vedette boats; which will, however, put us in possession of a very novel form of boiler, which is supposed to be remarkably free from danger of explosion.

NAVY—H.M.S. "INFLEXIBLE."

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true, as reported, that H.M.S. "Inflexible" draws some three feet more water than was calculated in her design; and, if not, if he will state the exact difference between the contemplated and real draught of said ship?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Inflexible, equipped and stored, with bunkers full, and with the rig which would not be used in time of war, when only the two lower masts will be retained, will have a mean draught of 25 feet 6 inches. Since the Inflexible was designed first her guns have been changed from 60 to 80 tons, her torpedo equipment and torpedo boats have been added, and her complement of men has been raised by 100. Allowance was made for all these changes in the amended estimate from time to time, and the Inflexible draws within an inch and a-half of what she was expected to draw by the Constructive Department.

JAPAN—TREATY REVISION.

SIR EDWARD REED asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign.

Affairs, Whether the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has taken place with the Government of Japan respecting the application of the Laws of Japan to foreigners; the trade in opium; and the closing of the Foreign Post Offices; if he will state the present position of the question of Treaty of Revision; and, when the Papers upon this subject will be presented to Parliament?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the question of the application of the laws of Japan to foreigners is dealt with incidentally in the general Correspondence relating to Treaty revision. The importation of opium into Japan is prohibited by Treaty, but a question has arisen with reference to the supply of opium for medicinal purposes to the foreign community, and it is proposed to discuss this question in the course of the negotiations. The foreign Post Offices were closed by agreement in 1879, and there will be no objection to lay the Papers relating to this subject on the Table, together with the general Correspondence, when the negotiations are concluded. At the request of the Japanese Government, it has been agreed that the negotiations for the Treaty revision shall take place in Japan, and Her Majesty's Government are at the present moment in communication on the subject with the other Treaty Powers, and with the Chambers of Commerce in this country, and the principal firms interested in the trade with Japan. Her Majesty's Government have signified their willingness to proceed with the negotiations on the basis of Article 22 of the Treaty of 1858, under which notice of revision was given by the Japanese Government, and which provides that either party may demand a revision of that Treaty with a view to the insertion therein of such amendments as experience shall prove to be desirable. It is not possible at present to state how soon the Papers on the subject may be presented to Parliament.

TUNIS—THE ENFIDA CASE.

THE EARL OF BEOTIVE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that the Bey of Tunis, under the instigation of M. Roustan, has issued a decree removing the Enfida case from the Hanafi local court to the Meliki local court, although, early in the present year, he declared he had no power to control the action of those courts; if Her Majesty's Government are aware that the Meliki court formerly declared itself incompetent to entertain the suit, and that the French Government, prior to the 12th May, declined the jurisdiction of the local Tunisian courts for the Enfida case; whether Her Majesty's Government consider these acts of M. Roustan and the Bey are an infringement of the Anglo-Tunisian Treaty of 1863, and contrary to the tenor of Lord Granville's Letter of the 21st April, and therefore violations of the rights of a British subject; and, if Her Majesty's Government can inform the House, whether or not the acts aforesaid are approved by the French Government, and if they are prepared to take any steps in the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Enfida case has been removed by a decree of the Bey from the Hanafi to the Meliki Court, and Mr. Levey having protested against this measure, further proceedings have been suspended. As regards the second part of the Question, Her Majesty's Government have been given to understand that the Maliki Court had formerly declared itself incompetent to entertain this suit; and it appears from Lord Lyons' despatch of the 16th of February—which has been laid before the House—that the French Government had declared—

“That it was impossible, under the circumstances, that the French Government could consent to leave the Enfida question to the decision of the Tunisian local authorities.”

Her Majesty's Government are awaiting a further Report as to the facts of the case, and, in the meanwhile, they are not in a position to form an opinion as to whether the proceedings that have taken place constitute a violation of the Anglo-Tunisian Treaty of 1863, or of Mr. Levey's rights as a British subject. Her Majesty's Government have directed Mr. Arpa, the Judge of the Consular Court at Tunis, who was absent on leave, to return to his post, and furnish a Report on the legal bearings of the case. Recent communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the French Government on the subject with a view to a satisfactory solution.

TRINIDAD—OUTBREAK OF MALARIAL FEVER.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the attention of the Colonial Office has been drawn to an unusual amount of malarial fever of a malignant kind existing in Trinidad, by which a number of valuable lives have been lost; if he is aware that the inhabitants have had indignation meetings blaming the Governor for his supineness and apathy in not taking steps for improved sanitation, and particularly for not insisting on the removal of one special nuisance arising from the lees pond of the Colonial Company to which much of the sickness is attributed; and, whether he will send out such instructions to the Governor as will lead to the allaying of the dissatisfaction that exists?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, no official Report on this matter has been received, but the local newspaper contains a report of a meeting on the subject of the lees pond of the Colonial Company which is alleged to be a nuisance and to have caused serious illness in its neighbourhood. One of the resolutions at this meeting complains of the Executive not having taken decided steps to abate the alleged nuisance. A Report from the Governor will probably be received by next mail, as it appears that the resolutions of the meeting were to be sent to him with a request that he would forward them to the Colonial Office. I may add that a letter has been received from the Colonial Company, in which they assert that it is quite impossible that the outbreak of fever in question can be in any way attributable to the lees pond, and that the nuisance was entirely removed when the rains set in.

COOLIES (INDIAN) AT LA REUNION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the "décret" for the protection of the Indian labourers in the Island of La Réunion has yet been received by the Colonial Office; and, if so, whether he can make any statement as to the views of the Colonial Office with regard to the "décret," and as to the expediency of sanctioning further emigration from India to La Réunion?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the "décret" has been communicated to Her Majesty's Government by that of France, and is now under the consideration of Commissioners appointed on the part of the Foreign and India Offices to discuss the question of coolie emigration to La Réunion with the French Government.

IRELAND—CROPS IN MUNSTER— HARVEST LABOUR.

MR. WARTON (for Lord ARTHUR HILL) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that in Munster some crops are likely to be lost, owing to the fact that labour cannot be obtained; and, if so, whether he will give directions that assistance shall be rendered by the troops, when practicable, or whether he will devise some other mode by means of which those crops will be saved?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was aware that there was a dispute between the labourers and the farmers in regard to wages and other matters, and he saw some hope that it might be arranged, and, therefore, could not say that the crops would not be obtained. As to assistance being rendered by the troops, it was a very serious matter indeed to give directions to the troops to interfere in what was after all a wages dispute between the parties. A very strong case would be necessary to warrant such interference.

MR. PARNELL asked whether the constabulary had assisted in mowing and storing hay on farms in possession of the Emergency Committee, and whether an aide-de-camp, a member of the Lord Lieutenant's household, had been used as an agent for the purpose of making extensive purchases of agricultural implements on behalf of the Emergency Committee?

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the hon. Member to give Notice of his Questions.

COURTS MARTIAL—INDIA.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received any communications from India as to an alleged refusal on the part of the Government in India to reimburse Lieutenant Colonel Malcolmson, C.B.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

and Major Currie, the expenses they were respectively put to in defending themselves at the trial by court martial, ordered to be held in consequence of charges made against them by Brigadier General Burrows and Nuttall, which charges were disproved at the trial on which Colonel Malcolmson and Major Currie were honourably acquitted?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, no communication had been received from India on the subject of the refusal on the part of the Government to reimburse the officers mentioned, nor had the Home Government received any applications in any other form. Of course, if any such application were made it would be considered; but it would be contrary to all precedent to grant it.

WAYS AND MEANS—TERMINABLE ANNUITIES BILL

MR. HUBBARD said, on the second reading of this Bill he should move an Amendment which he had not yet formulated, and asked the Prime Minister for information as to when the Bill would be proceeded with?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, with reference to the Notice that has just been given by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is of great public importance that this measure should be proceeded with this Session, because I think that it would lead to more discussion than it was originally thought would take place upon it? I do not put the question in a hostile spirit, and if it is inconvenient to the right hon. Gentleman to reply to it just now I shall not require an answer at this moment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I certainly will consider the matter. I have no reason to suppose that any considerable opposition will be given to the measure; but nothing has been determined in reference to the matter at present.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER inquired whether the proposed re-organization scheme for the Royal Marines would be laid upon the Table in time for it to be discussed during the present Session?

MR. TREVELLYAN: Sir, there is nothing that can fairly be called a reorganization scheme for the corps of Royal Marines, nor has any such been promised or foreshadowed. The alterations that are to be made will date back to the 1st of July, so that no one who is to be benefited by those alterations will suffer by the delay. I think the hon. and gallant Member's request a very fair one; and I will see if the details of our proposals can be laid before the House before it rises.

EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS— THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MR. ONSLOW asked when the Indian Budget would be taken; and whether it would be taken before facilities were given for bringing on the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that the Indian Budget, being a matter of Imperial concern, must undoubtedly be taken into consideration before the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill was brought on. At the same time, there was no reason why, if the promoters of the latter measure found themselves in a position to bring it on previously, they should not do so. He could not fix a day for the Indian Budget until further progress had been made with Supply.

CATTLE DISEASE—THE SIBERIAN PLAGUE.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Vice President of the Council, whether his attention has been called to the Report of Mr. Spear relative to the Siberian Plague, and the extreme danger of its spreading to our flocks, and also the danger of fatality to the wool sorters; whether it is a fact that upwards of 100,000 bales of Eastern wool are annually imported into England, and proved to be capable of much danger; and, whether he has considered, in view of its dangerous properties, the desirability of prohibiting the sale of the sweepings from the manufacturers' sorting rooms, and also the sale of the old bags?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, Mr. Spear's Report has been considered by the Veterinary Department, and Professor Brown has written a Memorandum on the subject, which I propose to lay upon the Table. Outbreaks of "anthrax" are not uncommon in Russia, and have occurred occasionally in this country, although the disease has not generally extended beyond the farm where the outbreak took place. There is only a single instance recorded where the disease arose on lands which had been partly manured with refuse from woollen factories. Under these circumstances, there does not appear to be any necessity for the prohibition suggested by the hon. Member.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—GRANTS FOR DRAWING.

MR. G. PALMER asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If he is aware that the payments for results in drawing in the Elementary Schools have been this year in many cases unsatisfactory to the teachers and managers; and, is he willing to state to the House why the payments are so much less this year in comparison with last year?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have been made aware by numerous complaints that the payments for results in drawing in the elementary schools have this year been unsatisfactory to teachers and managers as compared with last year. The reason why the payments are much less this year than last is that in 1879 a Circular was issued, the Department announcing a change in the mode of assessing the grant. This change was made with the view of securing better instruction in drawing, and in lieu of a payment of 1s. for every child who had been taught drawing, 1s. would be paid for each satisfactory exercise, not being more than three in number. The Circular also gave notice that the standard of examination would be raised "sufficiently to counterbalance the increase in the number of payments." It would appear that, instead of both these changes being brought into operation simultaneously, the schools had the benefit of the increased grants in 1880, but that the raising of the standard was deferred till 1881. Hence there is a falling off in the grant this year as compared with last.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—MOVING ADJOURNMENTS AT QUESTION TIME.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Prime Minister whether the Government had arrived at any conclusion as to what they would do with regard to his Motion as to proposals for adjournment during Question time? If the Prime Minister desired it, he would move the Motion that evening.

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was not ready to make any announcement on the subject—not because the intention of his hon. Friend did not commend itself to him, or that he did not agree very much with the proposal which he believed he intended to make, but because the question connected itself with so many matters of detail relating to the Business of the House that it was a grave question whether it was desirable to deal with it as an isolated matter, or whether it would not be more advantageously included in the general consideration of the arrangements of the House and the despatch of Public Business.

MR. ANDERSON said, that, under these circumstances, he would not move his Resolution.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE (MR. BRADLAUGH)—NEW WRIT FOR NORTHAMPTON.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that he wished to put the following Question to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair:—Whether, as the House has decided forcibly to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh, one of the duly elected Members for Northampton, obeying the statutory obligation under which alone he can serve his constituents in this House, the seat for Northampton is now vacant; and, whether it is competent for any Member to move that a Writ be issued for the election of a Representative to serve in Parliament for the borough of Northampton in the room of Mr. Bradlaugh?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Carlisle will allow me to state that the Speaker is bound to answer all Questions on points of Order that may be put to him as they arise; but I must respectfully observe that the Question that the hon. Baronet now puts to me is one which relates to a matter which is for the determination of the House itself. I may say, however, that the House does not entertain any proposal for issuing a new Writ for any constituency unless the seat be vacant.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked how the seat was to be declared vacant?

MR. SPEAKER: That is not a matter for me to determine.

Mr. Mundella

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—MOUNTED INFANTRY.

RESOLUTION.

SIR ROBERT LOYD LINDSAY, in rising to move—

"That, in order to meet the requirements of modern warfare, and to secure rapidity of movement for troops armed with breech-loading rifles, some provision be made in this year's Army Estimates for the formation of corps of mounted infantry, and that a proportion of such corps form part of the Army establishment in future," said, he did not desire to see a new branch of the Service established; but he wanted greater mobility to be given to our Infantry, who were, nevertheless, not to relax their efforts to improve themselves in the use of the rifle. Almost inestimable service was rendered in a campaign by giving additional power of locomotion to the troops engaged in it. He had no doubt that hon. Members who had taken interest in modern campaigns had observed that themselves. They might remember the very wonderful marches which Sir Hugh Rose made in India with troops mounted on ponies and mules. If his hon. and gallant Friend the late Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) had been in the House he would have said something in support of the Motion he had brought forward. The success of Sir Henry Havelock's mounted riflemen was recorded in Malleon's History of India, from which he begged to quote the following passage:—

"Thus 60 men, organized on a novel plan—that is to say, as mounted riflemen—had effected, with almost nominal loss, in five days, during which they marched about 40 miles a-day, what 3,000 regular troops had for six months failed to accomplish—namely, the complete expulsion of 4,500 rebels from the province, and in the infliction on them of a punishment which has not to this day been effaced."

With reference to operations in Cabul in December, 1880, the advantage of having a body of mounted infantry available for service was forcibly brought to notice, and Lieutenant General Sir Frederick Roberts accordingly gave orders for the formation of such a body. A committee was assembled to consider the subject, and the result was as follows:—One officer and 60 rank and file were selected from each regiment from men best able to ride. Each man was provided with a pony or mule from the regimental transport. The baggage saddles were so far converted as to make them suitable for riding, and were furnished with stirrups. Each man was provided with a pair of "khoojins," or native saddle bags, and in these were carried 60 rounds of ammunition in two tin cases holding 30 rounds each, three days' rations, and one day's grain for the pony; the total weight of these articles was 17 lb. Blankets were carried, folded under the seat, and fastened by a surcingle; greatcoats were carried, rolled up behind; also a picketting rope and peg; spare shoes and nails were carried in a pocket in the saddle. For British soldiers a small Warren's cooking pot was adopted for every four men, carried by one of each squad in a bag specially suited for the purpose. The equipment of the infantry soldier was not changed; but when mounted the men carried their rifles slung across their backs. There was no doubt that a body of infantry possessed of such mobility might on many occasions prove invaluable, whether the object was to relieve or re-inforce a distant post, or seize a point of vantage; while the increased distances they would traverse might be of the greatest service. In an essay written for the Wellington Prize in 1871, Sir Garnet Wolseley said—

"The next time we take the field, if the general has the same views as the writer, he will be as strong in mounted infantry as he can, with due regard to the forage resources of the country to be operated in."

He added—

"The offensive operations of mounted infantry must be by flank attacks. Its great power of moving enables it to make wide turning movements, knowing that, if beaten off, the enemy's infantry cannot pursue, and that from his cavalry it has nothing to fear."

In the same essay he said—

"With reference to the use of cavalry in attacks upon an enemy's position, the more one studies the battles lately fought in France, the more one is convinced that the chief use of cavalry henceforth will be as the eyes and ears of an army. The days of grand imposing charges of horsemen in masses are past, and only to be remembered among the spirit-stirring deeds of a bygone era. During the late war (Franco-German), the cavalry on both sides remained idle listeners to the roar of distant guns, or, when this course was departed from, the result proved the folly of the proceeding. We read of whole regiments of French cavalry being, as it were, crushed to death by the infantry fire at Sedan in their efforts, not so much for victory, as to prove that all chivalrous gallantry had not departed from their army."

The deductions which Sir Garnet Wolseley drew, therefore, from the most recent lessons in war was that during an action, cavalry, as a combatant arm, could seldom be of much decisive use; while the duties of obtaining information of the enemy's doings and of protecting the flanks could be more effectively performed by corps consisting of mounted infantry and cavalry in the proportion of four to one in favour of the mounted infantry. In a lecture on mounted riflemen at the United Service Institution, delivered in 1873, Sir Evelyn Wood, now second in command in the Transvaal, said—

"The experience gained during the war of 1870-1 has confirmed the opinion, long held by many soldiers, that mounted riflemen are now essential to every enterprising army."

In the course of that lecture, delivered seven years ago, Sir Evelyn Wood, then Colonel Wood, urged with great energy—and, let him say, with great courage—as an army reformer, the necessity of forming such corps, and he laid down this resolute proposition—namely, that before the next war a scheme for establishing mounted riflemen must be decided upon. And on that question, he said,

"all thinking soldiers are agreed, and that it only remains necessary to ascertain which plan is the most suitable for the British nation."

But he added—

"If the formation of such troops is postponed until war is imminent, it will be hurriedly and, therefore, badly executed."

He would read an extract from Sir George Colley, written from the camp, at Newcastle, January 17, 1881, which showed that Sir Evelyn Wood's words were almost prophetic. In that letter Sir George Colley said—

"I confess that I was greatly disappointed that the effect of the artillery fire, which, even when the Boers came out of their cover, and crowded the ridges pretty thickly, seemed absolutely nil; and to this and the failure of Brownlow's charge I attribute the loss of the day. But in justice to Brownlow's second troop it must be remembered that they consisted only of mounted infantry very recently organized. It was a steep and bold charge, and some of their horses, with little training, could not be brought to face the fire."

It was rather curious that Sir Evelyn Wood should have had an opportunity of proving the very thing that he said nine years ago, when he remarked that unless that matter was taken in hand at leisure and done in time of peace, they would have it done in time of war, and done badly and insufficiently. Now, he himself was not an alarmist as to this country, with its small Regular Force, being able to hold its own in every part of the world, as it was called upon to do; but it was a matter of grave consideration how that could best be done in future. In every war in which we had been engaged, from the Peninsular down to the Zulu War, the British troops had invariably met other troops who were not so well armed as themselves. Even in the Indian Mutiny, the Sepoys, although trained by English officers, were only armed with Brown Bess, while our troops used breech-loading rifles. But things were reversed in the case of the late contest with the Boers of the Transvaal. Breech-loading rifles were now so cheap and so easily obtained that every nation, and even every savage tribe that intended to go to war, would take care to provide themselves with those weapons. Unless, therefore, we took such steps to keep ourselves in advance and to alter our tactics and the equipments of our Army as our most experienced officers recommended, we might be placed in a position of great difficulty at no distant day. He trusted the Secretary of State for War would take the matter into consideration; and he (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) believed that if it were shown, as he thought it could be, that the additional outlay requisite for that important purpose was not large, the House would cheerfully vote the funds which the Secretary of State for War deemed necessary. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON, in seconding the Resolution, observed that its importance could hardly be over-estimated. He was convinced of the necessity of organizing a mounted infantry force in time of peace, instead of leaving it to be improvised to meet emergencies when war broke out. He thought that the men employed in the force contemplated by the Resolution should be men from 5 feet 3 inches to 5 feet 4 inches in height. In fact, the smaller and lighter they were the better; and the horses on which they should be mounted should be small and under 15 hands high. They should be taught to act in very small bodies. He agreed in every word which had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend, and he thought that the object in view might be carried out without adding anything to the Army Estimates, or, at least, with only a trifling increase of their present cost.

Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in order to meet the requirements of modern warfare, and to secure rapidity of movement for troops armed with breech-loading rifles, some provision be made in this year's Army Estimates for the formation of corps of mounted infantry, and that a proportion of such corps form part of the Army establishment in future," — (Sir Robert Lloyd Lindsay,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR THOMAS AGLAND said, he wished to take that opportunity of thanking the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire for having brought the question forward, and for the trouble he had taken in directing the attention of the military authorities to it. He had himself, as a civilian and as a retired Volunteer, made inquiries on the subject, and was convinced of its importance, but saw difficulties in the way of giving practical effect to the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member. There was, in the first place, the difficulty of carrying the rifle on horseback. They had, however, a regiment of Carbineers in the Service, and he believed they would never get the Yeomanry of the country to carry firearms until the example was set them in the Army. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was one which ought to be taken up with more spirit; and he trusted that, between this time and next year, the question would be considered at the War Office in all its bearings.

MR. CHILDERS said, he looked upon the question as being a very important one, and though, technically, the question could not, he thought, be put, as it would involve an addition to the Estimates, he very cordially thanked the hon. and gallant Gentleman for having brought the question before the House. So alive, indeed, were they to its importance that, in connection with the outbreak of hostilities in South Africa, they acted in the direction suggested by making an experiment, which, however, did not bear fruit, as hostilities had ceased before the troops reached the Cape. In the first place, they did what had been urged by many officers of experience—they armed a certain number of Cavalry with the long rifle. The question as to whether Cavalry could conveniently carry the long rifle had, no doubt, been a matter of much dispute; but there were those in the War Office who thought it could be accomplished, and that it might be possible to arm a large proportion of British Cavalry with that weapon. In the second place, they organized and sent out to South Africa under Major Barron a body of Mounted Rifles. As he had stated, owing to the cessation of hostilities, they were not brought into action, but if they had, then there would have been a good test of the value of the suggestion made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. The Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire contained the words "corps of mounted infantry." Now, the formation of a regular standing corps of Mounted Infantry was a matter which required to be well weighed. They had already Dragoons, Carbineers, Hussars, and Lancers, and to add a fifth denomination would be a movement in the wrong direction. What they wished to do was to simplify the divisions of the Cavalry rather than to add a special corps, which would soon come to be regarded as a Cavalry regiment. What he hoped might be done was to take measures to have among our Infantry soldiers a considerable proportion of men who knew how to ride, and to provide in time of peace a sufficient store of saddles and other necessary equipments. If this could be done it would meet the object which the hon. and gallant Member had in view; because we should then have ready on our hand, when the time came, facilities for using our Infantry soldiers in the way he had suggested. He was very much disposed to see whether something could not be done which would give us, in time of actual service, a good Mounted Infantry, trained in the use of the rifle, and with the simplest accoutrements. There were at the War Office several experienced officers who had given this question their careful consideration, and with their assistance he hoped before next year to be able to arrive at some decision which would be generally acceptable to the House.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he wished to express his pleasure that this important question had been raised by his hon. and gallant Friend, and his satisfaction at the answer given by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. There would, however, as he feared, be a difficulty in providing the horses. He suggested that as there was at present a light company in each regiment, there should also be a mounted company, which could act either upon foot or upon horseback, as the case might require. There had never been a better corps than the Cape Mounted Rifles. It did very good service, and seemed to him to be a model for mounted infantry. He was only sorry that that body had been done away with, and he should be very glad if his right hon. Friend would come down to the House and say that he would revive it in another form.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, it would be useless to arm the Cavalry with long rifles, unless the whole of the accoutrements were altered, and even then he doubted their efficiency. What was wanted was a corps of small men, with light sling rifles, and mounted on small horses, lightly accoutred, so that they could gallop up to a given point without unnecessary fatigue, dismount, and fire as rapidly as possible, and then be ready in a moment to mount and ride off.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT urged the Secretary for War to act upon the lines which he had suggested without delay.

GENERAL BURNABY said, he should be glad to see a larger distribution of pistols amongst soldiers than there was at present. The foreign Armies were extensively armed with them. The Evans' pistol, of American make, was the best. As to magazine rifles, those of the Evans' make were admirably adapted to use by mounted infantry. The magazine of this rifle carried 21 rounds, and it did not possess the disadvantages of the spiral spring. Russia had recently purchased 20,000 of these rifles, and he thought a trial should be made of them.

Question put, and agreed to.

ARMY—LONG SERVICE SOLDIERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL COLTHURST, who had a Notice on the Paper to call attention "To the necessity that exists for retaining a certain proportion of soldiers serving for pension exclusive of non-commissioned officers," said, he would not delay the time of the House by discussing the question; but, believing that men of that character would give increased strength to the British Army, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War whether soldiers who had a moral, if not a legal, claim to re-engage, provided their characters and physique were satisfactory, would be allowed to do so? To make short service effective it was necessary to have a considerable leaven of old soldiers.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, he approved the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. It was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of discipline that there should be a certain proportion of old soldiers in a regiment.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the soldier—other than the non-commissioned officer—had no right or expectation to be re-engaged; but he had stated that it had been determined to allow commanding officers to make recommendations of individual soldiers enlisted under the former rules for re-engagement, and each case would be considered on merits. But, as a general rule, if a soldier was not fit to be a non-commissioned officer within the first 12 years of service, he would not be likely to have a fair value for his money during the succeeding nine years. Part of the intention of the new system was that a non-commissioned officer had served for 15 years, it was very likely that he would get on to the permanent establishment of the Militia or the Volunteers. By an arrangement between the War Department and the Government of India a certain proportion of short service men would be allowed to their period of service with the Colours from 8 to 10 or even 12 years. As to the influence of old soldiers, he doubted very much whether the influence of the re-engaged private was good; and, on the whole, he thought it better not to establish any general principle as to re-engagement.

Mr. Childers

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he was glad to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, because he was satisfied that young soldiers in India were not capable of performing the work required from them.

COLONEL NORTH said, that in 1870 Mr. Cardwell spoke of "the importance of retaining in the Army that most valuable member, the old soldier," and that the late Duke of Wellington said the old soldier was the life and soul of the whole Army. But at present no veterans were to be found in the Army. He was ready to give every credit to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War for his desire to promote the efficiency of the Army; but he thought the greatest mistake the right hon. Gentleman made was to interfere with the regimental system of our Army. The recent changes had given great dissatisfaction to the Service, especially the changing of the names of the regiments. There was also very great dissatisfaction at regiments losing their numbers.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—ANTRIM ARTILLERY MILITIA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the irregularities committed by some of the officers and men in the Antrim Artillery Militia. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would institute a searching inquiry into the charges against them; otherwise it might be necessary early next Session to move for a Select Committee to investigate them.

MR. CHILDERS said, he had no right to speak again; but by permission of the House he would do so. Perhaps the hon. Member for Cavan would allow him to ask a question. He spoke of charges. What charges were they, and who made them? The matter had not recently been raised in a formal manner. Part of the charges to which the hon. Member referred originated in 1879, and had been disposed of in an answer given to the hon. Member on a Motion which he raised. Now, he spoke of something that occurred this year; but some conversation was going on in the House, and the hon. Member's words were difficult to follow. But if he referred to charges, he this year must ask who had made those charges, and where were they made?

MR. BIGGAR explained that the charges he referred to arose out of the 1879 business, and the general want of discipline in the regiment at the time; and, though one of the persons implicated had resigned, there were others who since had obtained promotion instead of censure.

MR. CHILDERS said, that being the case, he had to say that the matter was fully looked into; and last year the regiment was reported as in a thoroughly efficient state. He must decline to accept a proposal for any further inquiry next year when the hon. Member made his Motion, unless some new facts came to his knowledge.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not ask the right hon. Gentleman to give a promise for an inquiry, but only that he would himself make inquiries.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—SUSPENSION OF MR. O'KELLY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PARNELL said, he rose to draw attention to a Motion which had stood on the Paper in his name for a month in regard to the suspension of his hon. Friend the junior Member for the county of Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly). It was to the effect—

"That it is not in accordance with the orders and precedents of this House that a Member of this House should be suspended from its service for describing as lying and calumnious statements reflecting on the honour of the same Member."

It was not desirable that a Motion of that kind, which might seem to bear on the action of the highest authority in the House, and to dispute the ruling of the highest authority of the House, should remain any longer on the Paper than was absolutely necessary. Therefore, although he could not now take a division or submit his Motion formally, he would, with the permission of the House, bring the matter forward by way of discussion, which would have the effect of finally disposing of it. The circumstances in which the suspension of his hon. Friend took place were of rather a peculiar character. On the 3rd of June last, a Question was asked by the hon. Member for the county of Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) with reference to a false report as to firing at a Mr. Daly, near Loughrea, in the county of Galway. The hon. Member for Leitrim, as he was much in the habit of doing, accompanied that Question with reference to the truth of that report, which had turned out to be false, with an innuendo against the organization known as the Irish National Land League, of which several Members of that House were members. The hon. Member asked whether that was not the third murder or attempted murder within the last three weeks in the same locality attributable to the Land League? A point of Order was then raised by the hon. Member for the city of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor)—namely, “whether a Question mendaciously attributing to the Land League the responsibility—” The hon. Member for the city of Galway was thereupon interrupted by loud cries of “Order!” and by the rising of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) to another point of Order. The right hon. Baronet asked whether the word “mendacious” could properly be applied by one Member of the House to another? And the Speaker ruled that if the hon. Member, when he used the word “mendacious,” applied it to a Member of the House, he was clearly out of Order, and called upon the hon. Member to withdraw it, and he did withdraw it and substituted the expression “inaccurately.” Then the hon. Member for the county of Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly), after some further conversation had taken place, rose to another point of Order, and, with a considerable appearance of very natural indignation, asked the Speaker whether it was proper for an hon. Member, in putting Questions in that House, to make, in regard to Gentlemen sitting on those Benches, statements that were “lying and calumnious?” At once there broke forth loud cries of “Order!” and “Name!” The Speaker thereupon said that he was bound to name Mr. O'Kelly, and the Prime Minister made the Motion that Mr. O'Kelly should be suspended from the service of the House during the Sitting, which was carried by a considerable majority. He would presently show that the words used by Mr. O'Kelly had been ruled by two former Speakers—Mr. Denison and Mr. Lefevre—to be not out of Order. The Standing Order under which Mr. O'Kelly was suspended was adopted by the House in pursuance of a recommendation of the Committee on the Business of the House which sat in 1877 to consider the question of Obstruction and the best means of dealing with it. Among the witnesses examined were the then Chairman of Committees (Mr. Raikes) and the Speaker, and their evidence was directed, not to the obstruction of a particular measure by those who were interested in it, but to the question of general obstruction by repeated and long speeches, repetition of arguments, the moving of the adjournment of the House and of Progress, and by other means. It was to meet the case of general obstruction that the Rule was framed; but Mr. O'Kelly had not been guilty of particular or general obstruction of any kind. His hon. Friend was one of the most inoffensive Members of the House, and, so far from obstructing its proceedings, had only addressed the House twice that Session and once only last Session. His suspension did not take place, because he had committed the offence against which clearly the Rule in question was adopted. But even if his hon. Friend had offended against the Rule, he might at least have been warned before the penalty of suspension was inflicted upon him. That, however, was not the case, and he was suspended without having been called to Order or asked to withdraw the expressions he had used, and was so on the ground that the hon. Member for County Galway had used the word “mendacious,” and was called to Order for doing so, which fact, it was said, ought to have warned Mr. O'Kelly to be careful of the language he used. He would now come to the precedents to which he had referred. On the 27th of April, 1855, a discussion took place in reference to some charges made by a Member of the House against the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in the course of the discussion Colonel Knox said that there

Mr. Parnell

"was not a word of truth" in the charge made by the hon. Member for Aylesbury against General Cunningham. The word used by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon was "lying," a rougher word, but conveying the same meaning as the words "not a word of truth." The hon. Member, however, using those words was not suspended for doing so. He was asked to withdraw them as un-Parliamentary, and he did so. In the course of the same debate Lord Palmerston said that "every Member who heard the charges made must be convinced that they were false and calumnious." The words "lying and calumnious" were used by his hon. Friend; but here were words used by Lord Palmerston which were the equivalent of those words. On that occasion Mr. Otway drew the attention of the Speaker (Mr. Lefevre) to the words "false and calumnious," and what happened? The Speaker on the occasion ruled that the words were not out of Order. But he (Mr. Parnell) had other precedents and more recent ones in the spirit of his contention. In the debate on the Resolution moved by Mr. Dimsdale on the 27th July, 1864, Mr. Gathorne Hardy—now Lord Cranbrook—said an hon. Member had used language which did no credit to himself or the Government which he represented; and he pointed out that the words "false and calumnious" had been used. Mr. Denison, who was then Speaker, said there was nothing in those words calling for his interference. The Chancellor of the Exchequer—the present Prime Minister—intervened in the debate, and although he was present when these words were uttered, said he had not heard the disorderly words, and he agreed with the Speaker that the words "false and calumnious statement" were within Parliamentary limits. Yet it was for using these words that the Prime Minister asked a few weeks since that the Member for Roscommon should be suspended. He (Mr. Parnell) had established that these words were within the right of debate; and, consequently, the motive or reason for condemning his hon. Friend because he used those words was not sufficient. His hon. Friend would have withdrawn the words if he had been asked to do so; but he got no opportunity of withdrawing them, having been immediately subjected to the very summary and stringent ruling of the Chair. He (Mr. Parnell) wished to say that a question of this kind, brought forward without Notice, and imputing an offence of a highly criminal and scandalous character to an organization with which Members of that House were connected, was one very likely to excite angry feelings. Although he was willing to admit that the words of his hon. Friend were stronger than should be used, yet he submitted the hon. Member was entitled to be told that his words were un-Parliamentary. When such precedents had been set and deliberate rulings given them before a Member was suspended for using such words he was entitled to receive warning from the Chair. It was because the Irish Members felt the injustice of that ruling that he (Mr. Parnell) had put this Motion on the Paper, and which he was now precluded from moving; but he was satisfied he had said enough to show the injustice done to his hon. Friend by the suspension on the occasion in question.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am sorry to say that I must impugn the course of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in a wider sense than merely contesting his argument. I do not quite understand the liberty which he assumes to himself, for he seems on one night to appeal to the Rules of the House for protection, and on another to ruthlessly trample those very same Rules under foot. He knows very well to what I refer, because the facts are recent.

MR. PARNELL: I submit that the Prime Minister is out of Order in referring to a past matter which has been definitely decided by the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot see that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman are irrelevant.

MR. GLADSTONE: Why, during the whole of the discussion the hon. Member has himself been referring to a past matter which has been definitely decided by the House. But in applying to the Chair he was perfectly consistent, for, as I said before, he appeals to the Rules of the House one night, and on another night he not only tramples the Rules under foot, but insults the authorities. I object to the proceeding of the hon. Gentleman in this House also. I admit fully that every Member of the House is entitled to impugn and pronounce censure upon the conduct of the Speaker on grave and sufficient grounds; but if he does this, I contend that he is bound so to do in a manner of which the House may judge and on which it may pronounce a judgment. This the hon. Member has carefully refrained from doing, and the House can only, if it chooses, bandy words without pronouncing a judgment. I should have thought that it was an elementary principle of common sense that charges should not be lightly made against the Speaker of the House. The Chair of this House is not made to have dirt thrown upon it—it is not made to be the subject of loose and random talk such as that in which the hon. Member indulges. But whether such charges are lightly made or not, it is the prime duty of the hon. Member as a Member of this House, when he makes such charges, to make them in such a manner that the Chair can either be acquitted or condemned. The hon. Member, however, on the contrary, makes these charges against the Chair to-night at a time when he himself tells us the Chair cannot be either acquitted or condemned. The Chair can be made the subject of abuse or of vituperation; but the charges cannot either be met or substantiated. The hon. Member, in the course he has thought fit to pursue, therefore, has entirely mistaken the first elements of his duty as a Member of this House. The hon. Member, who has chosen to give to his censure the character of a lecture to the Chair, seems entirely to forget that the proceeding of the Chair was recognized and adopted by an enormous majority of this House. Why had not the hon. Gentleman the manliness to say at once that he was impugning the judgment of the House? No doubt, that judgment was founded upon the proceeding of the Chair; but that proceeding was taken up and adopted and made the basis of the judgment of the House. I should have thought it was a well-known principle of our system in this House—and I am astonished that a man with one-tenth part of the discernment of the hon. Member should not have perceived it, and had the hon. Member been guided by a right sense of his duty to the House he would have perceived it—that the judgment of the House stands between himself and the Chair, and protects the Chair from the charges that he

Mr. Gladstone

